Little Father Ousted.

Judge Cleland, of the municipal court of Chicago, has made a national reputation because of the beneficent use he has made of the parole system in dealing with petty criminality. His was a court of a very human man rather than of law and the rest of the judges were so shocked at his refusal to follow legal precedents that they have transferred him to a civil court and he will hand out paroles no more. He refused bail, made it excessively high in the cases of those who needed to sober up, and he suspended sentences right and left, on probation, without a probationary statute to back him up. He heard testimony without witnesses being sworn, unless attorneys requested it, on the ground that the method of administering oaths made a travesty of a solemn ceremony. That his work was beneficent no one denies, but his associate judges declared it to be outside the law whether inside of right and justice or not. His disposal from the criminal bench is not unlikely to so center public interest upon the methods he has successfully pursued as to make the laws better fit the needs of justice.

Inter-National Conservation.

The inter-national conservation convention, that was called together at Washington last week, has concluded its labors and adjourned with certainty that co-operative effort between the United States, Mexico and Canada will characterize the future. Canada has, in fact, followed the conservation policy of the United States very closely. In British Columbia alone 150,000,000 acres of timber lands have been thrown into forest reservations and power rights on the Yukon and its tributaries are granted for only twenty-year terms in order that oppressive monopoly may not result.

John Bull In India.

The unsatisfactory conditions in India are causing investigations to be made into unsatisfactory conditions in the office of the Secretary of State for India. Lord Minto has resigned the office of Viceroy of India for the same reason that Lord Curzon did—that the home office does not trust the man on the ground and continually interferes with or overrules the Viceroy's plans and regulations.

This is coming to be a distinct issue in British politics and it is not impossible that the seat of Indian government may be transferred from London to Calcutta where it naturally belongs.

Liquor Legislation In Indiana.

What, a week ago, looked so promising for rational liquor legislation in Indiana now appears to have degenerated into a general skirmish between Republican and Democratic politicians with the purpose of putting one or the other party at a disadvantage before the voters at home, all real concern for temperance and good order becoming of subordinate interest. That is the way the political mind approaches all subjects and it is as far from the normal, healthful public mind as is the mind of the judicial technical ritualist.

A Wireless Plague.

The development of wireless telegraphy upon the Atlantic coast is being seriously interfered with by amateur telegraphers, mainly sons of rich men who can afford expensive outfits, and for the reason that they keep the air full of chatter that the more important instruments are affected by. It is not impossible that wireless telegraphy may have to be licensed in order to be so regulated as to permit the uninterrupted development of a mechanism of great public value.

Farmers Not Wanted.

The action of Judge Anderson, who is to retry the $29,000,000 case against the Standard Oil company at Chicago, in dismissing the venire of one hundred men summoned as jurors, because 60 per cent. of them were farmers, whereas the proportion of farmers to the total population was infinitesimal, is to be regretted although the judge cannot be blamed. A jury made up mainly of business men of Chicago would be subjected to outside pressure such as could hardly be brought upon a farmer owning his own farm—the most independent citizen in the world. Still, the judge does well to avoid every appearance of bias. There are problems involved in that case even more important than that of merely punishing the Standard Oil.

The Children's Theatre.

The Children's Theatre, which has proven such a success on the East Side in New York, is to be imitated in Boston. Miss Alice Herts of New York took a troupe of fifty children to Boston and gave a dramatization of Mrs. Burnett's "Little Princess," on Washington's birthday just to show the educators of Boston what the children's theatre really is on the concrete form. The plays are not given wholly by children, but by young amateur performers, ranging from twenty to thirty years of age, with children only in children's parts. They are, however, given for children, except on Saturday nights when the parents may come, and are pure, elevating and artistic, and they are put at a price that all can pay. It is the best antidote to the cheap and low "show" that has yet been devised. If Boston approves other cities are likely to.

The Contingent Fee.

While in Sacramento, an effort is making to safeguard the rights of those who are injured by public service corporations by preventing the defendant from submitting entangling interrogatories to juries, in Albany the interests are striving to outlaw the practice of lawyers taking such cases upon the contingent upon success in securing damages. There is no doubt that both practices have been abused and that both need regulation, but if injured persons were not able to secure legal assistance upon contingent fees they often would not be able to secure such services at all and so would, virtually, be deprived of all remedy at law.

The Treasury Deficiency.

There is no little squealing on the part of banking interests throughout the country on account of the withdrawal of public funds deposited in national banks that they may be used for defraying current expenses. The banks seem to feel a sense of injury that money once placed in their custody should ever be taken away from them, but the fact is that Uncle Sam's necessities are becoming severe. A year ago the banks held $221,000,000 of Uncle Sam's surplus. On Wednesday of this week the calls upon them had reduced that sum to $60,000,000 and the likelihood is that it will all be checked out before the tide turns in government income and out-go. It is an issue of more income or smaller appropriations, and the extra session of Congress, to be called March 15th to deal with the tariff, will not be able to get away from it.

What the Railroads Are Doing.

Reports covering 200,000 miles of railroad in the United States show a net average decrease of income over January of a year ago of 3.6 per cent. but an increase of net income of 12.2 per cent., which shows that the railroads are still starving their maintenance in order to maintain their dividends. The Harriman roads are the leaders in this process of squeezing the workers in order to help out the investors. This policy cannot go on a great while longer without putting the roads out of condition to do business for it has been followed since October, 1907. The number of idle cars is steadily, though slowly, diminishing.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grat" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

SELF GOVERNMENT AT OAKLAND

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

(The problem of self-government in America has got to be worked out in our municipalities. The town meetings were the kindergarten of Democracy. Our municipalities must become our common schools of free government, because it is there that people come together in multitudes immediately concerned for interests common to them all. We may liken state governments to high schools of democracy, and municipal government to the university. It is therefore the purpose of The California Weekly, from time to time, to analyze and make clear the status and tendencies of municipal government in California in the hope that each may learn from the other.)

Oakland is one of the best-governed cities in California to-day. This condition dates back only about four years, but the struggle to achieve it began in 1889, when the first blow was struck at the corrupt political forces then in control.

Water Company Center of Corruption.

Political corruption in Oakland centered in the old Contra Costa Water company. That company supplied the city with water; the city council had the power to fix water-rates; hence the company wanted to fix the council. And for years it did.

Allied with water interests, in the political control of Oakland, were the Southern Pacific company, which had its interests in waterfront, street openings, and other franchises to "protect"; and the other public-service corporations—street railways and the like—with their quasi-public functions and interests. So, altogether, these allied interests pooled their political fortunes, and entrusted the direction of the saloon vote and the other mechanism of "gang" rule to the political bureau that had its headquarters in the office of the Contra Costa Water company.

The city government that this bureau supplied was, in general, bad. City taxes were high, but street improvements were not made, parks were not acquired, the city's interests were subordinated to corporate interests in the waterfront litigation, the water rate was nominately high and even when it was reduced, the water company enjoined the enforcement of the rates in the courts and kept the city in a turmoil of expensive litigation.

Leaven of Decency at Work.

During all the years when this state of affairs existed, a body of good citizens kept hammering away for better things. Dr. Pardee, William R. Davis, Arthur H. Breed, and many others fought the battles of civic decency, and gradually their blows began to tell.

The beginning of the end of the ring came when William Dingee organized a rival water company to fight the Contra Costa company. The Contra Costa people declared that they would "drown Dingee in his own water," but he was amply backed with capital, and the result of a bitter fight was that Dingee swallowed the Contra Costa company alive. Dingee was not a reformer—in fact, the company was as bad after he got it as before—but his light on the Contra Costa company cleared the way for reform, by effectually splitting up the compact corrupt organization that had been the political weapon of the "interests." The Dingee management organized a machine even more efficient than that of the old management, but his fight had engendered many internal dissensions, and, at least, had showed that a determined fight could disrupt the ring.

Enter the Realty Syndicate.

At this opportune moment, two events worked for the betterment of political conditions. The Realty Syndicate, composed of broad-gauged business men, men who prefer to get results by honest and businesslike methods, rather than by political manipulation, loomed big in local business affairs. It bought out the water company, it acquired the local traction companies, it built the Key Route. Its business is, primarily, to own vast real estate holdings in Alameda county as an investment against the natural advance in values that must come with a growing population. A good and harmonious city government attracts population. Population increases the value of the Syndicate's property. Ergo, the Syndicate wanted harmony.

If it wanted a franchise, it asked for it on a business basis of fair dealing, and if it could not be got that way, they let it go till it could. This policy soon put an end to grafting in franchises. The Syndicate wouldn't stand for graft—couldn't pay the price of it nor acquire the odium of it.

Water Rates Amicably Adjusted.

The water rates had been the greatest source of public discontent and corruption. Every year the city had spent more than $40,000 in litigation over rates, and the rates had stayed up. When the Syndicate took over the water company, it entered into negotiations with the city council—a good one, by this time, as will appear below—and the council, through B. H. Pendleton (who arranged the details) agreed upon what is called the "Boston plan" of fixing water-rates. By this plan the company is paid a fixed sum annually for water, this sum being estimated as a certain percentage of profit upon an agreed valuation of the company's plant and cost of operation. At the end of the year, if the number of water users has increased, the lump sum received by the company does not increase, but the increased population spreads the burden out thinner and reduces the pro rata rate. By this process the rate has been reduced 30 per cent. in the last few years, and will be reduced 5 per cent. further next year.

This move eliminated the water question from politics, thus removing the greatest source of political corruption. Incidentally, it saves the city that $40,000 a year that it used to spend in litigation.

Auditor Breed's Bombshell.

As noted above, the leaven of good government was always at work in Oakland, but it did not spill out over the edge of the bowl until the administration of Mayor Barstow, about eight years ago. This administration was almost wholly bad. The conspicuous exception was Auditor Arthur H. Breed, who was elected by the young men and the decent element. His work in the auditor's office attracted the attention of the public to the reckless extravagance of the corrupt ring. The council passed numberless appropriation bills in flagrant violation of the law, many of them solely to reward political henchmen. Under the charter, the auditor has large veto powers upon financial legislation, and Mr. Breed held up appropriations totaling more than $200,000. Public curiosity naturally roused to know what was going on that necessitated such extensive drastic action, and the knowledge of the facts coalesced public sentiment upon a demand for a change.

First Reform Administration.

This demand resulted in the election of Warren Olney, Sr., as mayor, and, as councilmen, the best body of public-spirited men the city had had in twenty years. This administration was clean, and stimulated the hope for better things. It was, unfortunately, however, only the formative stage of reform, and its record for actual achievement was consequently small. But with the election of Mayor Mott, four years ago, together with an equally good

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Love's the Oil.

When the old machine is cranky, and it doesn't seem to run;
When your fortune is but pranky, and your living isn't fun;
When you're really up against it, as you mention to a friend,
And your "pile," though you've retrenched it, sadly dwindles to its end;
When your sky is clogged with vapor, and you feel somebody lied
When he mentioned—proper caper—"Silver's on the other side";
When, in short, you're very weary of the bog through which you roam,
Shape your course unto your dearie and the love-light of your home.
For I tell you, man and brother,
Here's a truth, if there's no other:
Love will oil the old machine.

Faith, the way is often dreary, as the best of mortals know,
And our eyes sometimes are teary as we wander to and fro.
Hope has castles time will shatter as we pass upon our way,
And the dream that most would flatter was the dream of yesterday.
Weary? Don't I know it, brother? I, myself, have borne a load,
And full oft must bear another ere the ending of the road;
So let's make the moments cheery, when the stars light up the dome,
As we hasten to our dearie and the love-light of our home.
If the old machine does wobble
As it journeys day and night
Through the swamp or o'er the cobble,
Love's the oil to set it right.

Concerning Greatness.

The more I think about it, Ephraim, the more I don't know what constitutes greatness. There is Bijee, for instance; men say that he is great, and yet I can't help setting an interrogation mark after the assertion.

You see, I knew Bijee twenty or thirty years ago. Perhaps he was great then, but people didn't notice it. At that time he was pulling along on sixteen dollars a week, which sum, although it went farther than it has since the trusts have taken us under their paternal care, did not permit high living.

Who do you suppose was the mainspring in the Bijee machine? It was Mrs. John C. Bijee. She was a little woman, but not too small to be combined cook, scullion, wash-woman, chambermaid, seamstress, nurse and several other things in that household. Oh, I tell you she attended to the lares and penates all right.

John C. Bijee would come home at night tired and discouraged, and say that life was without hope, and then that small embodiment of courage and loyalty, forgetting her own heavy burden of weariness, would start in to brace John C. up, telling him that he was all right and would win out yet. She would keep this up until John C. would swell up and say, "You bet I'm a winner!" and so, many a time when he was ready to surrender, she kept him keyed up to the playing pitch, until, at last, success came.

And now they say that John C. Bijee is a great man. I don't know. Perhaps he is, but I would bet a dollar that Mrs. John C. is a greater.

And if you look closely, Ephraim, you will notice that Bijee is not the only one of his kind.

Rainy-Day Philosophy.

One thing I like to think about
Whenever the storm-cloud lowers:
The rains that beat are bringing out
The grasses and the flowers. —

"Man That Is Born."

Man that is born of woman is of few days, and they are not long enough. Wherefore he prolongeth them into the night, and saith, "What a gay boy am I!" But when he awaketh in the morning thereafter, lo, it is different with his head. In conscious superiority he smileth down upon gentle woman, and it is as if she knew not that she smiled, but, behold, in a day and an hour when he knoweth not she hath the merry ha ha on him. For man prideth himself on his reason, and ere he knoweth he is up against it. But woman journeyeth by the light of intuition, and ever and anon when the man and his reason are out of the running she querieth, "Oho, did I not say so?" And, lo, she did say so. Man taketh shekels unto himself, and he is a "higher-up." He taketh none, and he is a "hobo." He taketh pride unto himself that he is a legislator, and his neighbors cry one unto another, "Behold, he is an Honorable. Let us look unto the goods that we have stored." In the brightness of the day he saith unto his servant, Go, and he goeth, but in the darkness of the night a wailing infant crieth unto him. Walk, and he walketh. He taketh unto him self a wife and voweth to love and protect her, and the last condition of that man is worse than the first, for thenceforth he buttoneeth her dress down the back without ceasing. Wherefore was it written, Man born of woman is of few days and full of trouble, for it is even so.

Forget It.

When you get to seeing double,
Seem to note a sea of trouble
All about you boil and bubble,
Just forget it.
When your daily worries haunt you,
With their phantom faces taunt you,
While their specter strives to daunt you,
Don't you let it.

Don't you let the shades of worry
When confronted pitward scurry
In a goblin rout and flurry?

Then forget it.
Recollect that woe, black-shaded,
That woe of future's pence invaded,
How it dwindled and it faded
When you met it?

Man, of woman born, is better
Than Dame Trouble's toil and fetter;
Worry's but a jade, so let her

Most regret it.
Clear your mind, and dose your liver;
For all blessings thank the Giver,
And if still your heartstrings quiver,
Straight forget it.

The Opinions of Rufus.

I've noticed that some folks that have nothin' to say use the most words in sayin' it.

Some po'try reminds me of a china egg: The plans an' specifications are all right, but ef you try to eat it you can't help noticin' they's suthin' lackin'.

The beauty of some people's judgment is that a feller kin rely moidlin' safe on its bein' wrong, and act accordin'.

Some folks say they're grovlin' sinners in prayer-meetin', an' use up the rest of the week in provin' it's so.

I'd bet a dollar the man who prayed, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are," was so moral that nobody could pint a scornin' finger at him, but you rickollected how the Nazarene sized him up, don't you? Well, the kid ain't all dead yet.

The poet said, "Frailty, thy name is woman." I reckon he didn't have words 'nough left to tell what the name of man is.

It's gratifyin' to reflect that the old theory that relegation shud be kep' in an' not used to guard 'gainst 'ternal fire hes sorter frozen itself out.

It's middlin' easy to be so long on theology that you don't have no room left fer relegation. I don't know how deep human sympathy goes, but I've saw lots of it that never gits es ter down as the pocket where our purse is kept.

"C. Q. D."

"Interested" wishes to know the literal meaning of the letters, "C. Q. D." which have been used so freely in press dispatches recently.

I do not know, nor can I say,
For I am much benighted,
But when a bride upon the seas
Would send a message home to please,
I think they mean such words as these:
Cora's Quite Delighted.

But when the ship rocks, to and fro,
To fease a hardened sinner,
And passengers hang o'er the rail,
With interesting faces pale,
No doubt the words tell this brief tale:
Cannot Quiet Dinner.

And when the steward goes around,
With labeled coat or collar,
While dreadful breakers rock and swell,
To tell disabled they'll get well,
I do not doubt the letters tell:
Captured Quickly Dolar.

May Be Something In Dreams.

"I dreamed that she was killed in a railway collision, and went straight to the nearby gate."
"Yep."
"But they wouldn't let her pass."
"Nope?"

No, she was wearing one of those hipless gowns, and the watchman wouldn't believe she was a woman.

An Apparent Exception.

Professor of Physics—It cannot be proved that something is nothing, or that nothing is something. To this rule there are no exceptions, and—What is it, Mr. Thotfulle?

Mr. Thotfulle—Well, I was just wondering how you would account for the State Railroad Commission.

A Gold-Saving Machine.

A gold-saving machine of an original pattern and with the promise of a high rate of efficiency is to make its debut in Nevada City within a few days. It is altogether of Nevada county material and the product of local brains. Grass Valley Union.

I do not know the plan of it, I do not know its style,

But having played the money fool for quite a weary while,

I feel that I've a lesson learned, though somewhat late in life,

Concerning how to save the gold I gather in the strife,

And I've a dollar I would bet Nevada City's plan

Can't beat the game that I have learned while playing "also ran."

Oh, men may make machines galore the yellow stuff to fix,

But of all schemes for saving gold the best is—save your nickels.

There Are Others.

"Bings is afraid that he may be prosecuted for polygamy."

"Why, he is married to only one person, ain't he?"

"That is what he thought for a while, but now it appears that he married her whole family, and there are seven of them."

What Decided the Heirs.

"The heirs finally decided not to contest old Bluffaire's will."

"What was the ground for their decision?"

"Knowing the old fellow's disposition while he was in the flesh, they decided to take no chances with his ghost."

make real love matches, just like American girls; but, usually, the racial instinct seems born within them to leave their match-making to their parents. As I am their mother, under the law, they look to me, and so I have made dozens of matches and have dozens of sons-in-law scattered throughout the country. And so far I have not had to regret the choices I have made for them.

"A few of the girls are preparing for 'careers.' One has decided musical talent and a distinguished music teacher is fitting her to be an assistant in a conservatory in Shanghai. Another will be a missionary in China.

"But they are very much like other girls. They chatter and joke about the kind of husband they would like, or declaim dramatically of the mighty things they hope to do or be. And they are characteristically feminine in their dislike of coarse work. They would rather sew at day than scrub their rooms half an hour."

But they are happy. It takes only a few minutes' walk through the Home to see that the Mission's work of rescuing these girls from slavery has lit the light of gratitude in all their eyes, and that they all, who were friendless, have found in Miss Cameron a friend.

A LINCOLN STORY.

One day a ragged little urchin was standing on the street longingly eyeing some oranges which were on a fruit stand near by.

A tall man with long legs, loose clothes and a frowning, wrinkled face came striding toward him. His eyes were apparently on the pavement, and he looked cross and out of sorts, as he took long strides, making his coat-tails flap about his legs.

The man suddenly stopped in front of the fruit stand, and, diving his hand in his pocket for some money, he brought a big orange, gave it to the boy and went on his way.

The boy grinned at sight of the fruit and was about to eat it when a bystander told him that the giver was President Lincoln. The boy ran after the President and caught the flapping coat-tails, and as the stern father turned sharply he called, "Thank you, Mr. President Lincoln."

Suddenly the face was transformed, and a beautiful smile covered it. In a thrilling voice the President answered:

"You're welcome, boy. You wanted to steal it while the fellow wasn't looking, didn't you? But you wouldn't because it wasn't honest. That's the right way."

The discharging of human freight from the ferry boats is a slow, tedious, corn-tramping and heel-hitting process. A little wholesome military or school discipline would cut the time in half, prevent disorder and reduce pig-gish propensities to a nullity. If some master of ceremonies were to mount a pedestal and call out in a clear voice: "Fall in, fall in, four abreast, hay-foot, straw-foot, hep, hep, hep," the commuters would learn it in two days, the whole train-bay public in a week, and two or three minutes could be knocked off the schedule time for making trips.

"Within the last two years," complained a commuter to his friend, "I have lent seven hundred dollars to seven friends, merely on their I. O. U.'s, and it begins to look as though I had lost friends and money both. They all avoid me; when brought face to face with one or two of them they have dunned themselves in a sniveling, sheepish way that bodes evil, and the others have a far-away look in their eyes whenever they see me. I can ill-afford to lose the money, but I can less well afford to lose my friends, and I have made up my mind that, if I ever lend any more money, it will be upon approved security." Complainant has been keeping bad company.

A young man just starting in life applied to a bank for a loan of $100, explaining the reasons why the loan was wanted and the certainty of being able to pay it back, at the same time offering a good name as endorser for his note. The banker heard him patiently and then said: "I'll let you have this money if you say so, but it will only be a convenience to you and not a necessity, for you can get along without it. My business experience teaches me that more good men go to the wall by putting their names upon other men's paper than for any other reason. If you never ask such a favor you need never grant it. My advice is never to ask." His advice was taken and, during nearly thirty years, this would-be borrower has not had to pay another man's debt. That prudent banker got his start in life by playing draw poker.

The Berkeley Club recently celebrated the thirty-sixth year of its existence and, at the same time, paid heartfelt tribute to the memory of Daniel Coit Gilman, who organized the club during his presidency of the University of California. Of the seventeen charter members of the club only Rev. J. K. McLean is living. The club now has about forty members, meets fortnightly at the Faculty Club building in Berkeley, dines together, listens to a paper prepared by one of its members, vivisects it without qualms in rotation around the room, starts for home before ten o'clock feeling that it is good to be alive and to take a lively, if not a performing, interest in what is going on in the world or in what has survived the vicissitudes of forgetfulness to our time.

The California Wine Association is able clearly to perceive the effect upon its commodity of the return to Italy of the sons of that much-shaken land since the great earthquake. This affords some idea of the extent of the exodus and signifies who the wine-bibbers are. As for Americans, they sell their wine and buy beer.

The eyes of the writer have just been focused upon a San Francisco chimney, not different from many a thousand others. Up from it ascends a column of smoke as black as soot can make it and, underneath, the air is snowy with smudge flakes to fall upon everything, to be breathed into the lungs, to turnish everybody inside and out. If that chimney were one-half taller, if the grate or oil burner were adjusted properly and the firing done with skill, those myriad flying particles would be conserved and consumed and (when there is a sun) San Francisco would be bathed in sunlight instead of lamplack. San Francisco, and the other bay cities, have been strangely unconcerned for the smoke nuisance.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Our Gory Senators The final debate in the state Senate upon the primary law bill was, to use a phrase once employed by Thomas Jefferson to describe an acrimonious discussion in the early days of Congress, "most bloody." Senators Wolfe and Leavitt, leading opponents to the measure, furnished most of the gore, although Willis and others were as savage as they knew how to be. According to Leavitt, it was the Republican party which was called upon to shed its life-blood, for he could not see how there would be any party after the adoption of such an atrocious mug-wump measure, while the blood which Mr. Wolfe was burning to shed was that of his newspaper critics, whom he smote hip and thigh. But he did not go so far as Senator Savage had gone a few days before when he issued a formal challenge to two or three of the Los Angeles editors to meet him with any kind of weapons, carving knives preferred.

Cutten to Rescue of Primary The one unexpected and most telling incident of the debate was supplied by Cutten, the clever young anti-organization senator from Humboldt county. It was simple but effective. The organization planned to substitute for a genuine direct primary a combination of direct nomination vote and party convention, so arranged that whenever the organization desired to throw the nomination into a delegate convention it could do so by getting into the field a sufficient number of candidates to split the popular vote and so prevent any candidate from receiving the legal percentage of the total vote, whereupon it would be necessary to resort to a convention, the delegates to which were, under the plan proposed, always to be elected when a direct primary was held.

"Organization" Law Unconstitutional What Cutten did was to call attention to the form of the constitutional amendment adopted last fall, which read: "The legislature shall enact laws providing for the direct nomination of candidates for public officers, by electors, political parties, or organizations of electors without conventions, at elections to be known and designated as primary elections." The constitution also empowers the legislature to enact laws for nominations by party conventions, but Cutten had no difficulty in showing that this particular provision means straight direct primary nominations, and that to couple up with direct-vote nominations a system of convention nominations, intertwining the two as closely as this scheme contemplated, would almost certainly be to render the whole law unconstitutional and therefore impracticable. What replies to Cutten were attempted were without force, and the bill passed the Senate by the vote of twenty-seven to thirteen.

Primary Law Saved Such an overwhelming majority in the Senate is expected to insure its passage in the Assembly, and it does not seem that the hard fight which will probably be put up by the railroad group can avail them anything. As it went through the Senate the bill was substantially in the form in which Senator Wright introduced it, which means the form in which it left the hands of the drafting committee appointed by the Direct Primary League of California. The features relative to the election of United States Senators are unmodified, although there is a quite general misunderstanding to the effect that this is not so. The misunderstanding is due to the contradictory reports which have been printed concerning the intentions of the reformers and the performers in regard to the bill.

Changing County Officers' Pay Forty-one out of the fifty-eight counties of the state have bills relating to fees and salaries of their officers on the way through the legislature. In 1901 fifty-two counties—all but five of the counties then existing—had legislation of this kind. In 1903 there was a partial cessation of the sort of law-making, and only sixteen counties had their salary schedules changed; but in 1905 bills passed affecting forty-four counties. In 1907 the whole county government act was codified, and it is impossible to say exactly how many counties changed the rates of compensation of their officers. But there are some counties which have not missed a session for many years in getting their schedules changed, generally in the direction of allowing more officers, or more deputies or higher pay.

Legislation A Farce Of course, pretty frequent changes in these matters are necessary, but such legislation is a great bother to the legislature, and, withal, it is a good deal of a farce, since it does not represent the judgment of the legislature at all. Each county delegation is left to fix its county government schedule to suit itself, and neither the majority of the members nor the governor would think of interfering with this prerogative. And usually the home delegation does about what the county officers ask for, so that it amounts to the county officers' legislating for themselves.

Counties Should Fix Salaries It is a wonder that the people do not take this business entirely into their own hands by having each county frame and modify its own county charter for all such things as the number and compensation of officers. But the greatest wonder in this connection is that several years ago the people had before them a constitutional amendment of this kind and voted it down—probably through sheer failure to comprehend what it was all about, so that the opportunity which once knocked at the people's door may not return.

An Honest School Census An attempt is to be made to get honest school censuses by requiring census marshals to obtain the signatures of parents or guardians to the enrollment blanks, this being provided for by a bill introduced by Assemblyman Sackett. Those who know say that the amount of "stuffing" which has been done in the taking of school censuses in California is almost past belief. It has gone so far as seriously to affect the distribution of the state school moneys, giving some counties and cities more than they were entitled to and others less. A few glaring cases of fraud have been exposed, but in the vast majority of cases there has been no exposure, though school superintendents and trustees have been pretty well aware of the facts. Of course, in most instances the census marshals were not officially instructed to stuff but did so either because they were very much per name, or because they thought they would render themselves unpopular with their employers if they failed to show a considerable increase from year to year.

State Pension System Coming? We may have a state pension system before we know it, as the bill to provide pensions to state hospital employees after twenty-one years of service has been passed by the Assembly and is now with the Senate. It is strongly suggestive of the way in which some things are done by the legislature that this bill, which is a financial measure of the first importance, was referred only to the Committee on State Hospitals and did not go to the Ways and Means committee, the responsible financial committee. Other bills, almost or quite as important in the ultimate pecuniary consequences which they will have been disposed of in the same careless way. Thus are the foundations laid for heavy burdens for posterity to carry, and even for this generation in years not far ahead of us.

Lots of New Laws Some thirty Assembly bills and over sixty Senate bills have passed both houses and are going to the governor. To that, however, he has not exercised his veto power at this session. It looks as though the statute book, which has been growing steadily, will be large again this time. Not only is the number of bills in excess of any previous session, but both houses show inclinations toward industry which portend the passage of most of the measures which have been introduced—provided they are not voted down—leaving less than the usual number to share the fate of those of whom it is recorded that they "died on the files."

Junkets at $5,000 Per Over The disposition to appoint hold-over committees, usually consisting of members of both houses, to sit between sessions and investigate one thing or another supposed to be of interest to the state, is growing by what it feeds on—literally so, because it feeds on public moneys. Each one of these committees is authorized to spend money for "necessary expenses," and usually the term is liberally construed. Five thousand dollars is the amount most often set aside, and when that sum is judiciously applied in working up a new banking law, the money may not be misspent. But what shall be said of a resolution like that which passed the Assembly the other day to authorize a hold-over committee which shall consider and report on the subject of the division of the state into game districts, and spend $5,000 in performing this arduous labor?

City Advantages Not Cheap It has perhaps been a misfortune that township governments have never been organized in California, in view of the number of measures at recent sessions to create sanitary districts, boulevard districts, library districts, lighting districts, fire protection and various other districts. These are all attempts to exercise municipal functions without being burdened with municipal governments. It is a deceptive theory that all the municipal improvements and facilities may be enjoyed, or come any cheaper, without incorporating. Several sanitary and high school districts can testify that their rates of taxation are equal to, if not in excess of, those of the adjacent cities which they have kept out of in the belief that they would find it more economical to do so.

Trouble For Tax Amendment The revised taxation amendment to the constitution has been before senate and assembly committees almost a year since the session began. It is doubtful if this measure will be re-submitted to the voters. Or, if submitted, it may be in such shape that the people will be more reluctant than before to adopt it. The interests want to fix the amendment up so as to make it as light as possible for them.

Hungry For Local Sops When the state takes on itself what should be a local burden it always hears from it in new demands. Some years ago Stockton found itself in danger of floods from the overflowing of certain streams and channels in time of high water. To protect a navigable channel under the control of the federal government, that government consented to construct a diverting channel, if Stockton would give the land. But the city thought it might as well work the state for the purchase price of the land, and it succeeded in doing so. Now Stockton has decided that it needs a system of levees, and is calling on the "east" state to build them. Assemblyman Beardslee has introduced a bill appropriating $700,000 for the purpose. This makes Sacramento and other cities which have built their own levees at vast expense sit up and take notice.

Health Insurance.

Health Commissioner Evans, of Chicago, is striving to educate the people of that city in ways of self preservation against those epidemics of la grippe, pneumonia and tuberculosis, which assail that city at the breaking up of winter. We have been having a wet time of it and the same preventives so efficacious there might be employed with advantage here. They are, moderation in eating and drinking, reasonable exercise in the open air, ventilation of the houses and offices, avoidance of over-heated places and of excessively heavy clothing. They cost nothing but if generally observed would almost insure against epidemics of all kinds.

council, the better element was in a condition of practical relations with politics that enabled it to accomplish many needed public improvements. Mayor Mott has proved to be a great harmonizer of discordant elements; he is sound morally, while being also a skillful politician. As a result, every bond issue he has proposed has been voted by the people. Street improvements have been made, the police and fire protection increased, the sewer system greatly extended, and parks acquired. There has been a careful expenditure of the money from these bonds, and general public satisfaction with the results achieved. Much of the credit for these results is due to the city attorney and the city engineer, who, with the mayor, constitute the board of public works.

Thus Oakland has achieved a sound state of moral health in politics. Graft is eliminated. Public works are being extended. The situation is one of great encouragement for those who believe that the American people are able to solve the problem of democracy in the cities.

In a later article, the issues of the approaching municipal election in Oakland will be explained, and the subject of the water-front negotiations and their satisfactory condition to date will be elaborated.

THE CAPITOL THAT WAS NOT REMOVED

By A. B. NYE.

The state capitol building, of which California has always been proud, has been modernized and largely reconstructed but not exactly rebuilt. Most of the work has affected only the interior. The exterior lines have been little changed. The statuary which used to be such a conspicuous adornment of the roof has nearly all disappeared, and is a good loss; the roof has been raised a few feet to permit a fourth story to be built in, but this did not necessitate a change great enough seriously to interfere with the architectural effect. One noticeable exterior alteration is the cutting of a row of small windows in the frieze to give light in the new fourth floor rooms, but while this was by no means an improvement, architecturally viewed, it detracts from the appearance of the building rather less than might have been expected. On the eastern front there has been an alteration which has been a detriment and for which not as good an excuse can be offered; the large windows at one end of the Senate and Assembly chambers have been bricked up, and while they were of no value for lighting purposes, being always closely curtained when the legislature was in session, the outside view now gives the same painful effect as the dull and sightless orbs of a blind man.

It is well that the graceful lines of the capitol have not been materially altered and that it still remains, after more than forty years, California's most beautiful public building. It is something like a miracle that in the earliest '60s, when things in California were still crude, a local architect was found who could design this building and a commission, legislature and governor who would let him greet it. Reuben Clark, when he was chosen as the man fitted to execute this work, was regarded as the most promising young architect in San Francisco, and tradition says that he was not anxious to undertake the task, which compelled him to abandon his general practice; if he had forebodings, they were more than justified, because he did not live to see the completion of the work, and, to quote again from local tradition, which in this instance may or may not be correct, he was so harassed by the delays and vexations of official action that he lost his reason before he died. Nevertheless, Reuben Clark left behind him a splendid monument and a claim to the gratitude of patriotic Californians.

It required ten years and approximately $2,000,000 to build the state capitol, and even then it was left, as most public buildings are in the first instance, far from completed when it was occupied; various improvements have been made from time to time, and with the latest and most extensive overhauling, the pile now represents a total outlay of three millions. At the legislative session of 1905 there was appropriated for the work $352,000; in 1907 there was added $20,000; and as these lines are written the legislature is in the act of appropriating $75,000 more for furnishings and equipment.

Those first two millions came hard, for California in those days was not only relatively poor, but during a portion of the time the capitol was building was carrying her share of the burden of a great civil war and was also straining her resources to assist in constructing the first transcontinental railroad. In that period state taxes went three times as high as they are to-day. But when finished the capitol stood a monument to honesty as well as genius, for it did not contain a foot of unsound brick work or a pound of poor cement. We can congratulate ourselves that the reconstruction accomplished with the appropriation of 1905 was similarly honest; there again the state received its money's worth, or perhaps a little more, for the contracts had been let just before the San Francisco earthquake and fire, and the contractors, after the great rise in prices, made no money, and in some instances suffered considerable losses.

But we are still waiting at the door and it slowly lifted those who would trust themselves to it to the upper stories; two electric elevators have now been installed, and beside them, much after the fashion of a modern office building, the new stairways ascend. In fact, it is the complaint of persons who disapprove of the way in which the capitol has been overhauled that it is now a compromise between a city office building and an old-style capitol building.

But perhaps this is giving too much importance to the few criticisms which have been made. The fact is that a general overhauling of the building was a necessity, for it was neither sanitary, comfortable nor safe; the plumbing and heating systems were wretched, and, as was found when the old roof was removed, the ends of the large timbers by which it was supported had rotted away and before many years it would have fallen. Steel trusses and beams have been put in; steam heat and modern plumbing have been installed; light has been admitted to the basement rooms, which are now available for use for the first time; and thirty-eight additional rooms have been made; this is equivalent to an addition of about 30 per cent to the accommodations of the building. For the first time there are rooms specially devised for use by committees of the legislature. In short, the capitol has been greatly improved as a place in which to transact the state's business, and it is not extravagant to expect better legislation and administration.

In the Senate and Assembly chambers the changes have been extensive and in the direction of improvement. By lowering the ceilings a few feet the acoustic properties have been slightly improved without any sacrifice of appearance; the galleries have been remodeled, and although the effect of this is to make the chambers look smaller, the gains are greater than the losses.

The next serious problem in connection with the capitol is going to be what to do with the rapidly growing state library. In the recent reconstruction it has been provided with a considerable increase of room, at some sacrifice of convenience, but within the next ten years it is going to demand such improvement in its accommodations as can only be afforded by the construction of a special building for its uses.

"Peter Adams."

When Charles Frohman asked Barrie to make a play of "The Little Minister," Barrie refused. Some days later, however, he dropped into Frohman's office, and said, "I'll make a play of the little story if you'll give me the little woman I saw act at the Empire last night." The "little woman" was Maude Adams, for whom nearly all of Barrie's plays have been written. While he was writing "Peter Pan" he always spoke of that character as "Peter Adams."

THE CAPITOL AS IT APPEARS TO-DAY.

is time to enter and observe the interior changes. The entrance is certainly less impressive. The broad doors which stood always open have disappeared, and there is a revolving door in which one must turn like a squirrel in a cage. Yet this is practical and utilitarian, for now the halls and corridors are kept at a comfortable temperature in winter, when they used to be swept by pneumonia-breeding draughts. But the two grand stairways at right and left of the entrance have been abolished, and this is where the reconstruction most rates on sentiment. Every citizen of Sacramento was proud of those stately stairways with their massive carved newels, and it was a violent wrench to their feelings when this grandeur was sacrificed to provide the much needed additional office room. The new vestibule is handsome in construction and material, the latter being limestone with large panels of rich onyx, but it is hardly consistent with the rest of the interior, though it will look more in keeping when the walls of the corridors have been coated with marble; the reconstruction stopped before that point was reached because the money gave out.

In old times there was a stairway, a little less grand than the two stairways at the main entrance, at either end of the main corridor; these, too, have disappeared and their place has been taken by offices. Also, in old times there was a single creaky elevator which

THE GRAFT CASES

A week makes but slight difference in the drama entitled, "What Shall We Do With Calhoun?" which now is being played in San Francisco. The minor actors and supernumeraries, represented by an ever-lengthening procession of talemens, shift, but the star actor and his leading support do not vary either in person or character. Something like two-thirds of the talemens are excused for cause, and after the remaining third is run through the mill of legal examination, little or nothing remains of it. An occasional detective, going about his work of attempting to ascertain the sentiments of prospective jurors, is heard from. Opposing attorneys squabble and say unkind things of one another, and his honor sits there, with something approaching infinite patience, and listens to it all.

Except that James Granville, a retired machinist, has been passed, nothing definite has been gained in the Calhoun case since the last publication of this journal. Eleven prospective jurors have been found, another must be secured, and peremptory challenges will reduce the total number to an unguessable extent, after which the present wearisome work must be resumed. As about a thousand talemens already have been summoned, and as the end is by no means in sight, it is possible that the record of delay made in the Ruef case last fall may be exceeded.

The verdict finding former-Superior Michael W. Coffey guilty of accepting a bribe of $4,000 to vote for the overhead-trolley franchise, was found in thirty-five minutes, after three ballots had been taken, the first two resulting in eleven votes for conviction to one for acquittal. Judge Dunne announced that sentence would be pronounced February 27th.

Coffey's attorneys have announced that the case will be appealed, and so delay before prison doors close upon him may be anticipated. Coffey, whose vocation is that of sack-driver, is a poor man, and it may be presumed that the delay will not be extended indefinitely.

Last Tuesday Judge Murasky named March 15th as the time for the beginning of the trial of Adolph S. Newburgh charged with attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case. District Attorney Langdon announced that he wished the case tried as soon as possible.

Now comes the grand jury at Stockton and takes its part in the general graft situation by filing charges against City Councilman W. T. Shepard, Chief of Police Frank B. Briare, Captain of Police John Craig and Policemen Michael Carroll and John Garou. Shepard is charged with accepting a twenty-dollar bribe, while the policemen various grades are alleged to have accepted "gifts" from dive-keepers, etc. It is asserted that if the policemen resign their positions they will not be prosecuted.

"The Spell."

By William Dana Orcutt.

An interesting novella. Its plot is admirably complicated and it holds the reader's attention to the end. But the story is marred by being based wholly upon the improbable hypothesis that a red-blooded man would practically desert his bride in the sixth week of their honeymoon in order to indulge in an intellectual play of study in a Florentine library. The improbability, together with dialogue such as was never heard even in Boston, the home of the hero and heroine, weakens what is otherwise a very well written, if not too absorbing, story. The characters are a bride and groom; the familiar "toilet woman," with a permanent and dark hair; a little old millionaire uncle, who messes matters while he messes benignity; an old flame of the deserted heroine who looks as if he might live things up (but doesn't); a gossiping lady friend (an Italian countess from Milwaukee, in this case); and an old librarian who acts as the peace-maker in the reconciliation. A curious mixture of good plot and improbable characters. Harper & Brothers, New York, $1.50.

FROM OUR READERS.

Editor, The California Weekly:

Will you permit me to correct one or two mistakes in a recent issue of your estimable weekly under the heading of "Will bring us good citizens?"

First: If the proposed alien bill, to which you refer, becomes a state law it will have but little effect upon the question of British aliens holding real estate, under the existing international treaties. Apart from that, California can use all the capital available, in developing her wonderful resources, and we cannot yet afford to prevent the investment of any capital, for legitimate purposes, even though it be "alien" money.

Second: You state that the English are the slowest to become naturalized Americans. This, like so many other statements made by the public press about the English people in particular, is entirely incorrect. In San Francisco there are, approximately, 6,000 "naturalized" British, and the great majority of them vote (usually but once, however) for clean and honest administrations. At the time of the great fire the Italian vote was about 600, whilst the total number of British and Italian residents were nearly the same. London has nearly 7,000 permanent American residents, and only 120 have become naturalized Britishers. It must also be remembered that in San Francisco, as in most other large commercial centers, there are thousands of representatives and employees of British corporations and financial institutions who are sent out here by their employers for a specific purpose, and not with the idea of becoming settlers, or even permanent residents.

Third: You may be interested to know that in 1906, in Alameda county, the British born vote was larger than the vote of all other alien nationalities put together. Their vote also, throughout the entire country in November last helped materially in piling up a majority for President Roosevelt's successor. It has been estimated that there are now about 140,000 British born permanent residents in California, the number of males of mature age being probably 60,000, of whom about 35,000 are American voters by "choice," but it has yet to be ascertained that there is a political "boss" among this entire number, and whilst it is true that they do not "blow their horn" or "boreen" effusively, they do their duty at the polls just the same. That these 35,000 British voters exercise a great influence in the community, goes without saying. If, however, the English were public office seekers they would do the same as some other aliens do, and stay in some state where they could be naturalized in "six months" or sooner. The average Englishman is not a notorious office seeker, nor political job chaser, but a law-abiding, home-loving citizen, and although he has perhaps not as much to gain in becoming a citizen as some other nationalities, still, statistics will show that Englishmen are not as slow to become naturalized as is generally supposed. Further, he can, if necessary, turn up his "sleeves," as well as his pants, and either fight or work, as occasion demands; and it is these very qualities, omitting entirely the question of nationality, that has done so much toward the building up of our California industries and of San Francisco in particular.

I enclose my card, and remain,

Yours truly,

"The Missioner."

In "The Missioner," E. Phillips Oppenheim has written a delightful piece of light fiction, in which the plot moves swiftly to an effective climax and a happy ending—the whole so deftly told that its improbabilities are forgiven and forgotten, and the reader's eagerness to follow the story to the end. The scene is in England, and most of the characters are from "high life," but the book is refreshingly free from snobishness. The book does not "point a moral," and is, for that reason, perhaps, more "interesting" as a story than most of our recent dissections of morbidity in the guise of fiction.

OH Ray! Oh Ray!" The wind rushed so swiftly up the canyon and whistled so shrilly under the wide spreading eaves of the little station at Hartwell that the agent had to call a number of times before he could make himself heard. "Well, what is it Bob?" answered Raymond Harper, who had been tugging some heavy sacks of wool into order at the farther end of the warehouse.

"Here is a pretty picnicking for our birthday, old fellow," his brother replied. "I am dreadfully sorry for mother, she had such a fine supper getting for us and just as likely as not we will not be able to eat it until along towards midnight. The line has gone down somewhere up on the mountain and the superintendent wants us to go up anywhere and find where the trouble is. Get out the velocipede and I'll run over and tell mother. It is getting dark already and we must be off."

"When the Caller calls, a fellow has got to go, you know."

When Robert returned his brother had the velocipede on the track and all the equipment needed and the two brothers at once set off up the railroad with all the expedition possible. The pace was a good one, too, for the wind was blowing a gale at their backs, so helping them and, besides, there was not a man on the division who could pump a railroad velocipede with Raymond Harper, and yet Ray was barely out of his teens and at work upon the road only during vacation times.

As Ray plied the lever Robert, sitting behind him watching the telegraph poles as they glided by them, in order to find where the trouble was when they should come upon it, could not help feeling proud of the manly proportions of his big-bodied, stout-limbed brother working away as easily and apparently as tirelessly as the machine itself. He often fell to wondering why, he chanced to hear one day than Ray, and for as many years the bread-winner for the family, should be so slender and poorly in health while Ray should never have known an ache or a pain and be hardly appreciative of his superabundant health and strength.

But Ray had always been a good boy and willing enough to help during vacations from school. Another year at the university and he would be a civil engineer with a place awaiting him in the employ of the company under the kindly eye of Mr. Armitage, the resident engineer. After that Ray could support mother and, well, Mary would not have to wait for him any longer. It was a wonder how patiently the girl had waited for him almost ever since he came to town, although there was no lack of other suitors, but it was so expensive sending Ray through college that Robert could not think of marrying until Ray was equipped for the duties of life. And Mary, too, was to have taken supper with them. She always had on that evening in the year, for the double birthday was a commemorable event in the little family. Anyhow Mary would be over to stay with mother until their return. There was comfort in that thought for she would be cheerful and not let mother worry.

So they rushed on long, Ray pulling hard but steadily at the lever and Robert scanning the telegraph poles as best he could through the thickening darkness, but his eyes were keen and he noted every one. Sometimes he had to get off the machine and dash through the wet bushes where the line left the track to make a cut-off across a curve, Ray picking him up as he came around on the velocipede. And when they crossed the high trestle that spanned the canyon and valley the poles and wires were right underneath so high was the trestle, and it was a long one, too, as well as high.

"Did it not make you feel sort of shaky, Ray, going over that trestle in the wind and darkness?" inquired Robert.

"It would be an ugly place to meet a train, that is sure, but the truth is my mind was so occupied that I was not thinking of the trestle at all."

"What were you thinking about, Ray?"

"Oh, I was thinking what a load I have been to you all these years that I have been to school and how sort of selfish it will be for me to go on another year, making you and Mary defer your happiness just for my sake."

"We shall not be deferring our happiness, Ray, not at all. We see each other a good deal as it is and Mary is as proud and hopeful of you as I am. But there! I am glad we have gotten off that trestle. I felt nervous about it all the way over. Those rocks down there would be so hard and cruel and the wind blew so that it almost took us off, machine and all."

"But when the Caller calls a fellow has got to go you know," said Ray. It was a saying that the men had who run over the mountain. "It is just the sort of night for the Caller to be out and I hope the train boys will not have a hard time of it to-night. The roadbed must be soft as mush after all this rain and it will be dark as pitch in the heavy timber. Wasn't it a good deal such a night as this, Bob, that father's engine went over the grade?" It seems to me that it was, but the horror of his death came upon us so crushingly that I hardly remember any of the incidental circumstances."

"Yes, it was a good deal such a night and the wind blew a hurricane through the pass, as it is doubtless raining now," replied Robert. "It is a hard life the train men lead and I wonder at their living it as heedlessly as they do. Perhaps it would make them cowards if they lived otherwise, but take that saying of theirs that, 'When the Caller calls a fellow has got to go.' With them it is little more than a 'josh' that has grown out of having a caller go around at division headquarters to wake the men when it is time for them to go out with their trains and they say it without much regard to the deeper significance which they have superstitiously given it, but as for me, while I do not especially fear the visit of the angel of death I never see a train start up the mountain on a night like this, or hear an order going over the wire for one to start down, that I do not experience a sinking of the heart."

"Are there any trains likely to come down while we are out, Bob?"

"No, twenty was two hours late at Packards, the last place we heard from her when the wires went down, and there is nothing betwixt her and the Summit but the work train and that will be needed on the other side until the storm is over. From the other way nothing will be allowed to pass Hartwell until we get the line open and twenty gets down the mountain, so we are all right."

"Glad that that," remarked Ray. "I'd hate to knock a train off a grade with this velocipede," he laughingly added.

"A little later the searching eye of Robert Harper missed a telegraph pole and the machine was brought to a standstill. A slide had occurred, but it was below the track this time and it had carried away a telegraph pole and grounded all the wires. The earth was cleared away, the pole righted sufficiently to leave the wires clear of the ground and strongly braced with some old ties Ray found by the side of the track and, after an hour's hard work the men were ready to start for home. Then the lantern went out. Somehow Ray had forgotten to notice if it needed filling in the hurry of starting out and there was nothing for it but to pump their way back in the teeth of the wind and rain in the darkness, though it was down grade all the way, which would help them."

"There must be a 'hoodoo' on for sure tonight," said Ray, as he took his seat on the velocipede and bent himself to the lever. "If that Caller is not out for us he will catch some poor tramp or trackwalker that we will knock over going down in the darkness. How I could have forgotten to look to the oil in the tank of all nights is more than I can comprehend."

"Yes, that night of all nights! How everything does seem, after the event is over, to have conspired, from the beginning of all things, to the culmination of that particular event!"

"R-r-ring!" went the telephone in the little cupboard of an office at the round house just over the summit.

"Hello! Well, what is it?" replied the foreman, placing his ear to the receiver.

"The line is working again and here are orders," returned the operator at the station. "Send Nat Adams with 227 down the mountain at once. The superintendent wants him to go ahead of twenty and reach Hartwell as soon as possible and report so, as not to delay her here. I'll hand him the orders as he goes by."

"Just my luck!" exclaimed Engineer Adams as he began to draw on the overalls he had taken off preparatory to going to supper, for he had only just pulled the work train onto the siding and put the locomotive into the stall for the night. "I half expected something of the kind and I am hungrier than a bear, but when the Caller calls, a fellow has got to go, you know." Hey there, Johnson!" the engineer called to his fireman, who was just stepping from the cab. "Give me plenty of coal and back her out. We've got to go down the mountain ahead of twenty."

In a few moments the great ten-wheeler was moving past the station with half a dozen flatcars lumbering after it with brakes set to give the engine the steadiness as it plunged down the mountain grade.

"It is an ugly ride we are to have, Mr. Adams," the fireman remarked as he threw open the furnace door, sending a lurid flash athwart the bending pines and into the roaring canyons, while thrusting in a shovelful of coal.

"It cal." "We'll take supper with Abraham to-night if there's a washout along the grade anywhere."

"Don't like it any too well myself," replied the engineer, "but when the Caller calls, a fellow has got to go, you know."

"The Caller is out to-night all right," returned the fireman as he threw in another shovelful of coal, "and if he don't get us it will be because there is somebody else more full of luck than I am. There is seldom a night like this that he does not pick up somebody on the division and generally on the mountain."

"You ain't afraid, are you?" demanded the engineer with rising warmth.

"Perhaps I am and perhaps I am not, but anyhow I am hungrier than a grizzly and will make the grub suffer if we ever do get to Hartwell."

"The superintendent was onto his job tonight," declared the engineer, "when he ordered me to take the train down the mountain. Better us two than ten coaches full of passengers who are not paid for taking chances on their lives as we are."

"Jewhiz! What was that?" cried the fireman staggering to his feet amid a shower of broken glass and flying splinters.

There had been a lurch, a crash and a swaying of some of the machinery on top of the locomotive, but she had kept the track and went rushing ahead.

"We jarred a small tree loose and it fell right across the headlight, swung around and pitched clean over the boiler and down the bank," replied the engineer, "and I reckon I have smashed things good. There is no headlight is out. I wish you would take the lantern and go forward, Johnson, and see what the wreckage is."

The fireman did as he was bidden and soon returned, reporting that the headlight was gone, the smokestack stove in, the boiler mashed flat on top of the boiler and that the whistle had disappeared entirely, besides crashing in a corner of the cab, but everything else seemed to be working all right.

"It is not to my taste to go down this mountain like a blind demon in the darkness, but I guess there is nothing else for it,” said the engineer. “Won’t you just tie that lantern up in the far corner of the cab, Johnson? It may be better than no headlight at all.”

“Strange,” said it,” remarked the fireman, “but that blamed tree had to fall to-night of all nights, and not a second sooner or a second later but just when we were ready at hand to have it smash the mischief out of old 227. It has been standing there on the point for ten years getting ready to fall all the time.”

“Slightly lucky thing for you and me,” returned the engineer, “that it fell just as it did. If it had been a second sooner in falling most likely you and I would by now be at the foot of the point with old 227 on top of us, and if it had waited until we had gone by, and then fallen, who knows but what it would then fall on twenty up in the bottom of the gulch, locomotive, coaches and all? There is good luck as well as bad in the way things happen. I am a thinking, a providence to look out for us as well as a Caller to catch us when our time comes.”

The man who looks out for the time comes. The man who comes to before he does for the good one will never be fit to run a locomotive. That would make cowards of us all.”

“Heavens! What was that? Did you hear it?” called the engineer with a startled voice. “I heard nothing but the screeching of the wind through the high trestle as we were going over,” replied the fireman.

Grabbing the lantern he sprang from the cab and ran around in front of the locomotive. He held the lantern high with one hand and shaded his eyes with the other, then reached forward and pulled off the pilot a fragment of a trackman’s velocipede and a cushion that had been held in place by the heavy machine. “The Caller was out sure enough, Johnson,” he said to the fireman, “but not for such as you and me.”

Another moment and the engineer had vanished around the corner of the station and across the street to the Harper cottage. Through the half drawn curtain of the dining-room he saw “Bob’s girl,” as the men on the division knew her, and the mother of the Harper boys sitting waitingly by a table neatly set. He rapped lightly at the door, then pushed it open softly. “Mary! I am Nat Adams. I want you a minute. Be quick. Bring the keys to the station. Wait here for her. Mrs. Harper. She will be back directly.”

Mary’s cheeks blanched slightly but, warned by a glance from the engineer, she rose quietly, took the keys from the nail on the wall and, throwing a cape over her head, stepped out into the night.

“Can you be brave, Mary, my woman? I must send a report to the superintendent’s office and Bob is not here. You are the only one who can send it and twenty is waiting at the top of the mountain. You must be brave. The boys went up the canyon to fix the line didn’t they?”

“Yes sir. Has anything—”

“Don’t ask me now. Send the message first.”

The girl unlocked the station door, lighted a lamp and sank, deathly pale and trembling, into the operator’s chair. Bob had taught her telegraphy and she had taken his place at the instruments sometimes when he was busy elsewhere.

“Now, Mary, send as I dictate, send every word and send it quickly and strong. Keep your mind on the sending and remember that the boys have a mother who will need you to night.”

With barely a gasp for breath the key was thrown open and “J. D.” the superintendent

To warm drivers’ hands in cold weather an English inventor has devised a steering wheel with a core carrying two electrically heated coils, insulated from each other and from the outer rim.

A man declares that, while he is using considerably less lubricating oil in his engine than heretofore, he has found on the inside of the final exhaust pipe a greater accumulation of oil deposits thereon. He concludes that the explanation comes from a considerable difference in the gasoline of five years ago and that of to-day. Gasoline of a few years back was a regular distillate of crude petroleum and was only a small percentage of the total bulk worked upon.

With the enormous increase in demand makers of gasoline found that the percentage would not yield enough and were obliged to work out a means of producing greater quantities. The result of this is that a percentage of the gasoline of to-day is manufactured from heavier oils rather than distilled from petroleum as a base. This leaves a residue that may account for the above situation at the final exhaust.

Several new races have been added to the program to be contested during the annual Florida beach carnival, which is to be run this winter on the Daytona end of the beach on March 23d, 24th, 25th and 26th. One of the new races is to be one of 200 miles, with the competing cars divided into four classes, according to the piston displacement of their engines. The other new race will be the Florida stock car price class race, also of 200 miles. The two miles a minute speed crown race is also on the program. In this the winner receives the gold speed crown and his choice of $300 cash or plate, and the qualification is that the winner must equal 120 miles an hour for two miles. The two-mile record holder is Victor Demogot Darracq, who covered the distance in 1906 in 58.45 seconds.

ent’s call, went over the line. When the response came, “I am ready,” she said.

“I have brought 227 down the mountain. The track is clear unless at the mouth of tunnel seven where we caught a tree falling, brought down by the rain and wind and added jar of the train, I guess. It crushed the headlight and stack and knocked off the whistle and bell so we came down in the dark without power to give warning. The Harper boys were up the canyon fixing the line and we must have caught them on the trestle I reckon for I thought I heard a cry as we went onto the trestle and we brought part of the velocipede in on the pilot, but we could see nothing and concluded that the noise we heard was only the wind rushing through the trestle trusses and so came on. Better have the boys on twenty look for them in the bottom of the canyon. Bob’s girl, God bless her, is sending this for me. Nat Adams.”

Mary arose from the table, drew her cape tightly over her head, for it was raining again, and started tottering for the door. “Think only of the mother, my woman, think only of the mother to-night and I’ll be over directly after twenty gets in,” said the engineer as he went to pull his train in on the siding.

“The Caller called the Harper boys to-night.

“Well, I shouldn’t wish to say that, but—”

“But what?”

“He was selected as a juror in the trial of a notorious case.”

James Whitcomb Riley's first bid for national fame was a hoax on the literary public which he perpetrated by writing a poem called "Leonanie," and publishing it as a recently discovered poem by Poe. Didn't Call It Riding.

This is one from Macklyn Arbuckle, in "The Round Up," in Young's Magazine:

"I remember once," said Mr. Arbuckle, "being on a crowded car in Chicago. A man hung to a strap near me. He was a polite man, and to let people on and off he kept on the move. Now he ran to the front of the car, now to the rear, now to the middle, wherever there happened to be most space. And it was plain that all this hustling and jostling and rushing to and fro made him angrier and angrier as time went on."

"He restrained his rage till he came to get off. Then, all of a sudden, it overpowered him."

"He turned to the conductor and yelled, very red in the face:

"'Gimme my money back!'

"'What for?' said the conductor. 'You've had your ride.'

"'Ride, do you call it?' barked the man 'Why, I've walked the whole blessed way.'"

("When the Caller Calls"—Concluded.)

Johnson," the engineer said as he stepped into the cab and placed his hand on the throttle. "When I thought more'n likely he was looking for you and me. I tell you, Tom, we men on this mountain ought to be more ready to go when the Caller calls than what we are. Mighty few of us are as ready to stand face to face with God as are those boys lying on the rocks under the trestle down in the canyon, but it will be hard parting, it will be hard parting for their mother and Bob's girl."

The engineer and fireman had forgotten their desperate hunger and for more than an hour paced restlessly up and down in the darkness under the spreading eaves of the station waiting for twenty and the story it should tell. By and by the headlight showed around the point of the hill, the whistle blew and the great train came rushing up to the station. The watchers instinctively made for the baggage car so sure of finding there what they sought that they did not notice two figures darting from the train farther back and hurrying across the street in the darkness, but presently one of the operators stationed at the summit, who had come down to take Bob's place until it could be filled from headquarters, rushed past them into the office to report the arrival of twenty.

Over at the cottage Bob's girl was kneeling at the head of the couch doing her best and bravest to calm mother and prepare her for the worst when twenty should come in. Then footfalls were heard down the walk, quick, nervous, decisive. Mary knew them. Springing up from the couch upon which the little gray bit of half conscious, moaning womanhood was lying she threw open the door and fell, crying and laughing, into the out-stretched arms of her betrothed while by them leaped, limpingly, the stalwart Ray to snatch his mother from the couch and kiss her back into consciousness and thanksgiving.

"We thought we'd killed you," called Nat Adams from the door a few minutes later, "and how on earth was it that we didn't?"

"You will never come nearer it and not do it," Ray replied, for, now that there was not such need for restraining herself, "Bob's girl" was weeping her fright out in an adjacent room in her lover's arms. "It was only a flash cast along the side of the mountain as your fireman opened the furnace door to put in coal that saved us. Bob saw it, screamed and jumped. I threw my weight against the lever, stopped her in two turns and undertook to get the machine off the track, but you knocked it out of my hands and down the canyon, taking me with it, scratching me up a good bit and spraining my ankle. It was a close call for there were not two seconds for Bob and me betwixt that flash of light and resurrection morning."

They had their annual, double-birthday supper after all, with a hungry engineer and fireman for guests, though a trifle late in the night, but the incident had run in no wise abated among the trainmen who run over that mountain division the saying that, "When the Caller calls, a fellow has got to go," or diminished their superstitious belief that when the Caller goes out of a night he gets his man before morning. And yet those who know Nat Adams best declare that he is a great deal more fit and ready to answer his call than he would have been at any time previous to the night when he didn't kill the Harper boys on the high trestle across the rocky canyon at the foot of the mountain.

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time, it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement in short, and in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 newspapers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Inferior Courts of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States was provided for in the constitution, but the character of the courts below the supreme was left to the discretion of Congress. These inferior courts are now district courts, circuit courts and circuit courts of appeal.

There are now eighty-two district courts in the United States, with eighty-eight judges to supply them, some districts requiring two or more judges to dispatch the business brought before them. The salary of district judges is $5,000 a year and the tenure of office is during good behavior.

California has three district judges, John J. DeHaven and William C. Van Fleet of San Francisco and Olin Wellborn of Los Angeles, the state being divided into two districts.

Next above the district are the circuit courts, of which there are nine, but there are twenty-nine circuit judges, each receiving a salary of $7,000 per year. The original idea was that one of the justices of the supreme court should sit as a circuit judge, and it occasionally happens that one of them does so sit, but Justice McKenna, who has a right to sit in the ninth circuit, never does. The supreme court has so much to do that its justices have little inclination to seek occupation outside their own special office. The ninth circuit includes California, Alaska, Arizona, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Washington and Hawaii. The circuit judges belonging to the ninth circuit are William B. Gilbert of Oregon; Erskine M. Ross, of Los Angeles, and William W. Morrow, of San Francisco.

Between the circuit and supreme court is the circuit court of appeals, of which there is one in each judicial circuit. The court consists of three circuit judges, if there are so many in the circuit, but, if not, then of two circuit and one district judge, and any two of the three constitute a quorum. If the supreme justice for any circuit be present he presides over the circuit court of appeals, but otherwise the presiding judge is the circuit judge whose commission is the oldest. All appeals from the circuit or district courts, that do not go directly to the supreme court, are heard by the circuit court of appeals. This is looked upon as a safe, strong court, about as likely to be well advised as to the law as the supreme court itself and in many cases its decision is final.

The makers of the constitution long debated the need to have United States courts inferior to the supreme court, some claiming that the state courts would suffice for all purposes except a court of last resort, but the spread of nullification made it evident that the United States could not have gotten along without inferior courts of its own if it cared to have its authority respected.

Comparison between the United States and state courts cannot avoid being odious, especially to the state courts. Like the supreme court the inferior courts of the United States are, and are designed to be, beyond popular control. These judges are presumed to occupy a serene height superior to all waves of feeling, secure against loss of their positions and independent of all interests, political or financial. However, judges on these benches, as well as those sitting in state courts, owe their positions to the influence of whatever political power dominates and, as that power is mainly financial, the United States courts may be relied on to safeguard property interests in accordance with ancient, conventional and traditional precedents. If public opinion has any effect upon those tribunals it is by virtue of a moral atmospheric pressure and not by any direct method of making the will of the people the law of the land.

The United States courts are more efficient than the state courts in the administration of justice. Their hands are not so tied by bad code provisions written by criminal lawyers elected to the legislature. Their procedures are less technical and more direct. Their practice is nearer that of the common law as it was when our country separated from the mother country.

The quality of the United States judiciary is well exemplified by the attitude of the great interests toward it. If the great corporations have a law that they desire to enforce, they will, if they can, have proceedings instituted in the United States courts, but if they wish to nullify a law they will have actions begun in the state courts.

Collis P. Huntington once declared that he had never been defeated in an action where he could found his contention upon the common law and, whenever he could so found his contention, he got his case into the United States courts if he could.

While there is not as much complaint of inefficiency in the administration of justice by United States as by state courts the United States courts are not beyond criticism. They are ultra conservative, often prone to exalt the letter above the spirit of the law and to prefer that which is written in books to that which is written in the constitution of human society.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Address:

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

WE GO FORWARD.

If there are those who anticipated that President William Howard Taft would remain silent in his inaugural address concerning those great issues that have constituted the Roosevelt policies they know better now. If there are those who conceived that the incoming administration would be content to rest upon its oars, or mark time in its tracks, while predatory wealth returned to its depredations with a new hunger for gains ill gotten they will now perceive that their greedy wish was father to an ignoble thought. We go forward. The moral wave sweeps on. The buccaneers of commerce and industry are to be withstood and commerce and industry are to be moralized, if not democratized. However much the Napoleons of finance may sulk in their tents there is no reason why the man in the ranks should be downhearted because of the inaugural proclamation of President William Howard Taft.

From Washington to Roosevelt our government must proceed upon the theory that if the great were subsidized, unhindered, and uncontrolled their prosperity would filter down through their fingers into the outstretched, if not suppliant, hands of the American mass in equitable share. It has not worked out that way. The policy of fostering without controlling vast enterprise has made financial feudal chiefs more powerful than kings, commonwealths, legislatures and congresses, more powerful than anything except the united determination of the human mass led by a dauntless man who understood the mass and whom the mass understood. Before that power these chiefs have stood suppliant and whining, and there they may stand until they consent, and submit themselves in good faith, to wise regulation in the common good.

For there is no good except the common good, and no policy that is wise for the nation to follow that is not, first of all, wholesome for the man and woman who must eat their bread in the sweat of their faces. The common good demands largess from no lords, but only a just share of the joint earnings of ability, capital and labor co-operatively employed.

Great organizers we must have. No policy can be sound for all that discourages the spirit of honest initiative and enterprise. The rewards, not the booty, of ability must be great, and we need cherish no fear that they will not be. Ability can care for itself. It is the humble worker to whom God gave little executive capacity who must be looked out for. As these are they who have chiefly been remembered during the administration of President Roosevelt, so are they the ones who chiefly will not be forgotten during the administration of President Taft. Theodore Roosevelt knew whom he was recommending to the American people for his successor, and the American people knew him, too. Only the predatory were seemingly in doubt, and they are now undecided.

It is impossible that our political life shall rise above the moral standards set for it by our commercial and industrial life. How imperative is it, then, that our commercial and industrial standards of morality shall be high? They can be kept high only by wise laws equally enforced, and if the great and strong can be made to obey them the common man will not deny their validity. It has been a joy to the world that the American nation has, for seven years, been headed by a moral force. It will give renewed joy to the world to know that it is so to be headed for (probably) eight years more. To the American public that joy will prove exceeding great.

The declaration of President Taft, that the general government must be given power to enforce, upon its own volition, and without the employment of state machinery, such rights as may have been given to aliens in this country by treaty stipulation, may cause some to stumble, but nothing can be clearer or more certain. The giving of that power has been too long delayed, but in the exercise of it some new lines may have to be drawn with reference to what are and what are not proper matters to be determined by treaty stipulation. Those issues will have to go to the Supreme Court of the United States for exposition, not to legislatures, labor councils or the sandlots.

THRESH THE ISSUE OUT.

There exists a general conviction that San Francisco and other bay cities should own their own system of water supply, that the Sierras must sooner or later be looked to as an adequate source and that the Tuolumne river is the place to look; but it may be doubted if many persons who share conviction would find themselves able, on demand, to make a convincing argument in support of their convictions. This ought not to be so. We shall not be able to convince others of the justness of our contentions unless we are ourselves convinced and by considerations of a convincing character.

It is the purpose of The California Weekly to deal with public affairs of importance, frankly, fairly and fearlessly. It will so deal with the Hetch-Hetchy water proposition. As a beginning we this week present a paper prepared by Mr. J. D. Galloway who, on behalf of the project, very distinctly sets forth the arguments upon which the city mainly rests its case and does it in specific form. We invite those who hold contrary views, or who wish to supplement what he has said with further arguments to the same effect, to prepare articles for our columns, making them as brief and much to the point as possible. We shall publish such of these as we can find room for, if worthy of publication, as soon as room can be found for them in our columns, reserving the right to comment editorially upon whatever may be said.

There is no material interest of greater importance to the bay cities than this of an adequate and permanent supply of pure water, but no wrong step must be taken, and no wrong, that can be avoided, must be inflicted either upon the nature-loving public or upon other water interests. Great enterprises can seldom be carried forward without inflicting some hardship, but such injuries must not be wanton or unprovoked. Every intelligent citizen has a right to know the whys and wherefores of the issue from beginning to end. Mr. Galloway has made a splendid beginning. Who will follow?

Judge Dunne was absolutely right in holding, in the sentencing of Coffey, that the tempted deserves far less punishment than the tempters. It is the man who lies awake o' nights scheming ways of converting public privilege into private gain, in disregard of law and equity, that should be shown no mercy. He stands in a similar relation to graft that one who lies in wait for his victim stands toward murder.

While President Taft's address is explicit as to what predatory capital and enterprise may look for from his administration it is not less assuring to capital and enterprise pursuing industry and commerce with only a legitimate gain in view. Any business that his attitude will hurt needs to be hurt and hurt so that it will feel the hurt through and through.

THE SCHMITT VIEW OF LEARNING.

Assemblyman Schmitt of San Francisco is a statesman, according to his lights which, unfortunately, are tallow dips. Order is heaven's first law and also that of Schmitt. When he observes the manifold activities of the university professors, and finds that they are not fastened to their jobs by cast-iron contracts, it gives him a pain. The Schmitt view of order requires that professors, like other hired men, should either work by the piece, by the hour or at day's pay, and that the manner thereof should be nominated in the bond. He would have the university instructors standing around masticating toothpicks waiting for eight o'clock to begin work and knocking off at the stroke of the clock.

Doubtless he would have no objection to collective bargaining, and to a walking delegate to guard their rights and see to it that no one of them set a pace that the slowest man on the job could not follow. He would purchase the philosophy of a Howison by the yard and the genius of a Loeb at so much per kilowatt hour, and he would hold them to their bargains with irrevocable contracts. The Schmitt view of dealing with a thing as intangible as learning is inadequate, which is bad. The Schmitt vote is in a minority of one, which is good. May it ever be so.

But what really ails Schmitt is that certain of the professors at the state university have taken a keen, a moral and a highly intelligent interest in affairs among which they live, and have lent their aid to enable the public to discriminate between right and wrong, between the law of justice and the law of corporation-constituted courts. They have dared to be free citizens and to commend the graces of a free citizenship to others, things that, according to the Schmitt view, they were not hired to do and therefore should not do. There is where the shoe pinches Schmitt. There are other shoes pinching in the same place but whose owners are too discreet to squeal audibly. Schmitt has thrown discretion to the winds and exhibited himself by the light of his tallow dip.

The best thing that Schmitt and the legislature can do is to suffer the state university to be conducted by the Board of Regents and President Wheeler. When men give their lives to learning, and to imparting it to others, they do about all that can be gotten out of them by God or man, contract or no contract, and that is what the university faculty is doing. Here as nowhere else, not even excepting in the pulpit, there is imparted to those having ears to hear the sincerity of truth, as little colored by prejudice, partisanship and selfish interest as possible with vessels made of clay but filled to the brim with an honorable enthusiasm for service. Anyone not so filled will soon be gotten rid of.

The facts which students learn at our universities will not be the most valuable things they will carry away with them when they graduate. The moral and civic enthusiasms communicated to them by absorption will rank first, but how can there be such enthusiasms without liberty of thought, action, speech, opinion? There cannot.

Nor does Schmitt understand the constitutional provision relating to the university any better than he understands the activities of instructors as subject matter for contract. The constitution declares that the university shall be "independent of all political or sectarian influence," that is, above and beyond the reach of such influence—out of reach, for instance, of the grip of Schmitt. What constitutes the University of California if not its president and professors, its instructors and students? These are they who are to be independent, not dependent, free and untrammelled, not held in leash by legislators or their bosses. Schmitt

THE MOUTHS OF THE MANY.

The earning capacity of the American unskilled multitude is higher than that of any other country, but it is so low as properly to be called poverty, and yet it is the supplying of the mouths and the backs of the multitude that furnishes the foundation for the industry and commerce of the nation. The wants of the rich may be many, but there are relatively so few of the rich that supplying them with cottons, shoes and woollens would create a demand for few factories, as carrying them to and fro would require few street cars and not many trans-bay ferry boats. It should be clear enough that upon the purchasing power of the many depends the prosperity of the country.

The cost of living has greatly increased since the dawn of the new century. No housewife needs to be told this, and no statistics will convince to the contrary. The wages of skilled labor have probably kept pace with the increased cost of living, but with unskilled labor, and the more moderate salaried positions, a year's earnings will buy less now than a decade ago will buy much less.

The farmers of America are not unprosperous. The last ten years have been fat for them. Crops have been good and prices advancing. It is not their turn to complain. But it is not so with the mouths of the many. They are hard pressed to be filled, and their cry for consideration should not go unheeded.

The increased production of gold, and consequent cheapening of the standard of value, will doubtless account for a percentage of the increased cost of living, but not all, or even the main burden of it. We must look elsewhere for the cause.

The main justification of the protective tariff was that free competition within the tariff wall soon reduced the manufacturer's price below the importer's. That freedom of competition is at an end. Modern centralization of industrial enterprise, and modern combinations in restraint of trade, have eliminated freedom of competition from all markets. The power to "cinch" consumers is little restrained. Either that power must be restrained, and international competition restored, or the protective principle in tariffs must be greatly modified in its application, or abandoned altogether, that world competition may be invoked to check the power to cinch.

Congress will meet in extraordinary session March 15th to revise the tariff schedules. As preliminary to that undertaking every interest has been heard except the interests of the consumers. The mouths of the many have not spoken, but the time will come when they must speak, and the time will come when they will not be without champions to speak for them.

There is reason to fear that the forthcoming revision of the tariff will not be thoroughgoing. It will not reach the mouths of the millions or backs of the many. It will be content with yielding more revenue, which means more taxation. That will not suffice. Failure to so reduce the tariff as to reduce the cost of living will provoke, not avoid, the tariff issue being made the next great issue before the people of America. When that issue comes it will be discovered that the mouths of the many have many voices and many votes. "All the protection that is needed, but not one dollar for monopoly," is the rule for Congress to apply if it would avoid a tidal wave of tariff reform. The handwriting on the wall was not more visible at Belshazzar's feast.

The luck of "Lucky" Baldwin has definitely ended.

Nothing could have been more characteristic of the breadth of the man than President Roosevelt's inviting forty-five nations to participate, next September, at The Hague, in a conference to consider how the resources of the world may be conserved. There is need for such a conference. This world is getting to be so small, and the needs of the human family are so enlarging, that there will not be a square mile of space on the earth's surface that can be devastated without injury or neglected without harm. Theodore Roosevelt has ceased to be our president only to become a world-character. What if he were to devote the rest of his life to the establishment of a parliament of the nations as well as a court? It may well be that just this thing is waiting for just this man.

There are those who do not understand just how it is that Japanese and Chinese cannot become naturalized citizens of the United States. The constitution gave Congress power to establish uniform naturalization laws. Such laws as were enacted while slavery existed limited naturalization to white persons, but the courts have held that such limitation shuts out all not white, no matter what their color might be. The fourteenth amendment declared that all persons born, or naturalized, in this country are citizens, and the fifteenth guaranteed the right to vote to all citizens, but did not change the status of citizenship. Congress has full power to naturalize any race but it is likely to be slow in changing its policy of more than a century. This, however, is not as important as keeping undesirable out.

Robert Wilson, who played the part in the Pittsburg graft scandals which William J. Burns so skillfully played in those of San Francisco, was a Christian missionary before he became a detective. While on the witness stand the attorney for the defense developed the fact that he, Wilson, had permitted himself to be introduced to one of the indicted citizens as Mr. Dolph, and had not immediately declared his identity. Therefore the Pittsburg grafters, caught with the goods on them, should be held innocent, for who can believe any man who makes use of an alias? That is the contention of the defense and there are venemans in San Francisco whose susceptibilities are so fine that they would not believe any one on oath who had assumed a name not his own for any purpose.

An effort is making to induce the great life insurance companies to enter upon a co-operative campaign in public and private sanitation in the belief that so many years can be added to the lives of the insured as to make the expenditure pecuniarily profitable to the companies. This would be a form of selfishness so enlightened as to be luminous.

It Is the English Way.

Many have found fault with England's shrieking sisterhood of suffragettes, and have pointed to the fact that Wyoming, Colorado and Idaho made no such demonstrations in order to secure the ballot, neither did the women of New Zealand, Tasmania and New South Wales, nor yet their Swedish sisters, who have just been given the same rights to suffrage that their brothers have. This is all true, but it is not the English way of accomplishing political results. Nothing short of a great row attracts attention in Britannia and every parliamentary election is little better than a series of riots. The suffragettes are only copying the example of their brothers more closely than would be good form in any other country.

Why the Lock Canal Was Preferred.

In 1905 the Suez sea level canal handled 11,000,000 tons of freightage. The Sault Ste Marie, a lock canal, handled $37,000,000 tons in only eight months out of that year and, last year, 56,000,000 tons. With a lock canal at Panama sea speed can be made on 90 per cent. of the distance. With a sea-level canal the speed would have to be eight miles an hour. It will be easier to protect a lock canal from destruction of the locks by an enemy than to keep an enemy's torpedo boats out of a sea level canal. The lock canal costs less and can be more quickly constructed. These are the principal reasons why the lock canal was preferred.

Hard Times Babies.

In Chicago, where close tab is kept on the public health, it is found that there is no better index to the state of the times than that offered by the death rate among babies. While times are good homes are less crowded, the milk supply is more ample and purer and medical attendance more abundant, when hard times comes the poor bunch closer in homes, the air gets bad, food deteriorates and the milk supply becomes scanty and poor. A lowered infant death rate in Chicago this winter indicates that business is improving. The pinch of poverty hits the helpless hardest.

How Law Schools Can Help.

The bad condition of legal procedure is due, as much as to any other cause, to the Bourbon propensities of lawyers sent to legislatures to make legal business rather than to prevent it. They do not perceive that such conduct is morally on a parity with physicians who would spread disease rather than support sanitation, purity of foods and drugs. Kent College of Law, at Chicago, has thrown its influence in favor of simplifying the procedures by which justice may be established. If high ideals of the law, as a profession, are to be established anywhere it must be in the law schools. Bar associations are lax and courts are little more to be depended upon.

Senatorial Bourbonism.

An eastern paper has attempted to account for the movement, throughout the West, toward direct election of United States senators, on the ground that the West sympathizes with Senator LaFollette and his band of "young turks" in their struggle against the priority of right which the "gray wolves" assert to places on all the good committees. The West does sympathize with LaFollette and his associates, but that does not half account for the determination of its people to say, directly, who shall be United States senators. The principal cause is the belief that the Senate is governed from Wall street and that Abou Ben Aldrich and Mohammed Ali Hale are grand viziers of Sultan Standard Oil.

Who Will Commend the Commender?

Many a scoundrel gets a certificate for good character because the giver has not the moral courage to refuse what is asked. This may explain the reason why Governor Gillett gave to the Oakland Tribune a flattering letter of commendation, as it probably explains why Senator Perkins, some years ago, poured oil of gladness over the devoted head of the same journalistic strumpet. Neither did the Tribune the smallest good. It is so well known that no person will receive it into his house under misapprehension as to what it stands for, but what of the individuals who gave the commendation? Who is not ashamed for both of them?

Why Call Them Fakers?

The Hetch-Hetchy water project is important to San Francisco and the bay cities. That cause has got to be pleaded at the bar of American public opinion. That public opinion is not likely to be favorably influenced by the methods which hired ruffians employ at the bar of justice, for it is not to the rabble that this appeal must be made. It must be made to the thoughtful, the cultivated, the discriminating, the influential. Then why begin that appeal by calling nature lovers "nature fakers," and by heaping contumely upon the heads of men of unimpaired character, as a number of newspapers have already done? Could anything be more certain to weaken any cause he it ever so good?

Deepen That Canal.

By treaty stipulation it was long since agreed that neither the United States nor Great Britain should maintain ships of war upon the great lakes. It is improbable that this country and Great Britain will ever go to war against each other. It is improbable that the United States and Canada will ever try military conclusions, but neither eventuality is impossible. Great Britain now has access to the great lakes for gunboats and cruisers of considerable draft through the Welland Canal, and the only way to offset that advantage is to so construct the canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi river that it will be the equal of the Welland canal. This can be done by helping Illinois to make its canal twenty-four feet deep instead of fourteen. Uncle Sam should jump at the opportunity.

A Bad Beginning.

The decision of Judge Anderson, who is trying the Chicago rebate case against the Standard Oil company, that each separate settlement of accounts between the Standard Oil and the railroad company constituted one complete offense, and not each carload, as held by Judge Landis, augurs ill for the outcome of that case. Whatever the law may be common sense knows better. That company could settle for forty trainloads at a time, and so be subjected to a fine of no more than $20,000, when the profits of breaking the law might be many times greater. It is a bad beginning.

It Might Have Been Worse.

If the decision of Judge Anderson, as to what constitutes a complete infraction of the rebate law, is unsatisfactory we have this to comfort us, it might have been worse. Attorney John F. Miller, for the Standard Oil company, had the hardihood to stand in court and contend that "the offense is a continuous one, never completed until the rate ceased to exist," that is, all the shipments under that rate, from start to finish, no matter how long continued, constituted but one offense and punishable by one fine amounting to not more than $20,000. Judge Anderson should have committed Attorney Miller to jail for contempt of court.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Every step in educational progress has first been taken by great philanthropists, and if philanthropy were to take a step toward establishing a university for gray heads and bald it would be met more than half way.

The University of California is kind to its "pelicans," as it denominates mature women who haunt its class rooms and lecture courses, and there are men in attendance. Berkeley is not thoroughly awake to the opportunities which the university freely offers to those who would freely take, and San Francisco and Oakland slumber on their rights, but here and there one nibbles at the intellectual lunch counter with as much relish as the spent horse at the verdure of the pasture in which he has been turned to spend the rest of his days.

The purpose of a university is, of course, to fit the young for living, but suppose that youth passes, and middle age, that the summit is crossed, and one has gone part way down the shady side of the slope before opportunity offers to drink at the fountain of learning, must one go to the end with thirst unquenched? Not if we can have a university for the aged.

The facilities which any university for youth can furnish for mature years are limited. When Professor Gayley opens one of his classes to the public Hearst Hall is crowded to the doors, and if the adjacent public should suddenly take a notion to attend all lectures and recitations dealing with interesting subjects such classes would be swamped. As it is, the relatively few stragglers who wander in are not in the way and only now and again is the regular university work interfered with, yet the response to the opportunity is sufficient to show that there exists a need that might respond quickly to special offer.

The university for the aged will be devoid of recitations and examinations. No embarrassing questions will be asked, no exacting work of preparation required. It will be a place where one may drink deeply or sip lightly at the fountain of learning, each one absorbing and carrying away what he can. It is not that the knowledge gained is to be put to use. The best use it can be put to is the enjoyment of it. What is education if it be not opening the windows to mind and soul, and what eye is better fitted for viewing an enlarged landscape than one with the flattened trajectory of those who are "going down hill?"

There are those who slide into the class rooms at Berkeley who do not understand more than half the half that the half that they do understand compensates them abundantly. They have gained something new (to them) to think on, to talk over, to arouse interest, to help to keep them young. Some attend the zoology department in the hope of making the acquaintance of birds with which they have been passing strangers all their lives. Others are attracted by English in its many forms of expression, making literature mean more to them than it had meant before, while others find in philosophy a solace if not a means of growth in grace.

What is the twilight of life for if not to gather up the tangled threads of interest that were let go during the hurry of the busy day? And what more advantageously lends a hand in this final duty than a university for the aged, established as an annex to a great university for the youth, where instructors could go at odd hours and discourse, in as simple form as possible, to those who might come to listen? Among these would be many middle aged mothers whose children have grown out into the world, the first hour to themselves they have known. And there would be not a few men, superannuated, perhaps, or pushed aside by younger men, living modestly on the rents of a flat or so, to whom dressing gown and slippers are more than a hindrance and hammer. If so once opulent philanthropist is seeking an opportunity for profitable investment he may find it in endowing an annex-university for the aged.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Finland Stands Firm.

There is a no more stolidly, even stolidly, brave people under the sun than those of Finland. They know their rights and dare maintain them even in the teeth of the Czar of Russia and the terrible despotism of which he is the putative head. The new diet of Finland (which contains twenty-five women members, by the way) recently convened. It had been forewarned by the Czar what to legislate about and what not to but, despite the warning, the president of the diet, in answer to the warnings, represented to the Czar's representative that the Czar had violated the constitution in spirit and letter. The diet was at once dissolved and a new election ordered and, at the same time, provision was made for a new convention readjusting the relations of Finland toward the empire. This will mean resistance, another hard struggle for the political and personal liberty in Finland, with many a Finnish patriot expiring on the gibbet or rotting in a dungeon.

How Coal Is Wasted.

The recent statement of President Roosevelt, that $300,000,000 of mineral wealth is wasted every year, has provoked some questioning as to how that can be. The item of coal furnishes a fair basis for comparative competition. On the authority of experts it is stated that steam engines get only 8 per cent. of the thermal value out of coal and considerable part of only 1 per cent. A electric lighting plant gets only 1 per cent. The place of artificial shoring-up and great quantities of finely broken coal are not removed from the mines at all but left on the floor.

Austria and Serbia.

Indications are that the long hoped for pan-Slavic empire in the Balkans will have to be hoped for very much longer before it is realized. The creation of such an empire would deprive Austria of many provinces and so, the better to protect her own integrity, that country lately took from Turkey two more Slav provinces. This so incensed Serbia, the heart of Slavic ambition, that it would sooner take counsel of valor than of discretion, and make war against Austria, which prompts the latter country to say: "Very well, then, we shall take you in, too." England, France and Italy want the situation to remain as it is, except that peace shall take the place of bushwhacking. Russia's sympathies are with Serbia and Germany is the unknown quantity. Austria will carry her bluff to the "calling" point, but will not overstep it unless her statesmen miscalculate. This is the present danger to the peace of Europe.

Alien Ownership in Cuba.

Latest advices are that the alien land ownership bill may not be pushed through the Cuban legislature. Outside pressure against it has been very strong. There are $2,000,000,000 of foreign capital invested in Cuba and Cuba has ever so little money of its own for investment, but the result of not enacting a law restricting alien ownership is too plain to be doubted. Cuba naturally gives itself to large plantation enterprises and absent land-lords will make of Cuba a land of aristocracy and proletariat, care takers and workers, with scarcely a suspicion of a middle class citizenship without which no country can be other than miserable. Cuban times have fallen in hard places.

The Inter-International Naval Conference.

Not so much attention as it merits has been given to the international naval conference which lately concluded its labors at London. The great nations of the earth have been striving to reach an agreement as to new rules of naval warfare and at least tentative results have been reached. The insistence of the United States Senate, that nothing relating to foreign affairs shall be consummated without that body's taking a guess at it, has delayed ratification of the agreements, but most of them are not unlikely to be ratified by and by. Cotton is to be non-contraband and vessels are to be subject to arrest and seizure only within the area of blockade operations and not anywhere found on the high seas. Old rules have generally been much softened and restrictions liberalized, making war more of a duel between ships of war and less of a duel between citizens and commercial interests.

Newfoundland Fisheries.

Ever since the Revolutionary War the "rights" or "privileges" of American fishermen in Newfoundland and Canadian waters have been a source of dispute and bad blood, not only between our country and England and Canada, but in our own politics between New England and other portions of the union that cared little for the fisheries. Secretary Root and Ambassador Bryce, however, made a case for submission to The Hague court which it may be hoped will result in a final adjustment of differences. One issue to be determined is as to whether or not Americans have "rights" or only "privileges" in those waters. The second is as to whether or not American fishermen can fish just outside the three-mile limit, inside of bays only six miles across at the mouth, or must stay out of such bays, of which there are many. If Bryce and Root have indeed found a way to a final settlement of this cause for strife it will supply diplomatic glory enough for both of them.

Wireless to Be Revolutionized.

Wireless telegraphy is, seemingly, too new a thing to be subject to revolution in method but, if reports from New York are to be relied upon, something very like a revolution in method of operation is about to take place. Instead of the present method of discharging sparks from Leyden jars, with their alternating flash and pause, there will be substituted a low power, high speed, continuous wave system, much faster in operation, wider in range and with almost absolute secrecy in the sending and receiving of messages without their being either "picked up" by instruments for which they were not intended or interfered with by amateur meddlers with toy machines.

World's Missionary Conference.

Plans have been perfected for holding at Edinburgh, in June, 1910, the first world's conference of Christian missionaries. The world now has 300,000,000 of at least nominal Christians, and about three times as many who are not Christians at all. The subject of the conference will be as to how to make the others Christians also. The work of preparation has been subdivided into eight departments with twenty commissioners in each department and these are to report to the conference. There are some reasons for anticipating that the Roman Catholic organization may send delegates. A principal effort will be to carry abroad less of denominationalism and more of the elements of Christianity to which practically all of the differing sects may subscribe. This is the world coming to be yearly more neighborly.

Financial Symptoms.

For some reason best known to themselves London and Paris have been struggling for preponderance in gold supply, with the result that the United States is being called to furnish the $50,000,000 of gold that Argentina wishes to borrow from Europe. The tariff revision labors of the extra session of Congress will prevent American securities going abroad much and will tend to bring home some securities already abroad, with the result that the bears seem to have the best of it in Wall street speculation. The termination of strained relations between Germany and France in relation to Morocco has, however, given confidence to European stability and only Austria and Serbia are now to be worried over and finances do not take that issue seriously enough to depress general business. American tariff revision is now the darkest cloud above the horizon and that also is not regarded as threatening.

Retrenchment by the Burlington.

Whether the railroads are awaiting improvements until they can find out "where they are at" under new conditions, or have gone on a strike against rate regulation, or whatever the cause may be, few of them are making plans for great extensions for the present. During 1907 the C. B. & Q. appropriated $16,000,000 for extensions and betterments, last year only $8,000,000 and for 1909 only $1,000,000, which virtually means that it is marking time.

To Fight the White Plague.

The Illinois state senate has passed, and sent to the assembly, with a probability that it will be accepted by that body, a bill authorizing towns and cities to impose a tax of three mills on the $100 of assessed valuation for the purpose of building and maintaining tuberculosis hospitals. This is certainly a movement in the right direction and one that the California legislature might imitate with profit. The only way to rid the world of the white plague is to fight it like killing snakes.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription? The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

CALIFORNIA AT THE EXPOSITION

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

In a room on the third floor of the Hotel St. Francis, in San Francisco, is the nerve-center of California's interest in the approaching Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition. At Seattle, from June 1st to October 16th, will be gathered the wanderers of Western American enterprise and natural glories, and California will lead all sections in the richness of her display.

The California Building.

The California building will be the largest state building on the exposition grounds, and the second largest of all the buildings, far outstripping either Oregon or Washington. It will be in the form of a square, with a wing at either side; the frontage being 230 feet. The central grand exhibition hall will be 140 feet square, and the two wings will be each forty-five feet square. One wing will be a lecture hall, with living rooms overhead for the commissioners, who will reside in the building throughout the summer. The other wing will contain the offices of the commission.

The building, almost completed, is in the Spanish style of architecture, which differs from the Mission style only in the addition of ornate exterior decorations. The color will be cream. Although the building is not intended to be permanent, it is being so admirably constructed, and is so ornamental, that the state of Washington has asked that it be left as a perpetual reminder of California's interest in the exposition, and for the use of the state university, for which the few permanent structures are to be preserved.

California Spending $100,000.

California has taken the liveliest interest in the exposition. The legislature appropriated $100,000 to have California represented. Forty thousand dollars is to be expended on the building, which is being constructed under the supervision of State Engineer N. Ellery, after plans by Sellon and Hemmings, the state architects. Governor Gillett is the California commissioner, and, under his general supervision, the actual work of gathering the exhibits and managing the building is being done by J. A. Filcher, secretary of the state board of agriculture, and Frank Wiggins, secretary of the Los Angeles chamber of commerce.

The special exhibits are being prepared under the direction of the following: Robert Furlong, of San Rafael, education; George C. Roeding, of Fresno, agriculture and horticulture; E. Almond Winthorpe, of San Francisco, fine arts; and J. A. Jasper, of San Diego, mining.

Finest Exhibit Ever Prepared.

These exhibits will be the finest that California has ever sent to an exposition, and the most comprehensive. This statement is made on the authority of men who are helping prepare these, have also helped prepare California's exhibits at every exposition since Chicago's.

The educational exhibit will be very full, and it will be along real model lines. At St. Louis it was demonstrated that a hurried public would not linger to examine the written word of the schools. Therefore, the exhibits now being prepared will all be readily visualized. First, a complete set of photographs will illustrate the character of the school buildings, from kindergarten to university. California is notable for its pride in its school buildings. Next, there will be photographs to illustrate inside facilities: classrooms, laboratories, etc. Other photographs will show the athletic accomplishments of the grounds.

Then such display work as drawings, water colors, crayon sketches, etc., done by the pupils, will be shown. Hand-made work of all kinds: patterns, metal work, cabinet work, domestic science and sloyd exhibits will be displayed. Educational materials used in classrooms, such as statuary, shells, stones, floral relief maps, and models are also desired for this exhibit.

California Artists Lending Works.

The fine arts display will be exceptional. The director is an artist himself, and largely through his personal influence the best painters and sculptors of the state have agreed to lend specimens of their work for the display. This is the first time that this has been achieved, and the art exhibit next summer will be a notable feature of California's building.

Naturally, our horticultural and agricultural display will be the most distinctively Californian and the most impressive of our exhibits. Oranges, raisins, prunes—these are typically in our province, and the show they will make will be worthy of their preeminence. In these, as in all the exhibits, the effort will be made to illustrate the industry rather than to advertise particular people engaged in industry, and, except in cases where one concern is completely representative of the business, its display will be subordinated to the idea of so arranging the whole as to adequately illustrate the conditions, processes, and success of each industry in California.

Each Industry Graphically Illustrated.

Thus the eastern visitor may learn how our grapes are grown and our wines made; where and how our distinctive fruits are grown and how they are picked, packed or canned. The processes of the leading industries will be carried out in detail in the building. For the further information of visitors, lectures will be given every half-hour, illustrated with stereopticon slides and motion pictures, the subject so rotated as to describe all sections and all industries of the state. A miniature irrigation system in complete operation will show how the water-supply is handled under the California system.

Other exhibits will illustrate our forest wealth and forestry regulation; our mining processes and mineral resources; our summer and winter resorts, with complete information regarding hotels, transportation, and other conveniences of access to California's scenic attractions.

Reception to Eastern Visitors.

The social side of the exhibition will be carefully looked after. Once a week there will be a reception in the building, to which all notable persons then in Seattle will be invited, and at which California products will be distributed gratis. These social days are always one of California's most attractive bids for popularity at expositions, and are always crowded to the capacity of the delegation to accommodate the visitors.

The chief purpose of the exhibit is, of course, to attract population to California. The virtues of our soil, the benignity of our climate, the desirability of our towns for residence, the adequacy of our schools, the beauty of our scenery, the potentialities of our commerce—all will be put out in their most alluring guise. But, incidentally, we shall achieve more than this worthy and necessary advertisement.

Through comparison with our neighbors of the coast—with Oregon, Washington, Idaho, British Columbia, and Alaska—we shall discover wherein we may improve upon our already remarkable position, and, besides, we shall become better acquainted with our neighbors. In the larger destinies of the future, our interests are at one with the rest of the Pacific Coast, and if we here come to a better understanding of our allies, and to a closer feeling of unity with them—as we surely shall—the results will tend to a greater rate of progress for all.

A Coast "Entente Cordiale."

It is in this fostering of a community of interests on this coast that the exposition will, perhaps, do its greatest good. And in the visible display of our material prosperity and of our artistic and intellectual status it is a satisfaction to know that California will be worthily represented and that its exhibit will bear comparison with the most elaborate to be made in Seattle next summer.

NEW NAPOLEON SIDES.

A vivid and intimate study of Napoleon Bonaparte is contained in the pages of the Journal of Count Pierre Louis Roederer, just published in Paris. The author was very close to Bonaparte, having been one of his principal counsellors and ministers, and the Journal is made up largely of resumes of conversations between the Count and Napoleon, which Roederer habitually noted down, apparently with the intention of using them in preparation of his memoirs. This plan, however, he never carried out. Some years after Napoleon's fall Roederer had a few copies of the Journal printed and circulated among members of his family, but these soon became so difficult to find that historians have scarcely ever referred to them.

The copy of the Journal from which the recently published volume has been prepared was obtained by M. Maurice Vitrac of the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris, who has added a preface and complete notes.

Extracts from the Journal, quoting Napoleon literally, reveal anew the intensity of his nature and the penetration of his mind.

"There is no more pusillanimous man than I when I make a military plan. I exaggerate all the dangers of all the minor possibilities of the circumstances. I am in a painful state of agitation. But that does not prevent me from appearing quite serene to those about me, and when my mind is made up all is forgotten except whatever may help success."

"If a Frenchman is between the fear of the police and the fear of the devil he chooses the devil; but when he is between the devil and fashion he obeys fashion."

At a dinner Bonaparte said to Roederer:

"We have news from Egypt. Kleber has been killed by a Turk who was handing him a petition. He was killed on the same day, at the same hour, as Desaix. Both were men of great merit. But that does not prevent me from appearing quite serene to those about me, and when my mind is made up all is forgotten except whatever may help success."

SELF GOVERNMENT AT OAKLAND

Second Article: THE ISSUES OF THE PENDING ELECTIONS.

The problem of self government in America has got to be worked out in our municipalities. The town meetings were the kindergarten of Democracy. Our municipalities must become our common schools of free government, because it is there that people come together in multitudes immediately concerned for interests common to them all. We may liken state governments to high schools of democracy and national government to the university. It is therefore the purpose of The California Weekly, from time to time, to analyze and make clear the status and tendencies of municipal government in California in the hope that each may learn from the other.)

Oakland will hold a general election next Monday for the purpose of electing a mayor, city council, and other officers. The issues to be decided at that election are the subject of this article.

The chief issue is the record of the present administration, headed by Mayor Mott. The mayor and his adherents in the city council are candidates for reelection. Their record is believed to be satisfactory to the people of Oakland in most particulars. Upon one point, however, an issue has been made by Mayor Mott's opponents, under the leadership of Dr. F. F. Jackson, a member of the city council. This issue is over the so-called "memorandum of agreement" with the Southern Pacific company, relating to the water-front of Oakland.

The Original Water-Front Grab.

In 1850, a young lawyer from New York, named Carpenter, came to Oakland. He soon discerned the potential value of the water-front, and determined to control it. He went to the state capital, got an appointment as a clerk, ingratiated himself with the legislators, and had a bill passed transferring the state's rights in the present water-front of Oakland to that town. At the same time he brought about the organization of a town government in Oakland, and had himself elected the first mayor. He took care, however, not to qualify for the office, so that he might be free to apply to the city council for the water-front under the terms of the legislature's grant. The council sold the water-front privileges to Carpenter for a trifle, and he disposed of them in a way that made him a millionaire. Ultimately the Southern Pacific company acquired Carpenter's rights, and built the present mole.

Efforts to Reclaim Water-Front.

As soon as Oakland emerged from being a village it began trying to recover some of its water-front. But the Southern Pacific had it throttled. Numerous attempts were made to have the grants set aside, but the Supreme Court of California decided that the grants were valid, and further determined that all lands back of the shore-line described in the Act of 1852 were in private ownership. The owner of most of these lands was the Southern Pacific. That company not only maintained its hold upon its mole and adjacent land, but denied the city's title to any of the water-front, and by keeping streets closed, and in other ways, physically prevented any other interest from making use of that part of the water-front which it itself did not use. Thus Oakland's chief commercial asset was kept subordinate to the convenience of one corporation, and the city's natural expansion was hindered.

Western Pacific to the Rescue.

This condition persisted until the Western Pacific Railroad appeared before the city council and asked for a franchise to construct a mole on the water-front. It agreed that, if the city would grant its request for a franchise, it would fight the city's battle out in the courts. The council acquiesced, and the Western Pacific began litigation to verify the city's title to the water-front. In February, 1907, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals decided that the Act of 1852 was valid, and that the city's grants to Carpenter were also valid; but, furthermore, that Carpenter's grant of the wharfing-out privileges was limited to thirty-seven years, and that, as that time had expired, the right to let out the wharfing-out privileges had reverted to the city.

The only appeal from this decision is to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such an appeal would probably fail to change it. As the decision gained for Oakland practically everything it had been fighting for, all that remained to be done was to give practical effect to it. The city council at once granted the Western Pacific a franchise for fifty years to the southernmost strip (1,000 feet wide) of the water-front for its mole, at a nominal rental—just substantial enough to keep its title of landlord clear.

The next step was to settle the details of an agreement with the Southern Pacific by which that company would be within the law as defined by the court's decision. That company does not wish to appeal the case, and its attorneys, working with the Board of Works (the mayor, city attorney, and city engineer) of Oakland, agreed upon a tentative scheme of readjustment. This scheme, in rough outline, was presented to the city council for consideration as a basis of discussion, and is known as the "memorandum of agreement."

The "Memorandum of Agreement."

Under this agreement the Southern Pacific acknowledges the city's title to the water-front; accepts its own position as a tenant, and not as owner; agrees to relocate the shore-line or "low-tide line of 1852," which has long been in dispute, and to accept a location of it much nearer to dry land than it has ever claimed; agrees to grant ways of access to that part of the water-front which the city reserves to its own uses; agrees to deed to the city of Oakland the Broadway wharf and the land on which it stands, thus closing litigation of fifteen years' standing; and makes various other minor concessions. In return, the city is to lease to the Southern Pacific its present mole and wharf frontage, and about 150 feet more in width, making about 1,300 feet in all, on the same terms as the Western Pacific's lease.

Charter Amendment.

The city charter expressly forbids the granting of more than 1,000 feet frontage. The city administration has proposed an amendment to the charter to permit the extra frontage to be granted to the Southern Pacific. Dr. Jackson declares that this grant will reduce the city's holdings to a frontage of 485 feet. The mayor declares that the terms of the amendment expressly provide that 1,085 feet are reserved to the city.

The election upon charter amendments takes place on the publication date of this paper.

and this amendment (besides seven others relating to salaries, the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and the manner of selecting library trustees) will be voted upon. The fate of this amendment may forecast the result of the general election on Monday, as the administration has not been attacked strongly except upon this one point.

Upon this issue Mayor Mott has the support of the best-informed men in Oakland, and of the political leaders of the anti-railroad forces. He is the regular nominee of both the Republican and Democratic parties, and is endorsed by the Citizens' Municipal League. Doctor Jackson is on the ballot as an independent candidate by petition, and as the nominee of the Citizens' Party, organized by his friends, to carry on the fight against the Mott administration.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

When I Am Dead.

When I am dead, and men, with voices low, Remark: "I knew him well. Quite commonplace.
He was not in our set at all, you know.
What 'll you take? Did Blingum win the race?"
Or, "You don't say! He might have been—but, then,
His hair was short, the bluff he would not play,
And so—say, did you hear that Duff again Was short?" How do the markets look today?"
In short, when I am dead, the world, I hear,
Will still move on in ways that cheer or grieve,
And will not miss me from my earthly sphere—
But I can scarce believe.
Ah, no, I can't believe. What, after all My wobbling round, you dare to tell me that
My utmost wobble was a feeble sprawl!
That none shall murmur, "Wonder where he's at!"
Come off, I say! This racket and furor
That I term life—and you term it the same—
Is but as powder wholly wasted, for
All it brings down is soon forgotten game?
Go, tell it to marines! This mighty splash
We make, or think we make, does but deceive?
Is but a cipher claiming it's a dash?
Go to! I'll not believe.

Where the Critic Went Wrong.

"A poet," said the Critic, "must portray the deeper feelings, the profounder emotions, of humanity, or his work will be found lacking in that imperfectly recognized quality which is essential to true poetry."

"But who is to decide whether it succeeds in such portrayal?" The Poet inquired.
"We will," the Critic responded.
"But don't you fancy that you critics often go astray in judging the emotional quality of a poem?"

"No, I think not; at least, very rarely."
"Well, I wish you would give me your idea of the expression of feeling in a recent production of my own."

"Go ahead."

The poet went ahead, as follows:

"Oh, the little white form was strangely fair
As she tenderly laid it low,
And she stood for a moment in silence there,
Alone, ere she turned to go.
Then her voice rang out in a wearisome cry,
Re-echoed by voices shrill,
And the world rolled on 'neath the same blue sky.

Though the little white form was still.

"Has that the emotional quality?" the Poet inquired.

"It certainly has, in considerable degree,"
the Critic replied.

"More than if I had simply said, The hen laid the egg, went away and cackled?"

"The hen?" said the Critic. Then he stopped, thought deeply for a moment, and again spoke.

"It's on me," he said. "What'll you take?"
So they adjourned.

A Matter of Choice.

There are just two clans on the planet round,
Two clans, and never another.

"Look out for yourself" is the motto of one;
"Of the other, 'Look out for a brother'."

And, seeing as gold is a mighty poor prop
For a coffin, though epitaphs flatter,
Why, you may belong to such clan as you will,
But I will enlist with the latter.

"Did you hear that P. Gasus hasn't written a line of poetry for more than a month?"

"No, what ails him? Muse fall down on him?"

"No. He had his hair cut."

Lo, the Commuter!

He riseth in the morning early, for the alarm clock, it calleth him.

And while he is yet in bed he saith, "Dern that alarm clock! Will it never let up?" But when he has arisen, he blesteth the alarm clock, for his job, he fain would hold it.

And he knoweth 10,000 people who go over on the boats with him, yet he speaketh not to one of them save when he steps on his corn, and the word he speaketh then, it were better unsaid.

And the man commuter looketh at the neat girl in gray, and, lo, he wondereth ever and anon what is her name and if she is as nice as she looks.

And the neat girl in gray looketh demure,
and what she wondereth no man may guess, but only a sister woman who also wondereth things she saith not.

The commuter doth not fight for a chance to hang to the edge of a United Railways car.

Nor doth the conductor order him to move up when seven women already have murmured that he was a brute for moving up when there was no room.

Wherefore, brethren, though it paineth at times, it is well to be a commuter.

When Sets the Sun.

When sets the Sun beyond our Gate
I see a million ripples run
To greet him ere the day is done,
Each with a sunbeam as its freight.

He is their lord, his courtiers they,
And so they haste o'er lambent ways,
With lowly-murmured songs of praise,
To hail him Monarch of the Day.

Upon his throne of ashen gray
He listens to their voices blent,
And straight a flush of proud content
Creeps to his face and holdeth sway.

Then all the western world turns red,
Responsive to the monarch's flush,
And unseen artists wield a brush
To crimson-paint the skies o'erhead.

The wondrous fire, the fire of God,
Leaps outward still from cloud to cloud,
Till burns and burns each misty shroud
As 'twere a carpet angel-trod.

And then the gold! Such gold as greets
The eyes of loving ones who stand,
Time-severed from this earthly strand,
And view fair Aiden's storied streets.

Then purple, purple! All the west
Is royal-garbed to greet its king,
And purple is the freight they bring.
The rippling messengers of rest.

A world of sombre sea and shore.
The sun is not; his gold is gone
To 'wait the Artist of the Dawn—
The daily miracle is o'er.

The Opinions of Rufus.

When the fellers that has faint hearts looks at some of the fair ladies the other kind wins they orto feel that shyness ain't a unmixed curse.

The meanness of graspin' wealth is gen'ly admitted, but its admitted a lot the loudest by them that ain't grasped any.

Don't you s'pose this would be a blessed word of we was ready to excuse other people's wrong-doin's es we are our own?

A man can forgive a man, and he can forgive a woman. A woman can forgive a man, but, es Sister Boggins says, they's some things you can't expect of a fair sex that respects itself.

The old theologians used to say they's a bourn from which no trav'ler returns, but they made the unforchnit mistake of leavin' the "o" out of "bourn."

Speakin' of our talkative friends, did you ever notice that the cow that moos the most ain't gen'ly the one that gives the most milk?

David said in his haste that all men are liars, but I don't know es I blame him fer never takin' the time to take it back.

I swell up with pride when I think what wonderful things man has invented since I kin remember. That is, I do till I notice they ain't a one of them that tells me why I'm here or where I'm goin'; then I sort o' un-swell.

The poet said, "Be up and doin'." "Doin' who?" asked the higher-up. An' so, Hiram, you see the difference 'tween vishunary an'
practical interludes.

Our Statesmen's Own Boozeroom.

Speaking of that room in the state capitol building in which red liquor is said to flow so freely, and also of the "statesmen" who visit it—

How clear to his heart is that room in the statehouse,
Where other dry "statesmen" invite him for cheer.

That dark little room in our own whisky-straight house.

Devoted to cocktails, absinthe and beer,
The wide disregard of the law that pervades it,
The utter debauch of statutes—w'at t'ell!—
The brandy that cheers and the whisky that shades it.

In the queer little boozeroom some "statesmen" know well.

Our queer little boozeroom,
Our law-be-blown boozeroom,
California's own boozeroom

Some "statesmen" know well.

Be a Knocker.

(A modern litany.)

When Wrong is militant and defiant, and lifts its brazen brow in seeming triumph,
Be a knocker.

When the hand of the briber is gilded by ill-gotten gold, and justice calls upon her people to arm in her defense,
Be a knocker.

When the thing called Law dallies not with the poor scoundrel who is bribed, convicting him in short order, but leaves the wealthy bribing malefactor outside prison doors through months and years,
Be a knocker.

Against seaptered iniquity that would own the people by right of purchase,
Be a knocker.

Against all bondage of corruption, whether its fetters be of gold or iron,
Be a knocker.

Against the higher-up or the lower-down whose unregenerated existence is a constant menace to the country we love,
Be a knocker.

Then, having knocked righteously and successfully, of all that is good, all that is true and all that is right,
Be—not a knocker, but a booster.

For, forever and forever, to knock wrong is to boost right, and the converse of the proposition is no less true.

She Wanted to Know.

There was a young lady of Worcester
Was fond of a stolid old rooster.

When eggs went up high
She murmured: "Oh, my!

Why don't it lay eggs like it useter?"

His Sufficient Reason.

"Have you carefully examined the bill that was introduced?"

"I have not."

"Then what makes you so confident that you are right in opposing it?"

"Why, Grove L. Johnson favors it."

Lying Awake at Night.

You wake in the night with a sudden start. One moment you are sound asleep, the next you never were more wide awake in your life. "I am sorry I waked," you say, "but it doesn't matter, I'll just turn over and go right to sleep again." That's where you fool yourself. You turn over, but you fall to thinking things, and you have to stay awake in order to think them.

In the first place you think of every mean thing you ever did. It is an unpleasant subject, and you would sooner not think of it, but you do, anyway, and soon you begin to feel that your hope of salvation is mightily slim; make up your mind that it would be a waste of effort to save any such individual as you.

But worse is coming: You begin to realize, beyond the possibility of doubt, that all your plans, hopes and ambitions are going to eternal smash. You try to figure out how you can avoid this general catastrophe, but it is "no go;" you are certain that misfortune and you are going to collide in general wreck of your plans.

This is the time that you select for wondering what hour of the night it is. You are confident that you have been awake two hours or more, and yet the clock hasn't struck. Dern that clock! It probably needs repairs, but you will wait a while, and see. You wait, and wait, and wait. Hours creep into eternities, and still the clock does not strike. At last, worn out with infinite waiting, you determine that you will rise and see if there is any dratted timepiece in the house that will tell you what time it is. You do so, and just as you are rubbing your shins after falling over the chair that was in your way, the clock strikes three. Then you sneak back into bed, without turning on the light, and tell your inquiring wife that you got up for exercise.

You lie awake, toss and roll, for a long time, but finally drop off to sleep, and when the time comes for you to get up in the morning you never were so sleepy in your life. You can't sleep when you wish to do so, and you must get up when you can, and—does anybody know an infallible remedy for insomnia?

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

"You shouldn't speak so crossly to him," the wife remonstrated.

"Oh, he don't mind; he's a collector," growled the Man-with-Eyes-and-Ears-Open.

"Yes, but he's human."

Of course, he hadn't thought of that.

Consider the case of the much-maligned book-agent. I have seen good housewives discern his presence a block away, by his opening every gate on the street, and his rapidly backing away from most of the doors. These housewives have drawn the blinds, muffled the bell, and hid the baby in a closet till he passed by, rather than open the door and turn him gently but insistently away.

But who knows the book-agent as a human being, as the footsore traveler returned to his lair at the end of day, weary and disappointed and depressed? Here is a very different fellow from the alert enthusiast who besieged your door. For the book-agent is an artist; he has the temperament and the moods. To work, he must feel the fever on him, and he must be keyed just right. Then he is a psychologist, almost a hypnotist.

"How do you approach a person?" I asked once.

"I never know till the door opens," he replied. "If a lady appears—I mean a real lady—I am Chesterfield. I bow low, and say 'Madam, may I have the distinguished honor to be allowed to show you this set of books?'"

"If a rough-neck laborer comes out, I say, 'Have you got this set of books in your house? No? Then you are the biggest fool I ever saw.'"

This man sells to half the people he talks to. He does not know what is in the books he sells; doesn't care to know. "I could sell rusty horse-shoes just as easily, for the same price."

Another of his craft works only two hours a day—from twelve to two. He wears a silk hat and correct clothes, rides to his victim's offices in a cab, and presents an engraved card at the door. He sells no books that bring less than $500 a set. His commission is 10 per cent., and he averages two sales a day when he will work, and, like most professional book-agents, he has to borrow on Saturday night.

A much humbler agent works the wholesale houses. He slips in, takes off his coat, and tries to appear like an employee. Gradually he "works" the real employees. In one day he was thrown out of the same store three times, but returned, undaunted, through a second-story window in the rear. And yet, in his heart, that man is bashful, timid. He lays off days at a time to nerve himself for the rebuffs he must encounter.

Which is by way of showing that most people are human, even book-agents.

And even the chatterboxes may have some excuse. One of them (a woman) bored me to the limits of patient gallantry one evening. Afterwards I learned that she had drifted out to sea a few years before, from a capsized boat, floating motionless on her back by sheer will, and hearing three companions who could swim cry for help and, exhausted, go gurgling to the depths beside her. She was rescued three miles from shore; and she has been taking ever since to keep the nightmare of that experience from her mind. Since I heard her story I have tried to extend the limits of my patience a little more.

San Francisco will be called "the White City" some day, if the popularity of white glazed-tiled fronts continues. To a casual observer, fully half of the business buildings that are just now being completed are gleaming piles of whiteness. One can weave all sorts of fanciful symbolisms of this fact, each depending on one's digestion, or one's point of view. San Francisco rising pure from the ashes of political degradation; San Francisco, the moral "whited sepulchre"; San Francisco, the bright city of light-hearted pleasure—or what you will.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Marry at Leisure After a hearing by one of the legislative committees on the subject of divorce, during which diverse opinions found expression, there developed a sentiment in favor of trying to stop the cause rather than to cure the evil. A committee bill was outlined to go back to the old plan of proclaiming the bans, only the scheme would be to modernize by substituting public advertising of the intention to get married for proclamation at the church door or from the pulpit. This is on the theory that "marry in haste, repent at leisure," contains the explanation of many matrimonial failures, as it undoubtedly does. Also, it would give older and wiser heads a chance to break up some foolish matches before they are consummated. To pass such a measure as this and to enforce it would be a statesmanlike act, but it is to be feared that it would be demanding too much of a California legislature, so opposed it is to a general sentiment that these things are matters of private arrangement with which the law should not interfere. As a California young woman put it, "If John and I choose to get married, it is nobody's else business."

Taxation Amendment Is Still In Doubt

It is still uncertain what will be the fate of the taxation constitutional amendment, which has been revised by the State Commission on Revenue and Taxation by making the public service corporations liable on account of outstanding public bonds, requiring them to pay their share of any general property tax levied for state purposes, giving the legislature power to change the rates, and a number of less important amendments. The bankers combined and made an onslaught on the proposed rate on bank taxation, viz.: 1 per cent, with the result that they persuaded the majority of the Senate committee to report an amendment to cut the rate down to six-tenths of 1 per cent.; a minority of the committee stood for three-quarters of 1 per cent. It is possible the amendment may pass both the Senate and Assembly in this form, but it remains to be seen whether, if it does, the reduction in the rate of taxes on banks is going to popularize the measure before the mass of voters.

Good News If It Be True

Supporters of the Stetson railroad bill continue to hope that it has a fighting chance, but that is all they claim for it. The Southern Pacific is leaving no stone unturned to sidetrack the measure and put one of the rival railroad bills to the front. Attorney-General Webb, who is the real author of the Stetson bill, defended it at a joint meeting of the Corporations Committees, dealing specially with the claim of the railroad people that under the present constitution the only kind of rates the Railroad Commission can fix are maximum rates. He showed how the section of the constitution was evolved by the constitutional convention from a number of propositions before it and made a rather strong case of inferential evidence that the constitution-makers thought they were getting away from maximum rates, which had been the basis of much unsatisfactory rate legislation under the old constitution. Incidentally, those who ought to know say the Attorney-General has broken entirely with the railroad, or they with him.

Will the Solons Skedaddle?

No subject has been exciting more interest recently than that of the date of adjournment of the legislature. Senator Wolfe, and some others, talk about March 13th, and desire to pass a resolution now to fix that date. But this strikes against all those who have bills on file, or still in committees, which they wish to pass before adjournment, and they are making the covert charge that there is an attempt to do legislative politics by proposing an impossibly early date of adjournment. They argue that it would be an especially bad showing for the first legislature under the salary schedule of $1,000 per session if it should run away without waiting to finish up its work, and they say, with a good deal of truth, that the $1,000 was only obtained by promising that if the people would vote for it the legislature would stay and complete its work. Again, there are supporters of the direct primary and the railroad rate regulation measures who think they see in early adjournment an effort to beat these bills by indirection. With the exception of the anti-race track bill, the important measures of the session have been held in committee an unconscionably long time—inasmuch that their success is considerably jeopardized.

The Man Who Knows

This legislature, providing the Governor stands for it, will have given the farmers one new thing of no small importance. It has passed a bill to abolish the old three-headed county horticultural commissions and to substitute a single commissioner in each county which has a commission at all. Not only this, but the county commissioners must have expert knowledge, as determined by an examination of candidates to be conducted by a State Board of Horticultural Examiners who were to be appointed by the Governor. Although county boards of supervisors are to appoint the county commissioners, they must select only persons who have successfully passed the examinations held by the state board. County commissioners will be auditors and inspectors, and no more are needed. Thus the consolidation of authority effected by abolishing the old State Board of Horticulture, six years ago, is now followed by a similar centralization in the counties. There was rather formidable opposition to the bill, and but for energetic work by its sponsors it would not have passed. If California has one need that exceeds all others it is for the services of the man who knows to take the place of the man who merely does politics.

Tinkering the Constitution

An even fifty constitutional amendments were introduced in the Senate, and thirty-one in the Assembly. Anthony of San Francisco is the dearest of this kind of legislation, and has proposed to amend the constitution no less than eleven times. If he could have his way there would not be much left which would be recognizable of the charter of liberties of our commonwealth when Anthony should get through, although the constitution of California is nearly four times as long as that of the United States there are those who wish to see it made longer. There are others who would like to make it over new, but not until California achieves freedom from corporation control will it be safe to enter upon the making of a new organic law.

First Blood For Otis

Assemblyman Otis of Alameda county succeeded in getting a favorable report on his bill to give the State Board of Charities supervisory authority over orphan institutions, and it is to be hoped the proposition will succeed, although probably it will encounter no serious prejudice. This movement is prompted by no spirit of enmity toward the many benevolent institutions who are caring for orphans in this state, but rather by a disposition to aid them in better doing the work that is needed to be done while relieving them of some work that can better be done some other way. Every friend to dependent childhood should help Assemblyman Otis with A. B. 954.

Self Government For Our Counties

There is no greater fear in legislation than that of making county government bills. It is a departure from the self-governing theory and a surrender of charter-making to courthouse rings throughout the state. This is why Assemblyman Drew's bill, authorizing counties to form their own schemes of government by boards of freeholders elected for that purpose, was so promptly voted down, yet Mr. Drew's purpose is sound and right and the tax-paying public will one day come to see it. Some uniformity in the government of counties there should be, but, arising from a skeleton of such a government, the counties themselves should work the problem out as best they may. A demand for home rule for the counties of California is strictly in order.

Acquiring National Forest Reservations

A year ago the United States Senate passed a bill empowering the government to purchase deforested lands in the Appalachian and White mountains suitable for reforestation and then to convert the purchased areas into forest reservations, but Uncle Joe Cannon of the United States Senate Legislation, would not have it that way. Since then public pressure has made him more tractable and he has allowed a bill to go through the House of Representatives permitting the government to make such purchases, not alone in the Appalachians or White mountains, but wherever desired whenever Uncle Sam has the money to buy with. That is likely to be the sticking point, but not always. Our national deficit is likely to be converted into a surplus with the revival of business. There is one danger and only one—that "swindlers" will be formed for selling bare rocks and impossibly bad lands to the government for want of any other purchaser. That will have to be looked out for.

The Organization In The Last Ditch

On Monday afternoon the Senate passed the direct primary bill without a dissenting vote and without debate. Opposition in that branch of the legislature was abandoned as soon as it was proven that the measure had more than two-thirds of the votes. In the Assembly a struggle is looked for. The worst, and only serious, feature of it is that it is likely not to be an open and honest fight. The air is thick with rumors of what the performers are going to do to the reformers, and although the plan of campaign is closely guarded by the organization, it is not doubted that the machine will make the fight of its life if it can see any chance to win by indirection or shifty device. The friends of the bill are preparing to organize the same kind of non-partisan combination which saved it in the Senate, and if they do together as well as the senators did, the victory is as good as won.

Simple Justice To Sacramento

When, four years ago, graft was discovered in the state Senate, Sacramento county, for the first time in half a century, established the precedent of treating legislative grafters like other malefactors, sent true bills against them, prosecuted them, sent two to prison, acquitted one through a faulty jury and chased the fourth out of the state for the good of the state. The organization legislators looked upon this as a piece of effrontery on the part of Sacramento. To discourage the following of so bad a precedent they refused to reimburse Sacramento county for the $14,597.39 those prosecutions cost, tried to move the state capital and bluffed the county out, two years ago, of having the jury look into the conduct of Hatton, and others, as to their connection with the capital removal bill. A bill has now passed the Assembly to make good this deficiency in Sacramento's finances. If the Senate does not pass it also it will be for one reason only—that it does not want Sacramento county grand juries poking their noses into legislative scandals.

ROOSEVELT.

By Henry Anderson Laffer.
(Written for The California Weekly.)

His meteor-light is in the skies
Of all the earth. Her peoples turn
Their lifted faces where doth burn
His star of chartless destinies.

No trumpets blared upon his birth.
No heralds uttered forth his name;
But who shall measure now his fame—
One equal with the ends of earth.

Not even the desert-borders bar
The running murmurs of his might;
The kings of lands deep sunk in night
Send gifts and greetings from afar.

Yet not austere his greatness stands,
Nor strange with scorn the gods avow;
The sweat of toil is on his brow.
The stains of earth are on his hands.

Bold, restless, turbulent, and strong,
Bone of a boastful people's bone,
His strength amid the crowd hath grown
To might that cows the eyes of Wrong.

Unwearied, stubborn-tempered, brash,
He holds the gazing multitude
With his rough Saxon hardihood,
And wisdom only seeming-rash.

His was the strength behind the sword
That cleaves the continents in twain,
In Asian lands a bloody rain
Ceased at his timely-peaceful word.

The ancient grace of motherhood
New reverence won from his straight speech,
And all his will is bent to teach
Clean honor and high fortitude.

His might hath brought to needy lands
The munnings treasures of the snow—
Streams that from mountain-caverns flow
Through forests guarded by his hands.

And aye, in truth, what dawn hath found
His loins ungirt for strong affray?
The weary waning of what day
Hath seen him cast his steel to ground?

How filled the high-set tourney-list,
And fought how many a stubborn fight!
How oft he surged upon our sight
Close-locked with his antagonist!

And quiet-blooded wisdom grieved,
And feared of timeless strength would spring
Some evil and disastrous thing;
And, whiles, the doubtful half believed;

As when his quick unbitted tongue,
On short enkindlement of fire,
Cast, sudden-swift, its phrase of fire—
A gage of battle hotly flung.

Yet when we saw him ever rise
From struggle, with some spoil of Good,
And how the nation's honor stood
Yet higher in far peoples' eyes,

We could not choose but grant him praise,
And deem in ways occult, unguessed,
Of hoary sages unpossessed,
He held the End within his gage;

And secretly the gods of birth
A subtle strength had yielded him,
And made him equal to the dim
Young giants of the elder earth!

To-day he passes among men—
Unscripted, lays the sceptre by—
His beacon fades upon our sky—
The President is Citizen!

"Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy."

Wallace Irwin began his literary career as a reporter on a San Francisco daily paper little more than ten years ago, and it still is a tradition among the employees of that paper that the city editor used to shake his head most dolefully when Irwin turned in his "stuff," and mumble, "He can write something that looks like poetry, but he can't write prose any more than a hen can swim."

The city editor was mistaken, as sometimes happens even to those sapient individuals. Wallace Irwin could write prose, of his own peculiar, racy style, but reporting on a daily paper did not give him much opportunity to demonstrate the fact. The field of prose wherein his odd genius flourishes is that of humor and satire, as the "Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy" amply indicate, for they abound in these qualities.

Most subjects which satire may touch, from "Hon. Mary Christmas" to "The Servant Problem," and from "The Feetsteps of Science" to "Fall Hats and the Ladies Inside of Them," are treated in a style as unique as humorous. The book—for the letters now have been published in book form—is of the style to lighten various half-hours, but not to be taken in one dose. Wisely scattered, or taken homeopathically, it should be found an excellent antidote to melancholia.

SAN FRANCISCO'S VIEW OF HETCH-HETCHY

By J. D. GALLOWAY.

The subject of a water supply for San Francisco has taken on renewed interest since the recent election in which the city voted, by a majority of over six to one, to develop a supply from the Hetch-Hetchy valley in the Sierra Nevada mountains. That it is the immediate concern of the people of the bay cities to take steps towards an increased supply is not disputed. Mr. Dockweiler, an engineer of wide experience who has made a special study of the problem, stated recently that in one year the cities of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda would demand more water than the present plant could possibly supply, and that San Francisco would be in the same condition in about three years. Many engineers believe that the time is less than three years. A review of the situation is of interest.

The Present Supply.

San Francisco has always been supplied with water by a private corporation. An attempt was made, years ago, to buy out the Spring Valley Water Works, but an agreement was not reached. San Francisco and New Orleans remain as the last instances of large cities supplied with water by private companies. A considerable reason for this has probably been the fact that the Spring Valley Water company has with commendable foresight, anticipated the wants of the city and extended its works. The supply has been reasonably good, and hence the opposition to the monopoly has not been as pronounced here as elsewhere. A point has been reached, however, when the situation demands that the municipality undertake the work of supplying itself with water. The water company refuses to make extensions in the light of possible municipal ownership, and also because it is claimed that the rate regulation by the city does not allow sufficient income to warrant the increased expenditure. Such is the present situation. The local company cannot, or will not, take action to meet the growing demand.

The city, recognizing this fact, is endeavoring to secure a supply elsewhere. During the administration of Mr. Phelan, in 1900-1902, an examination of many sources was made by Mr. Grunsky, then city engineer. Mr. Grunsky acted under Mr. Manson and Colonel Mendel, then commissioners of public works. The result of this examination was that the Tuolumne river, in the Sierra Nevada, was selected as the best source of supply. The Hetch-Hetchy valley, on the main river, was designated as a site for a storage reservoir and, in addition, Lake Eleanor, on a tributary stream, was also to be used. Elaborate surveys, with detailed estimates of cost, were made by Mr. Grunsky for this project.

City's Efforts to Obtain Water.

To carry out this project Mr. Phelan, acting for the city, took up the water rights, and application was made by the city to the national government through the Secretary of the Interior for a right to use the Hetch-Hetchy valley as a storage reservoir, as the valley lies in the Yosemite National Park and Forest Reserve. The application was denied. A second application by the city met with refusal.

About this time began the beneficent reign of Schmitz and Ruef. A water supply, the source of which could be obtained without cost, had no attractions for those gentlemen. They had the board of supervisors go through the form of abandoning the Tuolumne source of supply as a preliminary towards getting one that would cost the city about $10,000,000. The refusal of the engineers, Messrs. Marx, McKinstra and Hunt to take orders from Ruef and the "pernicious activities" of Mr. Spreckels and associates stopped that deal before it could be completed. Dr. Taylor took office, the project of getting water from the Tuolumne river was revived, and another application was made to Secretary Garfield. Mr. Garfield visited San Francisco, listened to the claims of the Turlock and Modesto Irrigation districts and, after adjusting their claims, gave the city the required right to use the storm waters of the river and to store them in Hetch-Hetchy valley and Lake Eleanor.

Practically all of the lands in Hetch-Hetchy valley were in private ownership, having been taken up before the creation of the park. San Francisco has purchased these lands and, when buying them, had also to buy other lands not in the valley but in the surrounding forest reserve. The original owner insisted on selling all or none of his lands. Mr. Garfield suggested that the city exchange its lands outside the valley for the lands still in the possession of the government and lying around the edge of the valley. A bill was introduced in the present Congress permitting this exchange of lands by which both city and the government gain what they want.

Spring Valley and the "Nature Lovers."

To this bill a violent storm of opposition has arisen, mainly inspired by the Spring Valley Water company. The attorney for the company has appeared before committees of Congress and argued against the bill. The records have been cluttered with letters from all over the union protesting against the use of the valley as a reservoir. The self-appointed leader of the so-called nature lovers is one Johnson, a sub-editor of the Century Magazine. Some members of the Sierra Club have also been active in their efforts to defeat the aspiration of their city to free itself from the water monopoly. The most absurd statements have been made: that it was a scheme of politicians to loot the city; that the government was being robbed of water power worth untold millions; that the government had no right to give this Garden of Eden, the valley, into the hands of despoilers; and so on. Statements of the ability of the city to get water elsewhere in the Sierra Nevada or from the Spring Valley company have been made in utter ignorance of conditions as they exist. The editor of a literary magazine has become in a day an authority upon the water possibilities and requirements of a great city and from a source which he has never seen. No hesitation has been shown in distorting the statements of engineers in order to prove the exact opposite of the meaning of the statement. Cretaceous mud may as well appear as advocating other sources because, in a report made thirty-four years ago, he examined a number of sources for the city. Yet the veracious opponents ignore the fact that it was while Colonel Mendel was commissioner of public works that Mr. Grunsky, reported on and selected the Hetch-Hetchy valley as the most favorable site and source of supply. This is given here merely as a sample of the distorted statements which are being urged upon Congress and against which the representatives of the city are struggling.

Questions and Answers.

The city has voted overwhelmingly in favor of the Hetch-Hetchy project and our bill is now in Congress. So the matter rests at present. A number of valid questions have been raised in the discussion which it will be of interest to examine briefly.

Why not continue getting water from Spring Valley?

This is a question the people have settled. The problem of water supply is too big for a company to take care of, and the experience of American cities is against private control of water supply.

Why not buy the Spring Valley company and develop their sources, which they claim will yield 109,000,000 gallons a day?

The representatives of the city are willing to buy the properties of the company at a reasonable price. The charter compels the city to ask of the company a price for which they will sell. They have repeatedly refused to name a price. Some tentative offers were advanced when Captain Payson was president, but these have been withdrawn. The purchase of the company is advised by engineers, as their reservoirs are needed at this end of the long pipe from the mountains and their distribution system is needed in the city.

Litigation Threatens Spring Valley Supply.

The city now owns about 33,000,000 gallons of water a day. Spring Valley can supply about 35,000,000 gallons a day from its present development. They own reservoir sites on Alameda creek and tributaries, and claim to be able to develop 109,000,000 gallons a day, mostly on this creek. Nearly one-half of the present supply—some 16,000,000 gallons—is drawn from the gravel beds of Alameda creek. These gravel beds underlie a rich farming region and the winter floods flow into the gravel beds and fertilize the farm lands. The water company has been drawing off this water and the lands have suffered. A number of lawsuits, asking damages and injunction, have been filed against the water company and more are to follow. A line of decisions in similar cases indicates judgment against the water company. It matters not whether the water is drawn out of the gravel beds or prevented by dams from running into them; the result is the same. Instead of being able to develop additional supplies on Alameda creek, the Spring Valley Water Company is fighting for the right to take what constitutes nearly one-half its present supply. If Spring Valley was purchased by the city the Hetch-Hetchy would still be necessary as a final solution of the problem.

If the city wants Spring Valley and the company will not sell, why not condemn the plant?

To condemn a private property, it must be shown that it will be put to a superior use. As the city will use the property for the same purpose, superior use cannot be shown. A bill has been introduced at Sacramento which will allow such property to be condemned, but some authorities doubt whether it be constitutional.

What is the use of owning a water supply? The constitution gives the supervisors the right to regulate rates. Why not depend upon that?

Good in theory, bad in practice. When the rates are what the company want, they agree. When they think the rates too low, they have a court issue an injunction and tie up the subject. Such has been the case for nine years, the rates of each year having been nullified by injunction. Oakland experienced the same trouble. There is no relief by this method.

If it be necessary to go to the Sierra Nevada, why not take some other river, or Lake Tahoe, and not despoil the Hetch-Hetchy valley?

The waters of Lake Tahoe are used on the government irrigation project at Fallon, and a contest is being waged with Nevada. The reservoir sites and the waters of all other possible rivers are in private ownership. On the San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Mokelumne, American, and Yuba rivers are large electric power plants which use the water. It is also used for irrigation. The development of the long distance transmission of water power by electricity was first started in this state. Private interests recognized its value and the rivers have all been secured. At Lake Eleanor a private company has claims.

If this be true, what is the meaning of the number of projects offered the city?

The charter compels the supervisors to entertain offers. It costs nothing to make an offer, and any one with a ditch and a mud puddle in the mountains can say he has a water supply. Of all the worthless projects which have from time to time been offered, there has been but one which had the backing of responsible men who based their offer on definite knowledge. That company was the Bay View Water company, who did make careful surveys, under an engineer, of a source on the American and Cosumnes rivers. Their

The Calhoun-case mountain, having labored through another week, has brought forth a diminutive mouse in the shape of another jury passed and subject to peremptory challenge. John T. Costello, an insurance man, is the possible juror who has been thus added to the list, and, at this writing he is the eleventh man in the box.

To attain this result—eleven prospective jurors, every man of them subject to peremptory challenge—1275 veniremen have been summoned, and two months of time have been consumed, all as incomplete part of a trial in which it was announced that no advantage would be taken of technicalities.

The day when the evidence will go to the jury still seems far away, and it will not be so strange as regrettable if another month shall pass before it is here.

Doctors have disagreed concerning the physical condition of Theodore V. Halsey, the indicted official of the Pacific States Telephone company. Those who are employed by him announce that he is suffering from incipient tuberculosis and that the wound due to an operation for appendicitis has not healed. On the contrary, physicians appointed by the court report that Halsey shows no signs of tuberculosis and that the wound has healed. In the face of such a disagreement on the part of the learned, Judge Dunne has decided that he will call the case from time to time until he is convinced that the defendant is able to endure trial.

Last Tuesday Judge Dunne imposed a sentence of seven years in San Quentin upon Michael W. Coffey, the former supervisor whom a jury found guilty of accepting a bribe of $4,000—in behalf of somebody—to vote for the overhead-trolley franchise. A sentence of five years' imprisonment might have been imposed, but Assistant District Attorney William Hoff Cook asked that justice be tempered by mercy, and so Coffey's time was reduced to seven years. The case will be appealed.

District Attorney Bullock of San Mateo county, charged with misfeasance in office, was acquitted by a jury last Saturday. The trials of the other officials under indictment will be pushed to a conclusion.

price for their rights and some construction—not for a pipe line and accessories—was over $10,000,000.

If water must be taken from the Tuolumne, why is it necessary to turn Hetch-Hetchy valley into a lake? Why not take water from the river?

The summer flow of the river belongs to the irrigation districts below. The reservoir is needed to store the winter flood water, which is the only water the city can take. There is no other storage reservoir site available. There is ample water but few storage sites.

Would not the government be giving to San Francisco water rights worth many millions of dollars if it used to develop electric power? All the water-power which can be developed will be used to pump the same water over the Altamont summit of the Coast Range. If any excess power be developed it must, by the terms of the grant, be sold to the irrigation districts at cost for pumping water. Talk of private enrichment from this source is sheer nonsense.

I have never been to Hetch-Hetchy. Where is it and what is it like?

It is northwest of, and about a day's journey from, the Yosemite valley. It is about three quarters of a mile wide and five miles long. The cliffs and waterfalls are inferior to the Yosemite. It is off the main line of travel up into the mountains. It can only be reached by trail. The lower end of the valley is a swampy field producing in summer innumerable mosquitoes. It can be visited in July, August and September, but at other times is inaccessible because of snow or mosquitoes. If used as a reservoir, the entire valley would be flooded and made a mountain lake.

If made into a lake, would not the trails through the valley into the higher mountains be obliterated?

No. Under the terms of the grant, the Secretary of the Interior has ruled that he can compel the city to rebuild the trail connections around the valley.

If San Francisco uses the water of the Tuolumne, will it not be insisted that people be kept off the watershed which lies in the higher mountains? These mountains are some of the grandest in America, and will not this prevent their enjoyment by the entire people to whom this park belongs?

This question is the only one of any validity raised by the so-called nature lovers. To turn the valley into a lake would be but to substitute one form of natural beauty for another. To exclude the people from the upper Tuolumne would be a signal deprivation of a common right. No such idea is contemplated by the representatives of the city. The Park, which includes the mountains, is in the control of the government. It is guarded by soldiers and one is not now allowed entry. In the Yosemite Valley, which is in the same Park, the army restrictions prevent pollution of the water of the Merced river. This valley is visited by thousands each year and they suffer no hardship from this cause. Similar regulations are in force in the Tuolumne Meadows.

It is recognized that more and greater care is being taken by cities of their water supplies, but the term is a relative one. The big cities of the eastern states draw their supplies from districts populated by farms and villages. New York takes water from the Croton watershed, a farming region; Philadelphia from the Schuylkill, the sewer of other cities; St. Louis from the Mississippi, which receives, not far above, the Chicago drainage canal. There is no comparison between such sources and the snow fields of Mount Dana and Mount Lyell. Though thousands may visit the upper mountains, they will suffer no hardships by conforming to reasonable regulations of conduct such as now obtain in Yosemite.

Would it not be well if all the bay cities united in this project?

Yes. A bill introduced by representatives of San Francisco and Oakland has been presented at Sacramento allowing such united action.

Unanimous Sentiment Urgent Now.

Such is the water situation. The bay cities have practically reached the limit of their present supplies and the owners cannot or will not increase them. Although there is some disagreement, it is generally believed that the only permanent source of supply within the financial capacity of the city to obtain is the Hetch-Hetchy project. There are others in the Sierra Nevada, but it will need the purse of a Carnegie to buy out the private owners, and this the city cannot do. The Spring Valley company opposes the grant to the city, recognizing that the city would be in a better position to talk over the sale of that company's property. A most ignorant opposition has been aroused by the nature lovers, and Congress hesitates. San Francisco should recognize the urgency of the case, her hopeless situation without this source of supply, and let Congress learn in certain tones that she wants the bill to pass. Ultimately the valley will be given us and all the satisfaction the nature lovers will have is that they held back the project a certain time. They can also have the knowledge that they have added to the growing exasperation against government control of the forest reserves. Such reserves are not for the idle camper or tourist, but for the use of the millions of people who will never see them. That is their highest use, and it transcends the other use as far as the wants of the many ever exceed those of the few.

Long after we started talking of Hetch-Hetchy, Los Angeles commenced a project for a water supply from the Owens river. They purchased the water rights, obtained the government permission to use a storage site, voted their bonds, and now the returning traveler can see the aqueduct stretching across the Mohave desert, partly finished. We are still talking and fighting the enemies that are among us.

WHAT does a confirmed bachelor like you know about romance?" exclaimed one of the ladies to Major McCarthy, as they seated themselves upon the verandah of Colonel Armstrong's house in the Presidio. Dinner was over, and the other men had strolled off with their cigars, leaving McCarthy to entertain their wives and sweethearts. The evening was warm, and the verandah caught a little breeze that sprang up as the last dusky glow of sunset faded into darkness.

The Major was a young man for his rank—not more than thirty-three—but he had jumped a few grades for conspicuous gallantry in the Spanish war.

"Romance! Little enough I know about it; my greatest misfortune," and the Major bowed. "Still, I have seen the thing the poets talk about, the light that lies in woman's eyes—not for me," he added hastily. "A friend of mine. But that was years ago, and so, of course—"

"Oh, tell us about it!" the ladies cried. "Do tell us."

"New, Major, you mustn't refuse. To rouse our curiosity like that and leave it to itself."

And the ladies settled themselves, rustlingly, with an expectant finality that left the Major helplessly committed to his narrative.

Well, he began, it was while I was at West Point. My best friend in those days was John Wilkeson. He was a good ten years older than I, but I was rather old for my age then—you know how some boys are—and we had taken to each other from the time I was fifteen, and in high school, and he was just graduating from Harvard Law School. This was up in New Hampshire, where we were reared: Manchester, you know, where the big cotton mills are. John's father was the "agent," as they call the superintendent, of the Amoskeag Corporation that owns most of the mills. The old gentleman was pretty much of a grandee and didn't approve of John's intimacy with a wheelwright's son—but that hasn't anything to do with my story. John didn't care for that, anyhow.

Pretty soon he went to Boston to go into a law office, and I got my appointment to West Point. John had a hand in that—but that's out of the story, too. We kept up a correspondence, though, and pretty soon John wrote me that he was going to New York to strike out for himself in a bigger field. He did well, and by the time I was ready to graduate he had a pretty good practice.

He came up to the Point to see me blossom out a second lieutenant, and invited me down to spend the first week of my vacation with him.

"I'd ask you for longer, Mac," he said, "but I'm going to be married a week from Wednesday, and I want you to be my best man."

"What's this?" I roared.

"Remember Miss Warner, that visited the girls just before I came to Boston? Came down from New York for a week just after the strike."

I remembered, and I knew he had caught a beauty, and a fortune, too. Well, I went home with him. He had a second floor of an old farmhouse near Metuchen, New Jersey, fitted up for bachelor quarters, and he commuted on the Pennsylvania to New York.

Naturally, I didn't see much of him. We would go to town together in the morning, and I would walk from the ferry with him to his office in Nassau street, and then I would leave him and amuse myself around town all morning, lunch with him at the Hardware Club at noon, and not see him again till next morning. He spent his evenings with Her, of course, and I did mine at the theater.

The last Monday morning, though, he said to me, as we got on the train at Metuchen, "By the way, Mac, I want you to meet me at the office at five o'clock to-night. Miss Warner has a session with the dressmaker for this evening, and I've accepted an invitation for you and me from one of my Italian clients. I get a good deal of business through him, and he wants to give me a little farewell dinner, at Gonfalone's, down on Eighth street. Then we're to go to a dance in the Italian quarter on Lower Fifth avenue, below Washington Square, for the rest of the evening. You'll enjoy it. Don't forget. Five o'clock."

I was glad enough, of course, and agreed to be on hand. John handed me the World and he took the Sun, and we read the papers till we got to Jersey City. John was sitting next the aisle and got out of the seat ahead of me. As he got out, a slip of paper fluttered to the floor and I picked it up before following him. I glanced at it, looked again, and stuck it in my pocket. Evidently it wasn't his, for he had been sitting on it. So I didn't mention it to him. But it interested me, and I thought I would look at it more closely later. We parted at the head of Nassau square, and I took the "L" up to Herald Square, to take in the sights.

In the car I fished out that slip of paper and looked it over carefully. It was a curious colored bit of stationery, an odd shade of tan. On it, in a woman's handwriting, unmistakably, was written:

"This color. This perfume. 6:30 p. m., Monday."

I held it up and smelled it. The perfume was as odd as the color—an Old Worldly scent, delicate, but penetrating, and quite new to me. I read it again, smelled it again, and tossed it on the floor.

"Some lady with a fancy for old stationery," I thought, "who meant this for a sample, and noted the hour of delivery on it."

Broadway was pretty well lit up as John and I swung into it from Maiden Lane a few minutes after five. It was late fall, and dusk came early.

"Let's walk," said John. "This air is fine, and we'll be early at Gonfalone's at that. Let's see; it's only five five now. We'll have time to walk up to the Park and ride back before we're due for dinner."

So we struck out at a stiff pace to walk that five miles as an appetizer. By the time we got to Madison Square it was the best time to see the streets. Crowds upon crowds, lights everywhere, carriages jammed from curb to curb, restaurants crowded, theatrical signs glowing like bonfires. Above Herald Square there was less crowd and less light. That was before the Rialto moved up to Longacre.

At Fifth street I noticed a Longacre cab pass us and stop at the opposite curb a block ahead of us, and a woman step out and pay the driver. She stood on the corner and looked in both directions, and then crossed to our side of the street and stood under the glare of a street lamp. She was heavily veiled, and had her back toward us, but as she heard us come up behind her, she faced round. The wind blew her cloak back, disclosing an odd-colored tan waist, and she lifted her veil to her hat, and stepped directly in front of John, with her face showing full in the light of the lamp. She stood so for only a moment, her veil dropped, she thrust a slip of paper at John, and hurried off into the side street, buttoning her cloak, and leaving behind her the faint odor of a curious Old-Worldly perfume. It was the color and the perfume of the note I had read. I looked at my watch. It was exactly 6:30 o'clock.

I looked at John and his face was the oddest sight I have ever seen. Perplexity, embarrassment, and humor were all mixed up in his look. He handed me the slip of paper. On it was written, in the same handwriting,

"Look for me to-night. Watch."

"What do you mean of it?" asked John as I handed it back to him.

"Lots of things—or nothing," said I. "A warning, a threat, a lunatic, or an affair." "Lunatic is my guess," John said, and we walked on.

The dinner at Gonfalone's was a great success. Our host was a prosperous-looking Italian, rather handsome, middle-aged, and fat. We left the restaurant at eleven o'clock and walked across Washington Square, now silent and deserted. Below the square the street was darker and only the roof of an elevated train interrupted the visible chatter of Pontelli as we penetrated Little Italy. At a grimy doorway with a battered knocker we halted and turned in.

The ball was furiously in progress. Piano and guitars were doing the music, and the Italian wine had given the men the ardor of passion and the mood of gaiety. The women were dazzling. You know the Italian love for gorgeous color. That room was ablaze with it—costumes darily yellow and blue and red—splendid laughter, chatter, a dizzy whirl of humanity and a chaotic spectrum of gowns.

We were introduced, got partners quickly, and joined the dancers. I lost John, but after the dance, while refreshments were being served, I ran across him and Pontelli in a dark corner of the room, sitting alone. I joined them and we watched the couples promenading across the floor.

"If you're going to look for the lady to-night, we'd better be going," I laughed.

"No such foolishness," said John. "Never saw her before and never expect to again," and then we both snorted. Faintly, but unmistakably, an odd perfume came distinguishable from the musk and cologne that saturated the heavy air. Guiltily, we both looked about us in silence. A man and a woman on his arm, passed before us, the woman with her face turned to her escort, and away from us. She was dressed in tan.

Pontelli grasped John's arm. "Signor, look! Magnini! you have heard of him. They say—his voice fell to a whisper—"they say he is the leader of the Mafia."

"The Black Hand?"

"Si."

"And the girl?"

"His betrothed, Maria Antognini. They say her parents gave her to him through fear. She does not love him."

The couple had passed on to the end of the room, turned, and came back. As they came near, we could see the girl's face. We had seen it before—under the street lamp. But we had not realized that she was beautiful. She was stunning: big, black eyes; complexion perfect; the ideal of a brunette beauty. Pontelli stepped out, and spoke to the man. John sat like a statue. Pontelli beckoned to us and I stepped over. John stayed behind. Pontelli introduced me, as I stood facing Magnini, whose back was toward John. As we talked, the girl stepped back, turned away a moment, facing John, and then, ladies, I saw the wonder for the only time in my life—a look in the eyes that spoke the whole story of passion in a glance. I could see John's face, like a mask, in the shadow. The girl's eyes dropped, and she turned back to her point of departure, then at John, made a motion of drawing a purse from a pocket, gave a look of interrogation and then of menace, shook her head, drew her hand across her throat, and then, pointing at Magnini, shook her head warningly, and turned—that I look again at John.

It was the work of a second only, and she turned back to us and joined gayly in our conversation. Pontelli went back for John, and introduced him. I noticed Magnini, and I could see him sizing John up—face, figure, and all. Half an hour later we were on the street-car bound for the ferry.

"Did you ever hear from the Black Hand?" I asked.

"Yes, about six months ago. Wanted a thousand. But that's all rot, you know. I never heard any more about it."

"Until to-night," I said.

"Bosh!" John replied, and I dropped the subject.

The boat was nearly empty; only a few

"The Major's Story"—Concluded.

Italian laborers going across to join the night shift on the tunnel, and a solitary passenger in an automobile that had caught the boat at the last minute. We walked up and down the deck, in the dark. About midstream, as we turned at the end of the promenade to walk back, we were surrounded in silence by the laborers. Among them, we could dimly see the white outline of a dress-shirt.

I knocked down the man nearest me and John got another and we backed up against the deck house wall and kept hitting. There wasn't a sound, but we hadn't struck two blows before twenty policemen sped around the corner and evened the odds. Clubs and pistols and handcuffs finished the gang. We all rounded up in the light inside.

For God's sake, Mr. Wilkeson, how'd you get here?" asked the police captain, still puffing.

"That you, Jim?" asked John. "Pretty near got us, eh? How'd you happen around?"

"Sh! Tipped off by 'phone—a lady. Say, who's your friend?"

"Him?" pointing at me. "Naw! The signorita."

"Search me."

"Well, we've got the worst of the bunch this time, with the goods on him. Come here, Maggie," and the captain jerked the man in the dress suit around. It was Magnini!

He and John sized each other up again, in silence. Then Magnini whispered,

"So! Signorita tell. Sol!" and he drew his hand across his throat. "For her," he added.

We all took the same boat back to the city, and after we had seen Magnini locked up and John had sworn to the charge of blackmail and assault to commit murder, we took a cab.

"I'll have to find that girl and have her guarded," John said. We drove to Pontelli's, and got him out of bed to tell us Signorita Antognini's address. The house was lighted. John knocked, and an old man appeared.

"The girl is gone to the States," he said. "We have search all night. She ees not come home."

We went back to headquarters. A detective was detailed on the job.

"Tried the Morgue?" he asked.

"Morgue! Heavens, no!"

"I'll call 'em."

That ghastly idea had not occurred to us. The detective hung up the receiver.

"Nothing doing there," he said.

We breathed again. The detective got all the details from John, and then said:

"Go on to a hotel. You can't do anything till morning. I'll let you know what I find. Hotel Cambridge, you said?"

At breakfast I picked up a newspaper. The front page was full of the story of our adventure, and lurid descriptions of Magnini's escapades. I read them through, and turned to the next page. In an obscure corner was a small item:

"Unidentified Girl in the Morgue."

"The body of a girl was picked up in the Pennsylvania slip at Twenty-third street at 3 a. m., where it was seen floating by a deck-hand on the 'Pittsburgh.' The girl was evidently an Italian, and all the indications point toward suicide. The body has not been identified, the only clue being a ball gown of rather an unusual shade of tan."

I guess that tells the story, ladies.

"But, goodness, Major, don't stop there. What became of Magnini? Did they identify the girl? What became of Mr. Wilkeson?"

"The rest is very prosaic," protested the Major. "And unromantic. Magnini got twenty years. The girl was Maria. John married Miss Warner, and is very happy. But—that look, my-dear Miss Lord, was the point. I know romance when I see it do I not?"

"You said she gave Mr. Wilkeson that look that you saw, didn't you?"

"I did," replied the Major, solemnly. "To John—not me."

Automobile Notes.

Robert Guggenheim, of New York, has offered a trophy for a transcontinental automobile race with Seattle as the objective point, to be run during and under the sanction of the Alaska-Yukon Exposition. The continent has been crossed on seventeen different occasions. In 1903, Jackson and Crocker in a Winton, Fitch and Karup in a Packard, and Whitman and Hammond in an Oldsmobile made the trip from San Francisco to New York. Whitman again crossed the continent in 1904 using a Franklin car, with Carris as his companion.

In 1906 occurred the famous transcontinental race between two Oldsmobiles, named Old Scout and Old Steady. Huss and Wigle were matched in this event against Megargel and Stanchfield. The objective point of this race was Portland, Ore. Later in the same year Megargel accompanied by Fassett crossed the continent in a Reo, returning in 1906 by the southern route.

The ninth successful trip was made in the summer of 1906 by Gehr and Canfield, who reached Wenatchee, Wash., in a Glide at about the time that Whitman and Carris, veterans of the 1904 trip, started from San Francisco for New York in a Franklin. Little and Haggerty made a transcontinental trip in 1906, driving a Buick. Then 1907 was an off year and the possibilities of transcontinental touring were not revived until 1908, when a Thomas, Stutz and De Dion crossed the country.

J. M. Murdoch in a Packard went East from Los Angeles during the last summer while H. A. Hoover went over the road from Seattle in a Maxwell. Last summer also saw the round trip to San Francisco consummated, F. W. Work and C. J. Maxson crossing in an Oldsmobile. F. A. Trinke journeyed from Detroit to San Francisco and from Detroit to New York during the last year. The information culled during these journeys is now being digested and the route offering the least resistance will be selected for the contest for the Guggenheim trophy. It is hoped that a new record for speed across the continent will be established.

Alliterative Absurdities.

If you caught a capacious curate killing ciphers for the cook

In the cloisters with a club yclept a ceeper,
Would you say he was as wily

As a cunning crocodile
Catching cockles with a corkscrew in a creek?

If you beheld a battleboat bombarding Biscay Bay
While the big guns bellowed bold from brazen throat,

Would you say it was as funny
As a bouncing blue-back bunny

Blowing bubbles with a hobby in a boat?
If you saw a driving dreamer drowning duck

ling in a ditch,
And deducting data dry as dust to see,

Would you say that this death dealer
Was of ducks and drakes a stealer,
Or of Darwin's dead ideas a devotee?

PERSONALIA

Wallace Irwin's "Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy" were issued in book form last Friday by Doubleday Page & company.

Does the ditto in Laurence Ditto Young's name refer to either word in that author's newest novel "The Climbing Doom"? If so, which?

Julia Marlowe's hobby is book-binding, in which she became interested while sojourning in the German village of Nauheim, seeking relief from indigestion.

The sensation created by "Three Weeks" has hardly subsided in California, and now Elinor Glyn announces the forthcoming publication of a new novel, "Elizabeth Visits America."

Irvine Bacheller, F. Hopkinson Smith, and John Kendrick Bangs are associated on the lecture platform this season in a series of "dramatic" readings. Why dramatic?

Stanley Weyman, who wrote "Under the Red Robe" and a host of other good romances of the Middle Ages, announces that "The Wild Geese," just published, is the last novel he will write.

Ella Hamilton Durlay has written an answer to the exquisite "Lady of the Decoration," which she calls "My Soldier Lady," and in which she gives the Kentucky side of that appealing correspondence.

Miss Agnes Irwin, dean of Radcliffe college for women, has announced that she will lay down the duties of her office at the close of her fifteenth year, on the first of next September, in order to take a long vacation for rest and travel.

A reporter could ask no better luck.

James H. Collins, who writes the "business system stuff" for The Saturday Evening Post, is a slender, bespectacled young man who lived above Fleischmann's cafe, next to Grace church in New York for some time, beholding on one side the aristocratic worship-place of the business man, and, on the other, the bread-line that has formed nightly for years at the cafe's rear entrance.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be refuted, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

Constitutional Rights.

The world has been more familiar with wrongs than with rights. Born with it is there is an innate desire to compel others to do what we think they should do. Unchecked by a power of resistance equally strong with the power for aggression, tyranny results and tyranny is odious, and only less odious when it believes itself benevolent than when it knows itself to be predatory.

Against this tendency men have had to struggle. Against autocratic power in the hands of one person, who was abusing it, men first placed the ambitions of some other person eager to possess the same kind of power and, often, as prone to abuse it. Later, men learned to present an organized resistance to tyranny in the name of the collective good and, finally, in the name of personal liberty, so that each man's house became, metaphorically speaking, his castle, and no one could enter it against his will unless he had himself first transgressed the law. The rise of humankind, from a condition wherein the lives of all were held in the hollow of the hand of some autocrat, to the status of to-day, when each person goes forth in the conscious dignity of liberty regulated by law, is too long a story to be told here. It has been the struggle of the ages.

While the adoption of the Constitution of the United States was under discussion a movement began that soon resulted in adding ten amendments, nine of which were specifically intended to safeguard individual rights and to make those safeguards a part of the framework of government. To us, of this day, these precautions seem, as they seemed to the makers of the constitution, superfluous, being so written into the constitution of men as to make them unnecessary to be written into the framework of government, but the people felt better when they were safely written into the great document.

The first declaration in the first amendment is that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." It would seem inconceivable that any man should wish to oppress his brother in the name of our Heavenly Father, and especially in the name of one who sought always to "draw men unto him," but never to drive, and yet the most pitiless persecutions human history has known were inflicted "In His Name," not by one denomination alone but by nearly all. It required more than fifteen centuries for Christians to learn toleration for the religious views of others. All wanted religious liberty for themselves, but few wanted it for anyone except themselves. We have so far learned our lesson of toleration that we now only boycott each other for religious differences, and strive to keep each other from holding office. This marks great progress.

Yet religion is the best police force the world has ever discovered, and quite the cheapest, too. It has proven the greatest solvent of human asperities, the greatest leveler of inequalities of condition, that statesmanship has discovered. At the lowly intel of the tomb all men are equal and those who pass under are brothers.

This acknowledged value of religion as the handmaid of law has compelled recognition of that service, so whenever any denomination can secure state aid it is certain to strive for it, and sometimes gets it in ways that, though indirect, are substantial. The most common method is to exempt church property from taxation, while not exempting property devoted to forms of benevolence not clearly religious in character. From the standpoint of a logician the policy of exemption from taxation of church property is not very defensible, but from the standpoint of a fair recognition of useful service this is about as little as organized society would be justified in doing.

It has been a grief to many that our constitution contains no reference to the deity. There is an implied recognition of a supreme being in that an oath of office is required, although affirmation will suffice, for, by custom, an oath reads, "And so help me Almighty God," but the section that provides for an oath of office forbids any religious test as a qualification for office, so that an atheist may qualify for office—if he can get elected.

For, as we have sought to point out all along, there is a great difference between government according to the written constitution and government according to the constitution of the citizenship of the United States. In theory God is not in our constitution. In fact belief in God is an unspoken part of American life and expresses itself in every function of government. Days of Thanksgiving and prayer are ordered by proclamation of the President, and, at every crisis in public affairs, the throne of Jehovah is besought for blessings upon our flag and our official personnel with as deep a spirit of devotion as though the name of the Deity were appealed to in every section of the constitution and sanctioned by every law.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Address:

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

SIGNIFICANT EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The decision of United States District Judge McPherson that the Missouri two-cent fare law is unconstitutional and void, because it confiscates property without due process of law, will occasion little surprise in either the railroad or the judicial world. The effort to fix railroad rates, and fix them on a flat basis, by inflexible legislation, is probably a mistake wherever attempted. Legislators cannot put themselves in possession of the necessary facts, but some means must be found for safeguarding the public from extortion and probably will be found. This decision is not regarded as final. It is worthy of note, too, that it does not question the power of a legislature to fix rates, only they must be fixed on information and not merely upon belief. There is the rub.

It is not impossible that the Republican insurgents and the Democrats in the House of Representatives may so far pool their issues as to force a reconstruction of house committees with the view of limiting the autocratic power of the speaker. There are intimations that the President is favorable to it and that Cannon may have to concede it in order to secure his re-election to the speakership. If the reform goes through the house will elect a bipartisan committee, of which the speaker will be chairman, to make up the committees of the house and report them to the house for adoption. This is in the general direction of making representative government more representative and deserves the support of all patriotic citizens.

Little credence should be given to the pernicious activities of journalistic busybodies bent on making of the new mistress of the White House a butterfly ambitious for brighter wings and for more of them than any of her predecessors have possessed. That she will do the honors of the executive mansion in good taste and with a matronly dignity is to be held in confident anticipation, but the news that she is particularly to strive to transfer the social center from New York to Washington is probably as untrue as unimportant, yet such is the news of the week.

Congress has been called to convene in extraordinary session, March 15th, to revise the tariff, and the President and the leaders in Senate and House have been holding conferences as to the lines upon which the tariff is to be revised. The gentleman with the expansive and engaging smile is known to favor substantial reductions all down the schedule, and it is not improbable that he will find himself up against Standard Oil before the initiative steps have been taken. Then we shall see which is the man of the hour, William Howard Taft or Abou Ben Aldrich, grand vizier of the interests. All that California especially asks in fixing the new schedule is that the two thousand miles of mountain and plain between her and the threshold of her market shall not be overlooked or forgotten. This she may claim of right.

WHAT OF THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY?

This is the sixteenth issue of The California Weekly. It is time that those who receive it had some opinion about it.

We want, this coming week, a thousand letters bringing us a thousand frank, honest, clearly expressed opinions about the paper.

Tell us what you find in it that you like best.

Tell us what you find in it that you like least.

Tell us what you find in it that you dislike most.

Tell us what you do not find in it that you would like to.

Give us particular fits if you feel like it.

Do not be afraid of hurting our feelings.

Do not be afraid of spoiling us with too much praise.

Do not be afraid of anything except not being frank and open with us.

Above all things else do not ignore The California Weekly.

Give us leave to publish what you say if you are willing that we should. If you prefer, we will not publish your name though we should like to.

If you do not wish to write to us frankly over your own name, write anonymously, but write.

The paper is yours, not ours, and we want it to please you if it be in us to make it do so.

But remember this: The principles of the paper, no matter what you say, will not swerve from what they have been. It will stand for every good thing and against every bad one, as it is given us to know the good from the bad.

And we cannot add to the present scale of expenditure except as business grows.

Thirdly, we can only do what God put into us the capacity to do.

Within these limitations many things may be possible to make the paper better worth your patronage and our efforts.

Out of a multitude of suggestions we shall prove dull indeed if we get no new ideas.

Postscript.

While you are about it, please send us the names and addresses of a score or so of your friends who you think might subscribe for The California Weekly—especially if we were to follow your advice as to what kind of a paper we should make it.

Yours sincerely,

THE STAFF.

Outside of railroad and Standard Oil circles there will be universal disappointment in the failure of the government's attorneys at Chicago to make out their case against the Standard Oil company of Indiana. Their failure is purely technical, but it will suffice. Judge Anderson decided that the government had not proved that eighteen cents was the legal rate over the Chicago and Alton from Chicago to East St. Louis from which rate the Standard Oil received a rebate of twelve cents. All the attorneys for the government had been able to prove was that the Chicago and Alton, the Standard Oil company itself, and the oil-shipping public understood that to be the lawful rate. The defendant thought it was disobeying the law, the Chicago and Alton was so sure of it that it confessed its guilt, pleaded for, and received, immunity from punishment, but, according to this sapient court, all the parties to the transaction were as guiltless as babes although believing themselves to be as guilty as highway robbers. Such miscarriages of justice make the heart sick. The shadow has been taken instead of the substance, the letter instead of the spirit, the technical construction instead of the unlawful intent. Judge Anderson's decision may be good law, but it is mighty bad justice.

Surveyor General Kingsbury and Attorney General Webb have been putting forth praiseworthy efforts to save to the state from land-grabbers of unsavory repute, such of the state's broad acres as it has not already been euchered out of. The chief regret is that this stable door was not seen to until all the horses that were particularly worshipping having had been made off with. As a blunt fact the land laws of California, and the execution thereof, were designed from the first to flitch away from the state a wealth untold. It is a pity that Attorney General Webb so long deferred giving attention to this important interest of the state.

Rumors have floated out from Washington during the past week that Ambassador White Reid is to be recalled from the court of St. James's and that the place will be given either to Seth Low of New York, formerly president of Columbia College, or to Charles W. Eliot, who is soon to retire from the presidency of Harvard. Either of these gentlemen would be an admirable representative to the British government, but a certain sense of fitness would desire the appointment to go to President Eliot for the reason that he was born in England. To come back to the land of his birth as representative of the greatest republic to the greatest empire would prove a fitting finale to an eminent and most useful career.

In the election of George T. Oliver to the United States Senate, to succeed Secretary Knox, the Pennsylvania Republican machine has done about what any Republican machine would do under similar circumstances. Oliver was an understudy of Matt Quay and will pull in harness with Penrose like a plowhorse.

EXECUTE, NOT CRUCIFY.

A San Francisco correspondent for the Los Angeles Graphic (not the unspeakable paper it formerly was), bewails the system of espionage employed by the prosecution in eliminating undesirable jurors from the trial panel. There is no doubt that Mr. Heney desires to know all that can be known regarding every venireman brought into the box. There is no doubt that, if not forewarned, he will be foredoomed to failure by having to try his case before a jury packed in advance. The extremities of the case require, and justify, procedures as distasteful to himself as irritating to the veniremen.

Discrimination among prospective jurors is not to be exercised by eliciting yes and no answers to questions. The art of it consists in reading the characters of the men from every motion, look, accent. The biggest scoundrel may return the fairest answers. Rough-shod methods must sometimes be used to eliminate from the jury a man unsafe to sit there, although the venireman himself may not suspect his own unfitness.

The prosecution has to work against odds of twelve to one. If one juror out of the twelve insists to the end that the defendant is not guilty, that defendant, no matter how guilty he may be, cannot be convicted and punished. This is an odds that neither criminality nor innocence should longer possess, but they have it and the prosecution is up against that fact.

The theory of jury trials is that the jury, being taken summarily out of the community, will render such a verdict as the community would render. A jury so selected would, in the Calhoun case, inevitably disagree. If the people of San Francisco were to vote their sentiments on this it might be that three-fourths, and perhaps four-fifths, would vote "guilty as charged," but not all would vote. There would be a minority who, for one reason or another—sympathy, gratitude or weariness of the issue, would vote to let him go and throw in a certificate of good character to boot. The subsidizing of a pro-graft press was to this end and it has accomplished it. Hence a jury that fairly represents the community will not serve the purposes of the prosecution. It must take its case, if possible, before minds not yet made up, fallow minds, minds of a type that will decide according to the law and the evidence and not according to sympathy or prejudice, influence or bargain and sale. Therefore the task of Mr. Heney is Herculean.

The issue is not one we should suffer to be clouded by impressions regarding the modus operandi. The issue is as to whether justice is to be executed or crucified. The one element that makes the result doubtful, that causes the time for selecting a jury to be long drawn out, is the power which money places in the hands of one in possession of it. When the defendant is a poor man a jury to try his case is soon selected, the trial is soon over and a hundred chances to one, substantial justice is done. It must not be that a rich man may defy the law merely because he is rich. That were to crucify justice, not to execute it. Those who are striving with Mr. Heney to execute justice, and to prevent its crucifixion, will prove the saviors of society if it is to be saved, as it must be.

growing and the farming country is settling up. It is a good buyer and no longer asks to be carried by the wholesalers from crop year to crop year. This district is as large as several New England states grouped together, and exceeds in area and fertility that Palestine which, at one time, supported a population of four million souls. Its trade is worth having.

San Francisco wants this trade. It feels that by right it ought to have it, and it has sought to hold it by trying to induce the railroads to emphasize the importance of Tehachapi mountain, in making rates, as a barrier to the audacity of Los Angeles in bidding for this trade. Los Angeles, per contra, has sought to have the existence of the mountain ignored in rate making, and there that issue hangs.

But the traveling men of the two cities have, meantime, been working the problem out, but not to the advantage of San Francisco. The San Francisco traveling man is a "kicker" rather than a "booster." Whenever he visits an interior town in this district his most manifest desire is to get out of it. He grumbles about the hotel, the climate, the small orders he gets and, with a unanimity not to his credit, he denounces the graft prosecution in San Francisco to a lot of men who wish to see millionaire law breakers punished as certainly as malefactors of a more common quality, even though business may be thereby temporarily hurt.

The Los Angeles traveling man comes into this district animated by a different spirit. No matter in what kind of a hotel or boarding house he has to tuck himself away he never "squels." He compliments his would-be "customer" on the appearance of his town, talks encouragingly of the business he has done, calls upon the board of trade or newspaper office for immigration literature to hand out to homeseekers when he gets back to Los Angeles, defends the graft prosecution and the moral influence of Roosevelt, and hopes sincerely that Taft will go right on with the good work. The result is that, despite the Tehachapi mountain over which freight has to be hauled, Los Angeles is breaking into San Francisco's preserves, and is making off with the cream of that trade.

What is here stated in blunt terms is made manifest in the district mentioned as a subtle, personal atmosphere, not easily described, but none the less influential for that. The Los Angeles spirit is recognized as breezy, hopeful, full of enthusiasm and of the spirit of good will. The San Francisco spirit, as manifested by its traveling men, is full of fault finding, is mercenary and betrays a for-God's-sake-give-me-an-order-quick-so-that-I-can-get-out spirit that makes his customer glad when he is gone.

Moral: Hire away from Los Angeles houses a few of their best men that they may renovate the personal atmosphere of San Francisco's traveling men. The Los Angeles spirit may cause us to smile but its buoyancy is infectious.

AN AMBITIOUS PROGRAMME.

The prohibitionists have laid out for themselves an ambitious and far reaching campaign. It aims at nothing short of national prohibition by amendment of the constitution of the United States. The goal is to be attained progressively through precinct, ward, municipal, county and state prohibition until three-fourths of the states have gone dry, when the final coup will be administered in the form of issuing requisition upon Congress to submit such an amendment to the people for adoption. If courage, conviction and persistence can accomplish this end it will be accomplished.

But fifty-one voters out of each hundred will never keep forty-nine away from their beer and their wines, and it may be doubted if ninety can so restrain ten. The work of moral suasion will have to go far before it will find plenary power in its hands for dealing with this problem, and the public weal demands that so much liquor as is made and sold shall be made and sold under the regulation, and surveillance, of the law.

This is not saying that the American saloon will not cease to exist. It will. It has about as few friends as the smallpox. The only thing that can be worse is the "blind pig" and the "bootlegger." The progress prohibition is making measures public hatred of the saloon, not of wine, or beer or whisky, and if the brewers, distillers and wine makers make common cause with, and for, the saloon they will dig the graves of their industries. Those are blind indeed who cannot foresee that eventuality.

If prohibition is impracticable and the saloon must go, what is going to take its place? That is an easy question to ask but a difficult one to answer. Time alone can tell and that not very definitely, for no solution of the problem can permanently remain a solution. The conflict is irrepressible. It may be that some adaptation of the German garden, the French cafe or the Gobenburg system will be found best to fit our needs.

It would be well if moderate minded men, more zealous for making things better than they are, by the most practicable means available, than for combat to the death on behalf of an interest or an idea, were to get together with a serious purpose to work the problem out, tentatively if nothing more. The acceptable ground may not be the middle ground, but only the most feasible. The conservative mind must be the arbiter of the issue.

It may be something of a jolt to the extreme protectionist to run across these lines in President Taft's inaugural address: "In the making of a tariff bill the prime motive is taxation and the securing thereby of a revenue." The prime motive heretofore has been the securing of protection for American industries in the measure that political pressure could compel such protection. Revenue has been wholly incidental thereto. Mr. Taft has not quite taken the Democratic view of tariffs, which view contemplates a tariff for revenue only, in that he favors incidental protection. If Congress can be induced to take his view of the purpose of tariffs we shall have a much freer trade and a consequent substantial reduction in the cost of living in this country.

From one-fourth to one-third of all the blindness in the world is due to want of simple treatment of the eyes at the time of birth, and 20 per cent. of all the blindness in the world is caused by gonorrhoeal infection. What a fine field for sanitary education!

The Dangers of Africa.

While there are those who are drinking to the health of the lions there are thousands, perhaps millions, who view with an alarm amounting to a premonition of evil, the risks which Theodore Roosevelt will encounter on his African outing. They heartily wish that he were not going because they feel that there is still work in this country for him to do. It is not a fear that he may fall a prey to wild beasts, but that fevers, miasmas or some untoward accident may deprive his country of a personality still puissant for good. If the prayers of simple hearts for the safe conduct of one who travels by land and by sea may have efficacy to bring one home prosperously and in good time, then will Theodore Roosevelt return as well as he set forth, having had a "corking" good time and concluding a mission important to science and health.

The Harmony Banquet.

The idea of getting together at a banquet representatives of all factions in San Francisco's municipal affairs, with the view of promoting harmony among them, is a good one, but it will not be productive of the good that is needed unless it produces something more than harmony. It should result in unifying all interests favorable to progress and clean government and making them strike for progress and clean government with a propulsive power that the manum of civic unrighteousness cannot withstand. Keyed to concert pitch San Francisco can strike notes that thrill the nation, but unstrung, it is capable of a laxness humiliating to the race. With state legislation out of the way municipal affairs must come to the fore again.

Taft the Unbudgeable.

The leoprous press is facilitating itself in the hope that President Taft will prove no Roosevelt and betray no inclination to stand between the predatory interests and their prey. But what will it profit those interests to go up against an adamantine wall instead of a fiery furnace? Behind that expansive smile of Taft's there is an unflinching purpose, an undaunted moral heroism. He is only another Rudolph Spreckels, who also smiles winningly but was never yet swerved from the true line that he had laid down. Taft is no Roosevelt, certainly, but those who take him for an easy mark, or a soft proposition, will learn their mistake later on. When he said that he should make the Roosevelt policies his own he meant it even though the statement was not reinforced by a show of boot sole, a wave of a club or an outburst of strong language.

Was the Hand of Providence In It?

Russell Sage was not the first mean man to pile up money for a good woman to expend in good works, but he was probably the most pronounced example of his type. What splendid use that woman is making of those millions! What better use than, joining with others, to lay out, improve, build and fill up forty-eight acres of model tenements for working people to live in! And what a contrast between this idea and that of Trinity church, which is selling off its tenements, instead of remodeling them, that it may invest its millions in business property to pay a more remunerative income. Heaven grant the good woman length of days!

Cabinet of Lawyers.

President Taft made up his cabinet of six lawyers, one lawyer-merchant, one merchant and one farmer politician. Knox, Dickinson, Nagel, Wickersham, Ballinger and Hitchcock are all lawyers of illustrious position at the bar. MacVeagh is a graduate of Columbia Law School and practiced law several years with his distinguished brother, Wayne Mac-

Veagh, but gave up the work because his health failed and went to Chicago where he became a merchant. Meyer is a merchant and Jimmie Wilson a shrewd farmer-politician, more politician than farmer, but the most useful friend the farmers have had in the cabinet. There is no gainsaying the fact that the training a lawyer receives admirably fits him for all public activities except—the practice of the law. On that side his head is likely to become "tatter." He faces everything else with unclouded opinion and a mind trained to see things from their true perspective, but when it comes to the law he sees things through the wrong end of a telescope two centuries long and under a pile of whereas fifty cubits high. Therefore his conclusions seldom fit everyday human needs as they face him in rigid reality.

Why Roosevelt Went to the Outlook.

It is tremendously significant that the first citizen of America should ally his activities with a great weekly rather than a great daily newspaper, as Theodore Roosevelt has done. In the latest New York Outlook he tells what attracted him to that journal. In brief, it was because the Outlook had striven to be fair, and had always made a serious effort to find out what was true as well as to tell the truth. The Outlook strives to make money, but it subordinates making money to espousing any policy that promises to be in the lasting interests of the nation. The editorial staff of The California Weekly has been warned that it cannot hope to rival the Outlook in its field, but we can, and shall, rival it in adherence to those principles and policies which attracted to its staff the first citizen of America.

The Touts and the Courts.

There is little question that the race track people will fight the anti-race-track law to a finish. It is not in the nature of any predatory interest to accept the known will of the people as the law of the land if that will can by legal legerdemain be frustrated. Defeated in the legislature, appeal is to be taken to the courts and, probably, to the courts of Alameda county. The administration of justice in that county is in good hands, but the district attorney of Alameda county should not be left to carry the whole burden of defense of the law. There should be no lack of legal talent to aid in sustaining that law.

Important Conference of Railroad Men.

Report has it that Mr. E. H. Harriman, and a number of his associates, are to hold a conference in San Francisco in the near future. His conference may be of great consequence to this city, state and coast. No other man in the nation wields so much power as he. The California Weekly would like to see him in undisputed control of one trunk line of railroad (not two) from San Francisco bay straight through to New York harbor without a link missing and with all the feeders he wants. He is a splendid railroad builder and operator and has achieved great results for the good of commerce and industry. And why is it that he will not let our politics alone so that we may love him instead of hate him, trust him instead of dread him, honor him instead of blame him? Why must so great and so useful a citizen have as many faults as virtues, work as much harm as good? How inscrutable are thy ways, O genius!

Tell us what you think of The California Weekly. Does it suit you? Why? If not suit you? Why not? Please see the middle column of the first page.

We want a thousand letters, "knocks" or "boosts" as you feel toward The California Weekly—in the next ten days. Two thousand would suit us better. Please write us fully and frankly.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There are characters that affect us like the first breath of spring, the close of winter, like the breaking forth of the sun when the rain clouds have long hung low, like the sound of rushing water to a thirsty traveler weary with long searching. Such a character is Dr. Wilfred Grenfell, who went in search of 35,000 human beings whom the world had lost, who, nevertheless, were risking their lives, in every sense in which the term "life" may be used, for the feeding of the world.

He was born to comfort if not to affluence, was educated to the profession of surgery, which he loved, and seemed upon the threshold of entering upon a useful, comfortable, honorable practice of his profession in the great city of London. Somehow, at this time, he became interested in the fishermen along the British coast. It may have been through some summer outing. That interest attuned his ear to the call of the lost fishermen on the coast of Labrador, scattered in little groups from Newfoundland to Hudson bay, a coast along which sweep the polar currents bearing upon their chill bosom ice floes and icebergs and in their blue and green depths innumerable food fishes for man.

Although these people had been lost to missionaries, lost to education and lost to helpful connection with the outer world, they had not been lost to the saloons or to the pluck-me stores and middlemen dealers who took the product of the industry of these men at what they were minded to pay for it, charging ruinous usury for such supplies as they advanced. Whatever balance of credit was left to them was drunk up at the saloons. As for money, there were girls and boys grown to womanhood and manhood who had never seen money and had small conception of its use as a medium of exchange. They only knew credit, or the want of it, and few could read or write. Yet these were English-speaking men, brave, resourceful with the lilies they had to do with, and only forgetful of their duties to home and fireside when steeped in drug.

Doctor Grenfell went among these people to preach the religion of one who had preached to fisher folk in days of old. His relatives pitied him, his friends found fault with him for throwing away a life that might be useful, but he went. It was little progress he made with his preaching, more with the skill of the surgeon, for the calling of the fishermen is a hazardous one and accidents many and serious happen. He learned their lives from cradle to grave, gained first their confidence and then their love and, with this for a capitalization, he reached the souls of them and is transforming the whole of their life on this sand-mile coast.

His first hard work was to deliver out the groceries, and nearly all have gone. Then he organized co-operative stores to take the places of the pluck-me trading stations, with the result that the fishermen began to see the color of money and to get a just value for their catch. He appealed to the Christian world for volunteers and for means to establish hospitals with trained nurses in charge. He brought in reindeer, and handicrafts to be followed during the long winters. He established schools at the villages and took some of the brightest pupils elsewhere for special training for special services for their own people.

These things done, and the love and gratitude of all the fisherfolk who he went to talk to them of the deeper significance of living, for this is the way with most modern missionary work throughout the world. It begins, as the Christianity of old began, with healing the sick, clothing the naked, giving sight to the blind, enlightenment to the mind and, through these, reaching the souls of men. There stands out upon this continent no character more romantic, more chivalric, more illustrious for deeds of courage and fidelity, than this fisherman's friend—Dr. Wilfred Grenfell of the Labradorian coast.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Unhappy Honduras.

President Davilla of Honduras wants American intervention, if not quite annexation to the United States. He thinks that, if left alone, Honduras could maintain justice and order, but that neither Guatemala nor Nicaragua will let Honduras alone. Honduras is the bone over which these two jealous, ambitious quasi-republics conspiringly contend, with the result that the country is bankrupt, life and property unsafe and poverty nearly universal. No movement looking toward a United States protectorate has really been set on foot, but it is believed that one would be welcomed. This is of direct interest to California, for nearly all the commerce of Honduras is with the United States and its best harbor is on the Pacific side. It would be an act of great humanity if the United States were to accept suzerainty over Honduras and its neighbors. The most useful, honest and peaceful citizens Honduras has are those who escaped from the United States to avoid embarrassing explanations.

France and Germany Getting Together.

The reaching of an agreement between France and Germany over the Morocco affair has prompted a second important step toward fraternal relations between the neighboring nations. The National Bank of Germany has just subscribed for $2,000,000 worth of the stock of the Credit Mobilier of France. So tense has been the state of feeling in each country toward the other that every such incident is seized upon with interest by the whole world as a straw showing which way sets the wind. A fact not generally known is that Theodore Roosevelt was the "angel" who made this happy consummation possible, by offering the good offices of the United States to France and Germany and so bringing about the long-drawn-out conference of nations and an ultimate settlement of the Morocco controversy. For this he was roundly abused for not minding his own business.

Model Railroad Construction.

The Chicago, Milwaukee and Puget Sound railroad, an extension of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, is a model of modern railroad construction. The purpose was to get a railroad through from Chicago to Seattle that would be at once the shortest and have the most uniform grade. To do this it has followed straight lines with the result that in going 117 miles up the Musselshell river the road crosses that river 115 times by the building of twenty miles of bridges, mainly steel. The distance between the two cities has been reduced to 2,175 miles, fifty miles shorter than the line of the shortest competitor and 144 miles less than the longest. The grades, even in crossing the mountains, average only 1 1/2 per cent. The initial cost has been heavy, but the savings will make up for it, for they last forever. The road will be in operation to Seattle for freight by May 1st.

Fighting the Moths.

The example set other states by California, in hunting for beneficial insects to live as enemies, or parasites, upon injurious insects, has been followed by Massachusetts. Last year it sent an agent to Japan, and this year it will send one to Russia in quest of the natural enemy of the brown-tailed and gypsy moths. And, meantime, every effort is making to pull down, burn or creosote all moth nests to be found upon park and street trees, but the forests themselves must mainly wait for the parasites to do the killing. There has, perhaps, been no more important discovery in connection with agriculture than that an insect pest is a pest only when out of its native habitat.

Discounting Tariff Reductions.

The example set by the United States Steel Corporation, of discounting anticipated tariff reductions in advance, with the view of inducing trade, appears likely to be followed by other manufacturing concerns throughout the country. Buyers are demanding it with the alternative of pursuing a hand-to-mouth policy. There has been almost a deadlock between manufacturers and distributors for the spring trade, but the spirit of concession, above referred to, is helping to move commodities to a hopeful degree. Not until steel rails, still held at twenty-eight dollars per ton, come down will the railroads place many orders and begin the work of extending and bettering that branch of their service. It does not seem likely that even the steel trust can long withstand a united railroad demand for cheaper rails.

Pouring In the Coffee.

The people of the United States are not likely to run low on coffee supply during the coming year, though the price may run high. The $100,000,000 deficiency in Uncle Sam's revenues makes it almost certain that a duty will be imposed upon coffee which, it is believed, can be made to produce about $25,000,000 a year revenue, but not the first year. Anticipating such a tax tremendous orders have been placed and, already, enough coffee to last half a year has passed through the custom houses. Meantime, things are looking bad for Brazil, which has a hundred millions of government money invested in coffee awaiting a rise in the market. There will be a rise, but not in Brazil.

Right to Work Conventions.

During the winter there have been conventions of unskilled out-of-work, confessedly professional hoboes in the main, at nearly all the principal cities of the East and Middle West, with a national convention at St. Louis, and a sort of supplemental convention following it at Chicago. Their idea seems to be that society is under obligations to furnish work whenever one wants work, work that any untrained person can do, at $2.50 per day of eight hours. It was stated that there are in the United States 60,000 young men "on the road" and as many more old ones, and if society does not furnish work it is demanded it was virtually threatened that these 120,000 vagabonds would help themselves to what they want, including free transportation. Organized labor was also notified that if it did not "be good" unskilled labor would work so cheap as to bring "all to a common level of poverty."

The Ambitions of Iceland.

There are few spots on earth that have had a more romantic history than this Ultima Thule of Greek Pytheas. Iceland was discovered in 860 by a Norse Viking, Naddodd by name, and was settled by the best blood of Norway, so that, by the middle of the tenth century, it contained a population of 50,000 of the most cultivated people of that age. It established a constitution, a parliament and a code of laws adapted from those of Norway, and was virtually an independent republic; but irreconcilable controversies arose among the people, who fairly burned each other out of house and home and, in 1380, Denmark took over the island with Norway and it so remained until 1814 when Norway separated from Denmark, leaving Iceland under Danish suzerainty. In 1874 Iceland was made free of Danish legislative control, though it acknowledged allegiance to the King of Denmark, but otherwise enjoyed home rule. Now it seems to want to be wholly independent, although the issue is first to be fought out at home. The Icelanders are a thoughtful, literary people, and about the time we were celebrating our centennial of national life they were celebrating their millennial.

Collective Barbarians.

It has been said that, individually, college men are gentlemen, but, collectively, they are barbarians if not hoodlums. The reception recently given James Kier Hardie, socialist, at Oxford, England, goes to prove the truth of the saying. The Oxford undergraduates conducted themselves no more seemly than so many suffragettes, and yet it may be doubted if the students from any American college would have denied him a hearing. During his recent visit to the United States he was everywhere respectfully heard, although with little sympathy for his isms.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription? The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

Among the numerous centenaries of distinguished people which have crowded upon us recently, that of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, which occurred March 6th, has been noted by a multitude of plain people who read "Aurora Leigh" in their youth.

The critical few who know about such things are doubtless right in considering her husband the greater poet, but the uncritical many will wish that his wife had severely blue-pencilled his writings into a semblance of her own lucid style and thus widened his circle of auditors. Be that as it may, the Brownings were a singularly happy couple and who shall say that runaway matches turn out badly in face of such a wedded life as theirs.

Elizabeth Barrett had long been a hopeless invalid, condemned to a couch in a darkened room, partly by ill health resulting from an accident in her youth and the further shock of her brother's death by drowning, which she witnessed, and partly through the obstinacy of her father who never failed to impress upon her the fact of her ill health and the terrible consequences which would ensue if she should try to throw off her physical bondage.

Robert Browning and she became acquainted through their writings and Robert soon came to love the beautiful spirit "scarcely embodied at all" as Hawthorne says. He proposed marriage, and as they knew it would be useless to ask her father's consent and not wishing to worry him about what he could not help, these youthful lovers of thirty-seven and forty took matters into their own hands. But first Elizabeth wished to try an experiment. She wanted to go out under the blue sky and stand on the green grass and see what would happen. Accordingly they drove out to one of the parks and she alighted from the carriage and stood upon the green turf and looked up into the blue sky and it did not fall upon her and nothing happened, and so they were married and lived happily until her death parted them fifteen years later. The son, who was born to them and was greatly beloved by both, grew to manhood and became a successful sculptor. Mrs. Browning enjoyed a fair degree of health and the life of the Brownings in Italy is an open book to all Browning lovers and their Casa Guidi home has been made famous by her poem, "Casa Guidi Windows."

That she was a genuine poet is attested in the lines,

"Earth's crammed with Heaven and every common bush afire with God,
But only he who sees takes off his shoes."
And her "Cry of the Children" has been heard by the whole English speaking world.

So great a critic as Ruskin considered "Aurora Leigh" the greatest poem of the nineteenth century, with enough imagination to set up a dozen lesser poets. Robert Browning himself declared that he was only a painstaking fellow who tried to build up something, while the true creative power was hers, not his.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN.

By Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

(The following extract from Mrs. Browning's famous poem is especially pertinent in connection with the playgrounds movement in San Francisco, discussed in another part of this issue of The California Weekly.)

Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?

They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.

The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing toward the west—

But the young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly!

They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

Alas, alas, the children! they are seeking Death in life, as best to have:

They are binding up their hearts away from breaking,
With a ceremony from the grave,

Go out, children, from the mine and from the city,
Sing out, children, as the little thrushes do;

Pluck your handfuls of the meadow-cowslips pretty,
Laugh aloud, to feel your fingers let them through!

But they answer, "Are your cowslips of the meadows
Like our weeds anear the mine?"

Leave us quiet in the dark of the coal-shadows,
From your pleasures fair and fine!

"For oh," say the children, "we are weary,
And we cannot run or leap;

If we cared for any meadows, it were merely
To drop down in them and sleep.

Our knees tremble sorely in the stooping,
We fall upon our faces, trying to go;

And, underneath our heavy eyelids drooping,
The reddest flower would look as pale as snow.

For, all day, we drag our burden tiring
Through the coal-dark, underground;
Or, all day, we drive the wheels of iron
In the factories, round and round.

They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see,

For they mind you of their angels in high places,
Whose wings turned on Deity.

"How long," they say, "how long, O cruel nation,
Will you stand, to move the world, on a child's heart—"

Stifle down with a mailed heel its palpitation,
And lead onward to your throne amid the mart?

Our blood splashes upward, O gold-heaper,
And your purple shows your path!

But the child's sob in the silence curses deeper Than the strong man in his wrath."

A GLIMPSE OF "SAM" McCURE.

S. S. McCure, the publisher of McCure's Magazine, lately spent several weeks in California, making his headquarters in San Francisco. Oddly enough, little space was given by the newspapers to this visit of one of the most original and forceful figures in American periodical journalism.

Mr. McCure's career has been a striking example of the success that comes with persistency, and it is mottled with the eccentricities of a peculiar genius. Born in County Antrim, Ireland, fifty-two years ago, graduated from Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., in 1882, Mr. McCure founded a newspaper syndicate in 1884 which is still in existence. His early years were full of hardships; his living was earned before his college days by peddling tin cups in the Middle Western states. He footed it from town to town with his pack on his back, and he must have made a favorable impression, for he got the name of "the honest little peddler."

This reputation for honesty stood him in good stead in later years, for when he founded McCure's Magazine in 1893, he needed credit badly. The first years of this venture were not successful. He had an ambition to make a new type of magazine—a magazine that should not be merely literary, as the older journals had been, but that should be a living force for democracy, an educational medium in citizenship. But his ambition was not yet definitely translated into terms of a magazine policy that appealed to the public.

As a result, for years the magazine did not pay. It went steadily and deeper into debt. Here his reputation for honesty saved him. He was frank with his creditors, told them just what he was "up against" and how he expected to pull through. They believed in him, for he is known in New York as the only man in American publishing whom printers and paper dealers ever allowed to go a quarter of a million dollars in debt to them. He has told himself of wearing patched clothes and dodging his creditors for months out of shame to meet them.

But with Miss Tarbell's "Life of Napoleon" he caught the public fancy a little. Then came Miss Tarbell's "Life of Lincoln." That made a hit and the magazine made money. Then Mr. McCure found his cue. The great growth of corporate management of business he conceived to be the most significant fact, politically as well as industrially, in modern life. He would give the American people a history of the greatest of all corporations—the Standard Oil—as an education in what that significant development meant to democratic rule in government and business. Miss Tarbell's father had been an oil operator, and a victim of the Standard, and she began the task of writing the "History of Standard Oil" with an unusual equipment.

Everybody knows how that history created the greatest sensation of modern days, and how, out of its publication, grew up the "muck rake" school of writing, culminating in Lincoln Steffens' "Shame of the Cities," and how profoundly the whole current of modern legislation has been affected by it. It is hardly too much to say that the greatest impetus to our great wave of moral reform in city government, of reform of corporate management, and of the general revival of civic conscience and sense of civic duty, is the outgrowth of "Sam" McCure's magazine ambition and his lavish expenditure of money to make these subjects real and interesting to the American public.

Incidentally, the strain of his work nearly wrecked Mr. McCure's health. Incidentally, also, his "muck-rakers," whose reputations were made possible through his work, got the "swelled head" and tried to run his business for him. This led to an explosion, and the muck-rakers' secession to the American Magazine, leaving Mr. McCure a physical wreck. A trip to Europe and complete cessation of work partly restored him, but he has had to reduce his business cares by disposing of his book publishing business and devoting his time wholly to his magazine venture. What the future of the McCure business will be is uncertain. But its achievements to date entitle the "honest little peddler" to high rank amongst the public spirited and the geniuses.

A SONG OF WINTER.

By Ray C. B. Brown.

(Written for The California Weekly.)

The rain keeps falling frae the sky
Till now there's naught a speck o' the dry
Atween the coast and mountains high Wi'n the State,
Except the spots men occupy
Anath roofslate.

E'en there the sly umbrellas drips,
The water frae our coatsies slips
An' gumlie dubs the doggie flaps
Wi'n the house;
While in her hand the besom grips
The glowerin' spouse.

The gowks wha speered the Lord for weat
Hae now enough to cower them greet
An' make them owre blate to beet
What things befa'

That lang ago the Gods agree't
For this round Ba'.

The whiddin' clouds are unco fu'
An' seem to pour their waters thro'
Some eldritch dail's gaping mou'
Upon our haimes,

But we can thole what shifts food
Wi'n our wames.

SELF GOVERNMENT AT BERKELEY

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The problem of self-government in America has got to be worked out in our municipalities. The town meetings were the kindergarten of democracy. Our municipalities must become our common schools of free government, because it is there that people come together in multitudes immediately concerned for interests common to them all. We may liken state governments to high schools of democracy and national government to the university. It is therefore the purpose of The California Weekly, from time to time, to analyze and make clear the status and tendencies of municipal government in California in the hope that each may learn from the other.

Berkeley's municipal problem in recent years has been a problem of inefficiency rather than of corruption. The city's affairs were administered under a town charter adopted in 1895, when Berkeley was an unimportant village, and that charter fitted the bigger and more complex functions of the present city of 40,000 inhabitants no better than a boy's suit of clothes fits a grown man. Those functions were hampered by the obsolete charter. The new charter, recently adopted, was the outgrowth of that condition.

Old Charter Inadequate.

Under the old charter the town was governed by a board of trustees, one elected from each of the seven wards. This board elected a chairman, who was practically ex-officio mayor. The board had the usual powers to enact ordinances, and the ordinary supervision of all public affairs, such as street work, police protection, and the like. This plan worked very well as long as Berkeley was a quiet village. But when it grew quickly to a city, and was confronted with the problem of street paving, street lighting, adequate police and fire service, street railway franchises, municipal water supply, and control of water front, it broke down. The legal powers of the board of trustees were inadequate, as was shown when a special act of the legislature was required to permit the city to construct a wharf. Worse yet, the responsibility for getting things done was not fixed. The street superintendent laid the blame for inadequate street work on the trustees, the trustees laid it on the charter which did not permit them to vote enough money, and on one another for not being in sympathy with the work. Similar shifting of responsibility in all departments made the administration of the city government generally inadequate.

Suggestions to Amend Old Charter.

The citizens of Berkeley soon realized that something must be done. In 1904, the board of trustees, yielding to public pressure, appointed an extra-legal committee to draft amendments to the charter to remedy its deficiencies. This committee worked about a year, and presented a report as a basis for action by the board. Under the state law at that time towns having a freeholders' charter could not vote to substitute a new charter, so the purpose was to have the board embody the committee's recommendations in a series of proposed amendments for submission to the voters.

The committee's report suggested some radical changes in the constitution of the city government. One change was the abolition of the ward system of election of trustees. This suggestion, particularly, was objectionable to the board, and that body shelved the whole report.

Demand for New Charter.

This action by the board aroused public sentiment in a demand for charter reform. An amendment to the state constitution passed in 1905, came opportunely to encourage the movement. This amendment allows the substitution of a new charter for old freeholders' charters, upon vote of a town.

Public sentiment forced the trustees to call an election for a board of freeholders to draft a new charter, and, on November 21, 1908, fifteen citizens were elected for that purpose. Prof. William Carey Jones, head of the law department of the state university, was president of that board. He and Beverly Hodghead, now a candidate for mayor under the new charter, did most of the legal research work on which the new charter is based. President Wheeler of the university was another member, and the remainder of the board were all men of exceptional ability and character.

These men attacked the problem of charter building in an entirely different spirit from that ordinarily present at such a task. They did not have to consider any question of political expediency. Their constituency—the majority of the people of Berkeley—are above the average in intelligence, and machine politics is almost unknown. Their task, then, was only to devise the best charter that they could, and this task they performed well.

Advanced Models for Charter.

The board of freeholders went to the most advanced city governments in America for their model. As the chief faults of their old charter were inefficiency and divided responsibility, they were at once attracted by the "commission plan" of government in use in Galveston. This led to a study of the "Des Moines plan," which is an improvement upon the Galveston plan, and from its charter the main principles of the new Berkeley charter were copied.

The Galveston plan is this: Instead of governing by a board of trustees elected from wards, and a cumbersome system of elective executive officers, both the legislative and executive functions of city government are concentrated in the hands of four commissioners, and a mayor. These officers are elected at large from the whole city, and the five constitute the board of councilmen. But each of the five, by vote or by lot, is the chief of an executive department of the city government, and is directly responsible for the conduct of that department. If the police are inefficient, the commissioner who heads the department of public health and safety is to blame, and he cannot escape the responsibility. If there is a deficit in the treasury, the commissioner who is chief of the department of finance and revenue must account for it.

Under these department heads, all necessary subordinates, such as city clerk, assessor, treasurer, collector, attorney, chief of police, etc., are appointed by the council and may be removed by that body. The council fixes the compensation of all officers.

As a legislative body, the council has the powers of an ordinary city council, including the power to grant franchises and to arrange for municipal ownership of public utilities.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Man That Is In the Man.

Under the crust that hardens o'er all that is human clay—
As the surface of sun baked gardens the hoe of the tiller may stay—
Under the coat of shoddy, or under the silken gown,
Is all that may make man better than cattle of field and down
'Tis the seed that the Sower soweth to ripen in far-off days
In the country that no man knoweth, where reapers shall sing His praise,
And so, as my journey lengthens, the field of the world I scan,
If haply my soul shall find him, the man that is in the man.

Sometimes I have cried "God save us! This man is a clown and a knave!"
When, lo, through his robe betattered, the soul of a god shone out.

Sometimes I have sighed "God pity! His heart is as nether stone!"
Then saw, in a deed of mercy, the heart that I never had known.

For under the crust is ever the soil that the good God gave
To hold in its tender keeping the fruitage it yet shall save.

And this is the lesson taught me in all of His mystic plan.

As I seek,neath the cloak of error, the man that is in the man.

And so I am sure the Father looketh in kindness down.

E'en on our masquerade where Folly weareth the tinsel crown.

Under our shallow pretence, under our garb of lies,
He seeth the seed of heaven that still in His garden lies;

With a patient hand He waters the grain that is hid by tare,
And 'waits, with a wondrous pity, the fruitage that shall be fair,

And He smiles, for He knows no failure can come to His long-wrought plan.

And He sees, as we see but dimly, the man that is in the man.

An Oriental Tale.

Unto Abd el Fahdin, the oriental potentate who had endeared himself unto the communal people until he was known far and wide as Kingpinofidhigherpurs or Bossoldegang, there came a wise man of the East, and made obeisance unto him.

"What wilt thou?" Abd el Fahdin brusquely inquired.

"The publicservants commonly known as the Citadaids, held they yearn for pap with a great yearning, nor will they be comforted until the trough is found."

"Wherefore yearn they?" Abd el Fahdin queried.

"The overhead-trolley franchise, melud—is it necessary that I say more?"

And when Abd el Fahdin had dispensed 200,000 shekels, which the unrighteous term pap, behold, it was not necessary to say more.

Then did the hounds of the law get on the trail of the Citadaids, and when they were arrested all the people cried, as with one voice, "Givemel!"

But when the trail had led to the Kingpinofidhigherpurs, then did many of the people fall upon the necks one of another, and cried with a loud voice, "Let not unholy hands be laid on him that is gilded, lest our city be brought unto shame."

And they wot not that the stranger within their gates already held his nose, and winked merrily when the name of Justice was pronounced.

But the tale, it is of no moment save to portray the wide distinction in the manners and customs of Orient and Occident. Wherefore, my children, let us rejoice that beneficent Fate has cast our lot here, and not there.

Our Emotional Streets.

I contend that our streets are too emotional, not sufficiently fixed in their high purpose to let the traveling public use them.

The official who has such matters in charge came along, and viewed the highway in front of my house. It was in good condition; well surfaced, well graded, well guttered.

"What ho, my merry men!" he then cried, or I suppose he did. "This will never do. Here is a street that is all right. It looks as if I were not earning my money. Get busy."

So the street was ripped up, while sewers, gaspipes, or something, were laid. But after weary weeks of demolition the street again was made whole, and my heart was glad.

Then came another official, and inspected. "This is dead wrong," he said, "for, lo, an equipage might traverse this street. Go to it, my merry men."

And the merry men went to it, ripped up the street and laid something else.

It is ever thus! There is neither peace in my days nor rest in my nights, for the street that is fair at morn at eve is a sight for gods and men.

For the streets, they are too emotional.

All I'm Askin'.

I ain't a-askin' much to-day.

I jest fer a isle in some fair sea.

Where loatin' is the natchral way.

An' work an' people don't agree.

Where I could lay aroun' an' laze

Through all the peaceful, dreamy days.

O' course I'd have to eat, but, say,

I'd want it fixed this way fer me:

So I could lie through all the day

With fruit jest droppin' down on me

I wouldn't move a little bit

Exceptin' when my mouth was hit.

I guess I'd have six tropic girls.

About the pick of all the lot,

With sun-browned cheeks an' teeth like pearls,

To fan me when the days seemed hot.

I'd jest dream on a blissful man,

While they would fan, an' fan, an' fan.

I'd be the King of Lazyland,

Known as His Royal Nibs, the Shirk.

And all as felous I would brand

Would be the knaves who mentioned work.

Oh, shades of labor! Seems ter me

That tropic isle I almost see.

You see I ain't a-askin' much,

But jest that work I'll let 'em be.

An' keep off me its han'rin' touch,

Fer work an' work I don't agree.

An' speshully when Spring's in style,

I can't help longin' fer that isle.

The Opinions of Rufus.

"I take your money fer knockin' the prosecution," said the yeller editor to the Higher-up who was turnin' in his sack, "on high moral an' scrippheral grouns."

"How's that?" inquired the Higher-up. "W'y, don't the Bible say, 'Knock, an' it shall be opened unto you?'"

But the Higher-up war'n't 'quainted with the 'thority, so all he said wuz, "I depend on you ter make it hot fer the prosecution."

Good looks ain't ev'rything, Eliza. The moon's pretty, but it's dead.

Don't be too enthoosastic with your mouth, Ephraim. The fellers that do the yellin' at a ball game are them that are settin' 'round an' loatin', not the fellers on the diamond.

Seems ter me that cake that's all frostin' an' educhashun that's all frills is about ekally fillin'.

If life hands you a lemon, son, get busy, make a lemonade an' smack your lips over it, an' more'n is likely es not it'll hand you a peach next time.

A Hopeful Suggestion.

Now that Mark Twain has incorporated himself and Luther Burbank is the stock in trade of another corporation—

What ho, ye doleful writer men.

Who write and write and write.

While people say, "Poor Scribo's pen

Is stricken with a blight,"

Arouse ye from your sombre mood,

Nor bow to cruel fate.

Still 'waits your chance for making good.

Rouse ye! Incorporate!

See What Thought Does.

A day or two ago I wrote some simple verses in which I endeavored to express the idea that I was tired and would like to drift away to an isle of rest in some fair sea. It appears that I was mistaken. Dr. Shaden Leavitt, of Chicago, says "Being tired is foolish," and adds, "When I'm tired I tell myself that I'm rested, and then I am." I made the mistake of not telling myself that I was rested.

And as this rule applies to one physical ailment, doubtless it applies to all. For example, a boil on my writing wrist has been troubling me and—Hold! I tell myself that I have no boil, and now I have none. Only, I wonder what this thing on my wrist is. Oh, this power of "telling yourself" is great. It shows what thought will do, so let's apostrophize thought:

Oh, wondrous power of potent thought,

Or thoughtful power of wondrous poet,

Your dreadful work on me you wrought

Until a boil I seemed to note,

But then I brought my Mind to bear

Upon the place where I had been.

No doubt it's gone, but I can swear

Its place still aches like sin.

What the Hello Girl Thinks About It.

"Did you hear that there is talk of calling a hello girl a phonist?"

"I did."

"I called up Central yesterday and asked her what she thought of it."

"What did she think?"

"Well, I am not exactly certain. What she said was, 'Linespizzi, cawleggen,' and I haven't had it translated yet."

What "Lucky" Left.

So "Lucky" Baldwin's dead. You say

He left great wealth, and that was all.

I cannot see the case that way,

For proof per contra is not small.

Nay, by the odors that arise

From every spot as footsteps kept—

Unpleasant odors—I surmise

He left his reputation, too.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Peter Anthes, Sr., retired mining man, 763 San Jose avenue.

Joseph Dixon, clerk, 2000 Steiner street.

James Granville, retired machinist, 4227 Eighth street.

Michael Maguire, retired hay and grain merchant, 281 Page street.

Robert B. Symington, civil and mining engineer, 228 Liberty street.

Above are the names, vocations and addresses of six men who actually have been sworn in to serve as jurors in the trial of Patrick Calhoun for bribery. Six possible jurors went by the peremptory-challenge route. Thomas Lockwood, Joseph E. Emmons and Duncan D. Hilder have been challenged by the prosecution, and Edwin W. Bennett, James L. Arthur and James A. Godfrey by the defense.

To attain this half-result fifty-seven days of actual time, or thirty-nine court days, were consumed. That is to say, one juror was obtained in each nine and one-half days of actual time, or in each six and one-half court days. The veniremen summoned numbered 1,410, and the talesmen examined were 546. That is to say, again, one of each 235 veniremen summoned, and of each ninety-one examined, will act as juror in the case.

It would be in vain to attempt to prophesy how long it will require to secure the other half of the jury. It may drag as did the first half, or it may surprise everybody by displaying speed, but, at any rate, the point has been reached where the public can say, "Something definite really has been attained in the Calhoun trial. The nag may pick up in its pace, or it may fall dead, but the half-way post is passed."

In the Stockton graft cases, March 24th was set as the time for arguing the demurrer which was filed in behalf of Councilman W. T. Shepard, one of the defendants. It was expected that a similar demurrer in behalf of Police Captain John Craig would be argued yesterday.

It is asserted that, at Redwood City, Al Eikerenkotter, former superintendent of the poor farm, has endeavored to secure time in which to settle financial delinquencies in his office, but his overtures have been in vain. It is understood that all of the cases there will be tried.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

The man who seated himself by my side, on a bench in Golden Gate park, seemed a unique character. From time to time, I studied him with sidelong glances.

The years had set their seal upon him, and the vicissitudes of a careworn life were written in wrinkles upon his face. Yet, even through the mask of time, the countenance gleamed ruggedly, seeming to promise the thing we term individuality.

Having made up my mind to this effect, I fell to dreaming of him.

"Poor old chap," I said to myself, "his feet are far down the western slope, and shadows deepen about him. Perhaps he came with the other giants of the Pioneer days, with hope to guide him and ambition to lead him on. And there was one who dreamed and hoped with him, and when their visions died into nothingness they comforted each other, and so were blessed. Now she sleeps—I wonder where! And there were little ones, perhaps, and the two joyed in their laughter and were glad in their gladness. But the great white angel chooses whom he will, and the babes folded their wee hands and passed on, leaving him in sore loneliness to journey unaccompanied down the—"

"Say, stranger," said the old man, interrupting my dreaming, "could you spare ten cents for a drink? This is dry weather."

While I had been "sizing him up," he had been sizing me—as an easy mark.

But I am used to that.

"If the statesmen at the capitol could realize all that it means," said the unobtrusive man, "they would not think of permitting a dentist to practice his profession unless he has a finished education. Knowledge of teeth may be useful to him, but how gross it seems when compared with deep lore concerning zoology, paleontology and other ologies."

"You go to a dentist who has but a brusque, offhand acquaintance with English, and what can he do to soothe away your pain? But let him put a well-augur in your aching tooth and here through to the very foundation of all things, at the same time murmuring low, musical Sanskrit in your ear, and the consciousness of your pain is lost in the melody of the words you do not understand. I do not recall that a dentist ever did talk Sanskrit to me, but I am sure I should prefer that to some of the things gentlemen of that profession have done to me."

"By all means let the statesmen guard the dental portals. It is all right for dentists to know more or less about teeth, but unless they can breathe higher learning, as well as spirits fragrant, on us while we occupy their easy-chairs of misery, the great public will feel that something is lacking."

As I left it occurred to me that perhaps the unobtrusive man had talked satirically.

The other night, at a theater, I sat near one of these wise fellows who, having seen the play, wish to air their superior knowledge for the benefit and admiration of the ignorant common herd.

"You want to wait for the next act," he would say. "Why, this ain't nothin' compared with that." And then he would prattle on, and on, and on, in an assinine endeavor to anticipate the playwright's privilege of telling his own story in his own way. And we in his vicinity, not being deaf, were compelled to listen. Oh, "it bit and it rankled."

And the worst of it is that one never can go to a theater and be certain that one will not run across a fellow of this kind. The law ought to be enlarged to cover his case.

The mother and the family hopeful had had a little session, and after it was ended, with the hopeful still in tears, the mother said: "Now, my little girl, I wish you to feel that I forgive you for being naughty, and I trust that God forgives you, too.

"Boohoo—I hope—boohoo—he won't forgive me the way you did."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Hard Sledding For Law Reforms It was thought that although all the other Commonwealth Club bills to reform criminal procedure might go down to defeat, the one to put an end to the absurd practice of trying the grand jury after it has done its work would be passed. But it was not to be, for the Senate Judiciary Committee has disapproved it. Not even this one concession to the spirit of reform, which is believed to be in the air, could be wrung from that committee of twenty lawyers. It has been a good committee, too, in some ways, for it was not packed, like the Public Morals Committee and the Elections Committee; it has manifested more independence than a Senate Judiciary committee has shown for years; but that band of lawyers could not consent to give up a part of the legal game which they had played in the interest of clients and which they might want to play again. The incident shows how exceedingly difficult it is going to be to secure any reform of the law. Public opinion is ripe for it, and the best and most progressive lawyers have contributed more than anybody else to make that public opinion, but the demand has not yet become strong enough to compel the kind of lawyers who dominate our legislatures to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Snubbing the State Charities Board Several bills have passed which appropriate money to erect new buildings for the Preston School of Industry, and these bills, after vesting the board of trustees with the necessary authority to make the improvements, go on to say: "And it shall not be necessary to refer the plans to any other board or commission." This means that the State Board of Charities and Corrections, which, under the law creating it, is given the duty of examining plans and specifications to see whether the buildings proposed will be suitable for the purposes designed, is excluded by these special provisions and is not to be consulted. This is one among many ways in which the Board of Charities and Corrections has been shouldered aside by petty local boards ever since it was created. And, thanks to the politicians, the farce will go on until the state has a governor who, believing in the State Board of Charities, will say to such boards as the trustees of Preston that they must leave those provisions out of their bills or get no appropriations.

Primer Lessons On Voting No more excuse for not knowing all about the constitutional amendments which you are voting on. Senator Curtin has at last succeeded in getting through the bill which he first prepared two years ago to provide for civic enlightenment by causing all amendments to be officially argued pro and con. Henceforth, whenever the legislature submits an amendment, the author of it and a member of the same house who voted against such amendment are to be commissioned to present the opposing views. Each of the two will prepare "a brief statement," which will be submitted to the Secretary of State, who will cause the statements to be printed, and, before the election they will be mailed to all voters. The object is good, but just how brief is the "brief statement" to be? It would have been better to give the Secretary of State authority to edit and condense the arguments. Again, who is to present the negative argument if there happens to be no member of the house in which the amendment originated who voted against it? The Oregon method is better in that it allows anyone who is willing to pay fifty dollars for a page in the pamphlet, to be heard pro or con.

Trying to Help Flint When the direct primary bill was reported out of the Assembly Committee on Elections, at the end of last week, it was with majority and minority reports which represented the membership in the proportion of six to two. "The majority favored amending the bill by providing that the vote on United States Senator shall be taken by Assembly districts, instead of counting all the votes in the state and making the man who secures the popular plurality the party candidate. Speaker Stanton was the special advocate of the district plan, and it is generally assumed that in this he felt the necessity of yielding to the supposed interests of United States Senator Flint, who two years from now will be a candidate for re-election. It is supposed "when the district plan will be more favorable to Flint than the other because he is likely to be able to carry Los Angeles county, and possibly some other counties in the southern part of the state. Thus, on this plan of pledging legislators to vote for the popular choice, Flint may count on gaining enough pledged support to be in the race when the legislature meets, while on the other basis he might be shut out if some man of greater state-wide popularity than himself should appear. That the Wright direct primary bill will be passed without other important changes is conceded by all.

Grove Johnson's One Good Deed! One of the minor pieces of good legislation which has been enacted in this session owes its origin to Grove Johnson. It is a law to compel dealers in narcotics to keep a register of purchases, as druggists must keep a register of sales of poisons. This ought to be the means of tracing the authors of a certain number of crimes of violence, and, moreover, it is perhaps the first step toward some kind of wise restriction of trade in the murderous revolver.

Rough Road for Wife Deserters From this time forth the path of the wife-and-child-deserter ought to be harder in California, as will be if the court enforces the new law which not only makes it a penal offense for him to refuse to pay a part of his wages to support his family when ordered by a court so to do, but which also penalizes neglect or failure to earn money for that purpose "when able to do so." Everything depends on giving a good broad construction to the last clause. The right sort of police judge can make himself a terror to the class of men who abandon wife and children, and can also remove the grounds for many a divorce. Violation of this law is made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Appointment or Railroad Commission? Campbell's constitutional amendment to make the State Railroad Commission an appointive instead of an elective body obtained a favorable report from the Senate Judiciary Committee, notwithstanding a difference of opinion over the question whether the appointments should be made at large or from districts. By a close vote the at-large plan was adopted. This proposed amendment of the constitution must now muster two-thirds vote in the Senate and the assembly. If the railroad companies are very much opposed to it they can defeat it, but with the prospect of having all nominations made through direct primaries, they may not care to oppose appointments.

Advisory Vote By Districts The Herrin "organization" has not ceased in its efforts to render the direct primary bill of no effect, especially as it relates to an expression of party opinion for United States Senator. It is hard to tell who the real friends of the measure are. It would be characteristic of the Herrin policy to have a dependable representative in the councils, if not at the head, of the pro-primary movement, and those who have understood that Senator Leroy Wright has always been an organization man will not be surprised if, at the crucial moment, in charge of the bill on behalf of its true friends, he were to make some injurious concession fatal to the hopes of the people. The question now is: Has he not done this in consenting to such a modification of the measure as will permit popular expression for senator to be made by districts rather than by the whole state? It is by the work of the coming week that this legislature will be measured.

People's Lobby Incorporated No more important step has been taken for the purification of California politics than the incorporation of the People's Lobby of California, with the view of making it a permanent, avowed, legalized instrumentality for publicity regarding legislative affairs in this state. The motto, "The rights of the people are safe with the people," is sound only when issues involving the rights of the people are taken straight to the people in concrete form with the line-up of the people's representatives thereon. California is fortunate in that there are men in it ready and willing to spend time and money in unselfish service of a people generally too inert to attend to public business efficiently. The incorporators of The People's Lobby of California are: D. L. Beard, Napa; Dr. John R. Haynes, Harley W. Brundige, S. C. Graham, Merwin Lissner, Marshall Stinson, Los Angeles; Dr. W. G. Eggleston, Berkeley; Rudolph Spreckels, Francis J. Heney, F. S. Brittain, Edward L. Baldwin, George Baker Anderson, T. E. Hayden, Milton T. U'ren, Isidor Jacobs, Adolph Uhl, John W. Sweeney, San Francisco; a splendid group of men.

The Oakland City Election Inasmuch as the problem of democracy must be worked out to a success or a failure in our cities, and inasmuch as city government generally has been the humiliation of America as compared with the government of cities in monarchical Europe, every city election becomes important far beyond the borders of the city in which the election is held. The Mott ticket won in every ward in Oakland, generally by substantial majorities, but by no such clean sweep as denoted complete unanimity of sentiment. There seemed to be an element of uncertainty in the Oakland mind as to where the predatory interests were throwing their influence, and not until the votes in the seventh (Southern Pacific) ward were counted could it be clearly determined. That ward was carried by Mott by the narrow margin of seventy-nine votes while in nearly all the other wards his majorities were large if not overwhelming. The Oakland form of city government places enormous, almost autocratic, power in the hands of the three men constituting its Board of Public Works. Fortunately that board is made up of three men thoroughly tried and thoroughly true—Mayor Mott, City Attorney McElroy and City Engineer Turner. The immediate future of Oakland, mainly in their hands and they are good hands.

The Kings-Fresno Boundary Fight There is this to be said for the Herrin "organization," it keeps its promises if it can, no matter how reprehensible they may have been. Kings county is ambitious. It is a small county and wants to be bigger at Fresno's expense. It sent a delegation to the Santa Cruz convention, of malodorous memory, to be traded to Gillett's managers for a slice off Fresno county. Two years ago a bill was gotten through to that effect, but carrying a clause that Fresno legislators got into it, leaving it to the people themselves to say whether they wanted to be cut off or not. They said no. This year another bill is being crowded through making a cut-off without allowing the people in that slice to have any say. The "organization" is evidently going to deliver the goods to Kings if it takes to the end of the century. This is of no great consequence to the state, except that the county board of supervisors, who are the political bargain counter is not a wholesome policy.

UP AND DOWN : : THE STATE : :

It has been sixty years since the Pioneers of '49 traversed the long trail over plain and mountains, rounded the hills, crossed the gulches, and six decades is a large segment of a lifetime, so large that comparatively few are the men of those early days who remain with us. Their ranks are thinned and constantly they grow thinner. There scarcely is a week when one, or more, of their number does not cross the Great Divide, and the day is not distant when not one of them will remain to recall California as it was "before the gringo came." One of these few survivors passed at Placerville the other day. This was James Wesley Summerfield, a Virginian by birth, who reached Placerville—then Hangtown—August, 1849, and has resided in that vicinity most of the time since then. He is out of the ranks of the living, but with the great majority of the Pioneers.

That tide in the affairs of the saloon now sweeping the nation has reached Santa Cruz and left it on the high license beach. Two propositions were submitted to its voters last week: First, to increase the retail license from $300 to $600 a year and strictly to regulate the saloons, and, second, straight prohibition. The electors chose the former by a vote of 1,398 to 569, or nearly two and one-half to one. The notable feature of the event is that nobody seemed to think—so far as the vote shows—that the saloons required no regulation and improvement, and this is a circumstance which saloonists everywhere would do well to consider.

Postmasters throughout the state will do well to make a mental note of the fact that the present era of robberies includes a considerable number of post-offices in its scope. The office at Roseville, from which the sum of $500 was taken, is the latest to report such a robbery, but this merely is the final one of a list that has much lengthened lately, and doubtless will continue to do so. Postmasters should deposit their cash in banks, or, if that is not possible, keep a bulldog on guard.

The passing of the age of steam and the dawn of the electric age are indicated by many signs. The Southern Pacific has just put motor cars on its line between Stockton and Fresno, and, added to such cars as it has had in operation, the traveler can make the trip from Chico to Hanford in this manner. It requires no great prescience to foresee the day when steam locomotives will be exhibited as interesting mementoes of the past. Mr. Harriman caught this idea while automobileing in France.

If he who sets out a tree is a public benefactor, how about the man who donates a park to the public, that tree and beauty may give the heritage of many generations? Should he not be considered a multifold benefactor? This is what Albert K. Smiley has done for Redlands, and even the men who hold that the accumulation of coin is the only object that makes life worth living might pause to give him appreciation. Redlands is to be congratulated on being the residence of so public-spirited a citizen. The pity is that they are not more frequent among men of means.

Dr. Chester Rowell has acceded to the request conveyed to him in a petition signed by over 700 citizens of Fresno, and will be a candidate for mayor of that city. This assures at least one candidate whom nobody will think of approaching with off-color suggestions. A peculiar feature of the situation is that William Glass, business manager of the Republican, also has been mentioned as a candidate, while Doctor Rowell is its principal owner, so that the Republican against the Republican is a suggested situation. Presumably it will not come to that, but if it did Fresno might find satisfaction in the reflection that they would be assured a good mayor in any event.

The people of Sanger have set an example which those of other communities might follow to their betterment. They turned out en masse and cleaned up their town, removing rubbish and leaving things sightly in general. Some cities may need this sort of patriotic treatment more than others, but there is none which it would not benefit. Honor to the Sangerites, and, as the barber says, "Next!"

Selma, too, a near neighbor of Sanger, is about to do a good thing. Possibly it caught the beautification idea from Sanger. Its trustees propose to plant palms and other decorative trees along the streets and avenues leading into that city, so that the traveler shall whisper to himself, and later advertise abroad, "The little city of Selma is a beauty." If other municipalities should do likewise it would be the better for California.

A race in which five balloons will compete is being planned by the Aero club of San Francisco. Berkeley will be its starting point and Reno, Nevada, its destination. Which suggests, though not so forcibly as do some other things, that the day of man's dominion over the air is not far distant. Time was when an aeronaut was a creature for wonder. Before very long all of us may be aeronauts.

The interior town with a good hotel has an asset of which it may well be proud. Traveling men look upon it as an oasis in a desert and try to arrange their itineraries as to remain at such a place over night anyway, and over Sunday if possible for, to them, most interior hotels are desert wastes or nightmares or something else equally uninviting. Tulare city is just now rejoicing over the reconstruction, refurbishing and reopening of its principal hostelry under the name of The Encina.

("Berkeley"—Concluded.)

But the distinctive feature of the plan is its concentration of power in a small body, and the fixing of responsibility upon the individual members of the commission.

These features of the Galveston plan are embodied in the new Berkeley charter. But, even after responsibility has been fixed, it is desirable to have a direct means of reaching a faithless public servant. On this point the Des Moines plan was adapted to local needs.

The Des Moines Plan.

The Des Moines plan provides for the recall of a commissioner. Twenty per cent. of the voters at the next election of a mayor may petition for a special election to recall an officer. If he does not resign within five days he becomes a candidate for reelection, and within forty-five days the special election must be held, and, if he fails to receive a majority, his opponent succeeds at once to his office.

This feature of the Des Moines plan, together with the initiative and the referendum, are embodied in the new charter. By the initiative provision, 15 per cent. of the voters can demand an immediate special election to vote upon any proposed legislation within the power of the council to enact, and a majority vote is sufficient to pass the ordinance. Five per cent. of the voters can compel the submission of a law at the next general election.

Under the referendum provision, no ordinance of the council, with a few stated exceptions, can become effective until three months after its passage, and, during that thirty days, 10 per cent. of the voters can compel the council either to reconsider the ordinance or to submit it at a special election to the vote of the people, whose decision is final.

Regulation of Franchises.

Some of the provisions of the new charter relating to franchises were adapted from the "Chicago settlement"—the common-law agreement between that city and the Illinois Central Railroad, notably the provision that the city shall have a percentage of the income of public utilities companies. The Berkeley provisions limit the life of any public utility franchise to thirty-five years; permit the operation of the referendum on any grant of a franchise; give the council control over service and accommodations, and the power to fix rates; provide a way for the city to assume ownership upon expiration of a franchise; and provide that the city shall receive up to 5 per cent. of the gross revenues of its public service corporations as a condition of the granting of a franchise.

The new charter also provides for the direct nomination of officers, for the elimination of party symbols from the ballot. Nominations are by petition only, twenty-five signatures are sufficient to place a candidate's name on the ballot. At the election, any candidate receiving a majority vote is declared elected. If no candidate receives a majority vote for a particular office, a second election is held, and the people choose between the two having the highest vote at the first election which, for the filling of that particular office, is considered to be a primary election.

The new charter was adopted by a vote of six to one, by the people of Berkeley on January 30, 1909. It is probably the most advanced municipal charter in America, and will long stand as a model. It has one possible weakness: the ease with which candidates may be nominated opens an opportunity for a machine to split the reform vote among a lot of candidates and, by concentrating on two machine men, narrow the choice for an office to one or the other at the second election. Public vigilance can, however, prevent this.

The political fact that stands out most clearly in Berkeley's move for a new charter is that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League stirred up the feeling of public spirit that led to its inception and supplied the organization that made possible its adoption.

WHERE SHALL THE CHILDREN PLAY?

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

That question must be answered by every large city. Children crowded in city houses make poor physical specimens and poor citizens. Children running wild upon the streets endanger their lives, impede traffic, and perpetrate mischief. Children denied the opportunity to work off their animal spirits in wholesome exercise pervert those spirits to mischievous ways. Most juvenile crime originates in the most crowded parts of big cities.

What is San Francisco doing to provide playgrounds for its children?

Not Enough Playground.

Not nearly enough. Something has been done; something more is planned; certain bodies are enthusiastically urging that a great deal be done. But, though there should be a playground within four blocks of every child's home, there are to-day in San Francisco—a city of 400,000 inhabitants—only two public places legally set apart permanently for this purpose.

What has been done is this:

A block has been set aside at Seventh and Harrison streets, on the south side of the city, and another block at North Beach, on the north side of the city, under the control of the Playgrounds Commission. These are exclusively for the use of the children. The other places where they may now play are a few vacant lots lent by the Park Commission, a few vacant lots lent by private parties, and the streets. For the use of all these—except the streets—the Playgrounds Commission is largely responsible.

Origin of Playgrounds Movement.

The playgrounds movement in San Francisco originated with the ladies of the California Club. In their studies they had learned of the great advantages derived from it in eastern cities—Washington, New York, and, most notably, in Chicago. The last-named city has led the advance in this movement, spending millions of dollars to acquire blocks in every part of the city and extending the work to keep pace with the growth of population. Its experience has proved that juvenile disorder and juvenile crime decrease in exact ratio to the increase of playground facilities. It proved that the money spent was much more than saved by this decrease in police precautions and by the resultant decrease in adult crime, because the criminal who is potential in a cooped-up child ceased to grow up into an adult criminal when children were given other facilities for the expenditure of their energies and ingenuity.

The Playgrounds Commission.

With these facts in mind, the California Club besought the city government to form a Playgrounds Commission and to issue bonds to acquire sites for playgrounds. The city administration was favorably inclined, and the matter was made an issue of the election of 1907. At that election, the ladies got out and solicited votes. They had strong adherents in the firemen, for whom the club had performed many good offices; and by their own efforts and the co-operation of the fire department, they succeeded in polling enough votes to carry a charter amendment for the formation of a commission and to vote bonds to acquire the two grounds mentioned above. On November 23, 1907, the legislature approved the charter amendment, and in January, 1908, Mayor Taylor appointed the following members of the Playgrounds Commission, two of them being members of the California Club, in recognition of their labors to bring the issue out.

H. J. McCoy, secretary of the Y. M. C. A.; Mrs. L. A. Hayward; Mrs. Lovell White; Sidney S. Peixotto, of the Columbia Park Boy's Club; J. C. Estrada, superintendent of the Catholic Mission; John McLaren, superintendent of Golden Gate Park, and, ex-officio, the president of the Board of Education. John

W. Sweeney, president of the Iron Workers' Council was chosen secretary, and to him has been committed the executive oversight of the construction work on the playgrounds.

This commission has equal dignity with any other municipal board, and is equally entitled to call upon the Board of Supervisors for appropriations to carry out its work. It has had the hearty sympathy of the city administration.

Playgrounds for Every Child.

But the appropriations that have been possible so far are not enough. At the next bond election it is proposed to submit to the voters a bond issue sufficient to cover the expense of purchasing four additional sites for playgrounds for the exclusive and perpetual use of the children.

The sites are geographically distributed so as to supply every part of the city with the beginnings of an adequate system of playgrounds. They are located as follows: One in the Potrero, one at Dolores and Eighteenth streets, one at Dolores and Twenty-ninth streets, and one on Moscow street, well out on the Mission road.

The general plan of development of these playgrounds is indicated by the plan being worked out at North Beach. This ground (bounded by Powell, Greenwich, Mason, Lombard and Montgomery avenues) is being leveled and walled in. Baseball fields will be laid out upon it. A portion will be reserved for a girls' playground, and suitable games such as basket-ball will be provided for their use. The Board of Works will construct two swimming pools; one, for warm water, and the other, for cold sea baths. These pools will be shallow—so that children may use them to splash in and to learn to swim.

How the Grounds Are Used.

Several hundred children can be accommodated on such a playground. Not only have they the advantage of providing exercise in the open air, but that exercise is of a kind that appeals to children. For one boy who likes to go through the military drill of gymnasium exercises under the disciplinary eye of a director, there are a hundred who like to play baseball. It has the competitive element; it allows the initiative of the boys to exercise itself; they play the game they like as they please, settling their own disputes, instead of going through a cut-and-dried program prepared by somebody else. As Mr. Sweeney has pointed out, when there were plenty of vacant lots in San Francisco, in earlier days, this city turned out many of the best professional ball players in the country; and now it turns out very few. Developing professional ball players is not the aim of the Playgrounds Commission, but Mr. Sweeney's instance illustrates the point that the facilities for outdoor play are a fair index of the physical development of the boys of a city.

Temporary Playgrounds.

At the request of the commission, other grounds have been lent for temporary use. The park commissioners have lent Lobos Square, on the north side of town, and this will be made into a baseball field of the eastern lawn type. An oval tract of land opposite the Mission High School, in Mission Park, has also been lent for use as a playground and running track. And Franklin Park will be made into a baseball field for the boys.

The ideal playground should have separate spaces for boys and girls; should be supplied with some gymnastic apparatus; should have as director an educated man with a knowledge of games and a sympathetic insight into boys' character, and, as assistant, a matron to look after the girls; and should have a permanent building, equipped with baths, dressing rooms, and reading room. This building, in eastern cities, is also used for a lecture hall for the purpose of bringing the children's parents together and of keeping them in touch with the younger folks' recreations.

School Yards Not Now Utilized.

An important adjunct of the public playground is the school yard. In San Francisco, so far, this adjunct has not been utilized. The janitors have complained that the children make extra work by using the grounds after school and on holidays; and the janitors seem to have controlled the situation. This is a great mistake in policy.

Fortunately, some work has been done to change this policy. Under the leadership of Mr. Sidney S. Peixotto, the Board of Education has granted permission to erect basketball courts on the school grounds, and here the boys and girls are to be allowed to play after school under the direction of a teacher. This is a good move. It should lead ultimately to further adaptations of school grounds to playground purposes, not only on school days but on Saturdays and holidays.

Mr. Peixotto has also taken the lead in another movement allied with purposes of the playground commission. This is to form a league of all the schools, known as the Public School Athletic League. For lack of facilities for other sports, the events contested for under its auspices are all running races, but these have aroused the athletic spirit among the boys amazingly. Each school, to win in a meet, must have a full squad of runners. A full squad is forty-four boys. There are twenty-eight public schools in the league, so that more than 1,000 boys will compete in the two meets held this year. Fourteen parochial schools have also adopted the plan. The result is that nearly 2,000 boys of San Francisco are getting wholesome exercise and a development of the competitive spirit. A further result is a very notable improvement in school-room behavior. The boy is owed on a team who falls below a fixed standard of scholarship and behavior.

Children's Appreciation.

Some idea of the popular appreciation of playgrounds may be got from the playground at Golden Gate Park. Though this is a playground—the others will be free—thousands of children flock to it on clear days, paying their nickels for rides on the merry-go-rounds, and on the goats and donkeys, and for the privilege of using the swings and teeter-boards. On May Day as many as 20,000 children have come. Other thousands romp on the grass, and through the ball grounds and tennis courts. But these enjoyments cost at least carfare to and from the park, and usually the privilege of some elder escort. With playgrounds properly distributed throughout the city, every child could walk to a free place for exercise and recreation, away from the baneful influence and the physical dangers of the streets, to enjoy its games under the eye of a sympathetic director who would not interfere with the pleasure but only see that everyone had a fair opportunity to play safely and happily.

Advantages to General Public.

The gain will be incalculable. A race of healthier children, growing up under wholesome and rational conditions. Fewer criminals, fewer probation officers, fewer juvenile courts, fewer reform schools. Fewer adult criminals, fewer policemen, fewer criminal courts, fewer jails. Less taxes for the machinery of hospitals and criminal law. More happiness in youth and more health in manhood and womanhood.

It is an alluring prospect. Better, it is a practical possibility—a demonstrated success. Chicago has proved it; Washington has proved it; Denver has proved it. San Francisco should not overlook it. The California Club is doing its best. The Playgrounds Commission is hard at it, the Mission Improvement Club is doing a great deal. Every voter can help. How? When the next bond election comes around, look for the issue for playgrounds, and vote for it.

LIVING AS JESUS WOULD.

The Editor of The California Weekly:

"I noticed with a bit of questioning in your interesting paper your remarks about the Los Angeles people who are trying to 'live as Jesus would.' Possibly they deserve a little gentler rally. But, after all, why should we not encourage them in such innocent efforts? Surely, meanness, dishonesty, greed and selfishness are abnormal exercises of human activity and kindness, truth-telling, justice and friendliness are normal. Is it not worth while for any individual to take 'a week off' if he can, from his invalidism, and try the experiment of being well? Who knows but that he might thus resume a habit of health? At any rate, let us not discourage him. Much less, let us treat that man generally have nothing but invalidism, whether physical or moral, to expect. We need not go daft over 'Christian Science' to deprecate this morbid use of the power of mental suggestion.

One further question. Do you not quite misuse the example of Jesus, when you set his life aside as exceptional? As it is again, there had never been but one normal life, and all other lives were foredoomed to moral failure! This reminds me painfully of the teaching which in my childhood went under the name of 'total depravity.' We have begun to learn what bad pedagogy this doctrine was. Expect boys or men to be mean and false, and you tend at once to make them so. On the contrary, trust them and expect their best from them, and you help them to be what you expect. Is it, then, a very dreadful form of heresy in California to say that all goodness is simply the highest form of power, such as all men, and all boys, too, admire; that it is natural and normal, like all other kinds of power, and that Jesus' instance, like many another, such as we all know (Abraham Lincoln's, for example) marks the rule of life, and not the exception? At any rate, if you desire goodness, that is, justice, loyalty, generosity, kindness to prevail (and your paper seems designed for that purpose!) is it not your role to encourage everyone to try 'the experiment of Jesus,' in other words, the experiment of living the life of a man of good will, as opposed to illwill and self-will? Surely, we all live this experiment whenever we try it. Neither is it so very hard, being quite normal. Tried often enough, it might become a habit.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES F. DOYLE.

CELEBRATING FREMONT'S FLAG RAISING.

On the peak where sixty-three years ago last Sunday Captain John C. Fremont raised the American flag in California for the first time, 150 Californians gathered on the anniversary day to do honor to the "Pathfinder" and his sturdy followers who played such a potent part in the early times antedating the better chronicled "days of '49." The historic ceremony was reenacted, the guests of honor, Col. M. Belslaw, grand president of the Native Sons of the Golden West, raising Uncle Sam's official banner on Fremont's peak in the Gabilan mountains near the mission town of San Juan Bautista. Just as the flag stretched out to the breeze, saluting guns pealed forth the message in the neighboring towns of Hollister and Salinas on a prearranged signal, and for the time California turned back from the height of sixty years of forward and upward trend to survey the majestic past.

The fitting tribute to the day that is done was but the culmination of a series of interesting events carried out under the auspices of the Fremont Memorial Association in a program prepared by its chairman, Harry Welch.

At midnight on Saturday, after a banquet and a ball in honor of the guests, Senator Belslaw raised the flag on the flagstaff erected by the association on another historic spot, in the plaza near the mission, the spot where the land and naval forces first met on California soil, where history was making more than half a century before. Here the mission chimes one day gave place to the echoed report of the rifle that made a place for the thirty-first in the blue field of the flag hoisted on Saturday last and brought California into the union.

If you was to leave the railroad south o' Barstow now," said "Long Bill" Brooks, "and travel eastward a couple of days or so through the infernal regions, which is another an' more fittin' name for the Mojave desert, you would come at last, if the water didn't give out, to where the mountains reach their fingers inquiringly down into the desert sands, as much as to say, 'What sort of a combination is this that we have run up against?' Then, between two of the most inquiring of these fingers, as you would, if you was in luck, come upon a little valley with a few stunted trees an' a small, melancholy creek, lookin' as if it 'twas 'bout discouraged 'nough to give up, which it does before it goes much further; an' by that time you would be mighty glad to notice that there was somethin' more or less resemblin' water in that creek."

"After you had taken a drink, an' had mighty nigh dried up the creek in the process, you nacherally would look around you, an' you'd be surprised to notice six little log cabins standin' jest where they ketch the mist shade from the hills. While you was inspectin' those cabins, that, in that desert dryness, still would be standin' there unrotted when Gabriel toots his horn, you probably would be wonderin' what forgotten hands had placed them there.—Well, these hands of mine are two of them."

"The place that you then would be lookin' on once was known as Badger's Camp, so called because old man Badger found his thirsty way across the desert an' discovered that the bed of that crick was midlin' yellow with gold. One by one the rest of us drifted in an' settled down by old man Badger's side. There was Big Bob Bevins, who was five feet tall an' built accordin'; Handsome Charley Peters, so called because the Almighty could make a homelier man, but prob'ly never did; Little Willie Hodges, who built the tallest of the cabins, so that he could stand up inside o' the Elder, who once accidentally admitted that he had been a travelin' exhorter in the East, an' myself."

"We stayed at Badger's Camp 'bout three years before that that I am tellin' 'bout took place, an' the only diversions was an occasional trip to Mojave for supplies an' the arrival of the Elder's paper. The paper was published at a little side-track in Wisconsin, an' was not of national note, but we used to get its advertisements by heart. You can't guess what a godsend that paper was to our lone convicts."

"One evenin' we had, as usual, been playin' poker, when Handsome Charley drew back from the table with a sigh, an' says:

"'I'm gittin' sick of this! They's such a thing as wearin' out the fascination of poker, an' as for whiskey I'm beginnin' to realize that at last it biteth like a serpent an' stingeth like a hornet."

"'You mean, like an adder' says the Elder, not reprovingly, but as a little matter of education."

"'Take your choice of reptiles,' says Handsome Charley; 'what I mean is that I'm sick of this life. What this camp needs is the reinin', elevatin', an' gentlifyin' influence of woman."

"'Why not advertise for a wife?' says the Elder."

"He jest threw the remark off casually at the time, but afterwards we allowed that it was an inspiration. After thinkin' of the matter for a day or two, Handsome Charley said that he'd be derned if he wouldn't advertise, an' we all allowed the Wisconsin paper would do the thing."

"We all took a hand in drawin' the thing which read this way:

"'Wanted—A California miner wants a wife for a lovin' companion. He is not handsome, but good, an' has plenty of money for two, or more, if needed. Any lady answerin' this must be under thirty years of age an' prepared to prove that she is of good reputation an' without blemish. For more particulars address Miner, Mojave, Cal.'"

"The words 'without blemish' was introduced at the suggestion of Big Bob, who had done some horse-tradin' in the East. The Elder objected on the ground that they seemed too personal, but Handsome Charley thought they sounded all right, an' as he was most interested, they stood."

CUPID AT BADGER'S CAMP

By ALFRED JAMES

"Judgin' by results, that simple announcement must have produced somethin' of a sensation in the East, an' we calculated that it must have been republished more or less widely. Either that, or the Clarion had a broader circulation than we reckoned, for, of the seventy-three letters that we took from the post office the next time one of us made a trip to Mojave, two were from Maine, two from Texas, three from Georgia, an' four from Minnesota, to say nothin' of a few from scattered states an' one from Cuba. The most of them, however, came from the Clarion's nacheral constituency."

"Take them as a whole, these were the most touchin' lot of letters I ever read. In them the female heart was laid bare, an' its willin'ness to mate with anything with money for two or more was made manifest. The Elder, whose heart always was 'specially tender, was particularly moved."

"'Why,' he said, after we had read them all through, 'why are we not Mormons? When I think of all this female loveliness languishin' and droopin' I could wish that we all were Mormons. Oh, if only we were all—"

"The Elder's feelings sort o' overcame him, an' he ceased."

"Old man Badger was the first to break the line of sympathy that the Elder's words had traced."

"'Well, we ain't Mormons,' he said, but it 'pears providential that there's six of us, an', if each of us does his duty, there'll be only sixty-seven of the lone creatures left to mourn and pine. For my part, I announce here an' now that I'm willin' to do my duty."

"'Do you mean that you stand willin' to marry one of the lone females?' Little Willie asked."

"'I do,' was the old man's reply. 'So help me Heaven, my mind is made up to rescue one of them."

"'Then, I, too, am a rescuer,' says Big Bob."

"'And I!' says the rest of the straight an' 'Ours' voices sounded like that of one man, so united were we in our willin'ness to take up the work of rescue. All except the Elder; he reflected a minute before he spoke. Then he said:

"'I had been calculatin' to unite Charley an' his in the bonds of wedlock, for though I may have wandered some from the straight an' narrer path, my privilege of licensin' two hearts to beat as one has not expired, I reckon. But I cannot permit my pleasure to stand in the way of doin' my duty in lightnin' some desolate female heart; so if you boys 'll help ward the expense of gettin' a minister here from Mojave, I, too, will become a rescuer."

"Then we went to work. After we had thrown away the least attractive of the lot, we still had nineteen letters between which there seemed to be no choice. We selected among these by layin' them out on a table, closin' our eyes an' takin' the first on which we laid a hand. Then we wrote to the six, givin' them references, an' to meet them at Mojave on a certain day."

"Then began the time of waitin', an' every day seemed a week or two long. The hours of work passed after a manner, but poker lost its thrill an' we let whiskey alone because we knew that men that were goin' to be married ought to reform. Finally, however, it came time for Handsome Charley to go to Los Angeles an' buy our wedding suits, and he went. Then the time dragged slower than ever till a melancholy event happened that mighty near upset all our plans."

"In the course of his minin' operations old man Badger had gradually unrolled a big boulder that rested on the bank of the crick above his claim. We'd called his 'tentation often 'nough to the danger of the situation, but the old man was a careless sort of a cuss, an' said that the stone seemed to be pretty well set an' he reckoned it was all right. Well, he was miscalculated; that's all. One day the boulder came down onto the old man's claim, an' we always reckoned he must have been under it when it fell; anyway we never saw anything more of him. The boulder made a mighty impressive monument, an' we painted onto it the old man's name an' the simple epitaph, 'He meant well, but he took one chance too many.' We 'lowed that if his widdar that was to have been, if she could decide which one of the six she was wanted anything more'n that in her grief, she could have it, an' we would stand the expense."

"That little event cast a shadder of gloom over Badger's Camp, an' the solemn hours dragged themselves away till the time came for us to go to Mojave and meet Handsome Charley."

"We dreaded burstin' in on his wedding anticipations with such news, but it had to be did, an' he stood it fairly well, merely remarkin' that he was awful sorry for the widdar, whichever she was."

"As I think of it now, I realize that there was some drawback to our perfect success as bridegrooms. The main fault lay with Charley. In his lack of experience, he bought a job lot of garments for our wedding clothin'. If they hadn't been all the same size they would have done first rate, but as it was, Big Bob Bevins had to take a tuck at his coat an' roll up his pants 'bout a foot at the bottom, while Little Willie Hodges' coat extended 'bout to his waist an' his pants stopped short, never to go again, some two inches below his knees. The rest of us wasn't exactly like these fashion-plates you see in the magazine, but a sight o' them two was calculated to make more or less sadness creep over the soul. The minister Charley had brought from Los Angeles used to look at us in our wedding garments, an' then go away where he could be alone. It may have been for purposes of prayer, but I always doubted it."

"Well, the train finally come, an' so did the women, an' we stood on the platform to receive them. There was seven of the ladies, the mother of one of the girls havin' come along to see that her daughter had fair play."

"We had talked the whole thing over in advance, an' we knew mighty well that each of us would be expected to kiss his prospective bride, an' seein' as we didn't know jest which one she was, the question of what we ought to do had staggered us for a while. But when the time come we seen our duty clear, an' so each of us kissed the whole caboodle, includin' the old lady. Then we suggested that the whole party start immediately for the camp, so that the hard work be done before we happy mated, an' the Elder was the first to do it. I s'pose, they wanted to see what sort of a realm they was goin' to be queens of before they took a step that wouldn't allow any backslidin'. It was on the second day out that the old lady got her second wind an' noticed something."

"There 'pears to be only five of you besides the clergyman,' she says. 'I s'pose you left the other one in camp to wait for us?'"

"'We did,' I says, 'an' he's a mighty patient waiter. He's dead."

"'Dead!' she shrieked. 'Decayed!'"

"'It's the same thing, ma'am, I says. 'He is also defunct."

"The old woman glared at me first. Then she broke out."

"'Wretch!' she screamed. 'To get six trustin' young females out on this desert to marry five men!'"

Automobile Notes.

T. F. Moore, who will have charge of the international ocean to ocean contest for the
M. Robert Guggenheim trophy, returned to New York from Seattle recently, where he completed the preliminary arrangements for the event. When Mr. Moore was asked regarding the recommendation of the contest committee of the Automobile Club of America that the starting date be advanced from June 1 to May 20 he said he was afraid that plans had gone too far to make the change possible.
"Arrangements have already been made," said Mr. Moore, "by the Senators from the State of Washington to have the contest started by President Taft, who will press a button at May 20 in the White House, which will open the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, and at the same time ring a bell in New York city, which will be the signal for the start of the contest. It is hoped that Mayor McClellan will fire the starter's pistol and send the competing drivers away on their 4,000 mile journey.

To meet the wishes of those interested, however, I have wired to Seattle to-day and will endeavor to have the starting date advanced as recommended by the Automobile Club of America contest committee. The officials of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition will erect a special building in which the competing cars are to be exhibited after arriving at Seattle, space being allotted in the order in which the contestants arrive at the exposition grounds."

Through snow and mud, over ice and rough roads, Harry Hall White of the Studebaker F-M-F '30, factory at Detroit, Mich., has just established a new record in motordom in Utah by crossing the state in the dead of winter in one of the new Studebaker F-M-F
'30, cars. The route which White and his two companions followed took them through some treacherous canyons, and in some instances they were compelled to drive for miles over the ties of the railroad tracks.

Despite the heavy obstacles against which the car was pitted it came out almost without a scratch, as there was never a moment's time lost on the run with engine trouble or with tire trouble. Besides, the run was made in the shortest time that an automobile ever crossed the Mormon state.

"Pack my box with five dozen liquor jugs" is considered the most successful approach to the oft-attempted feat of making a coherent sentence that shall use every letter of the alphabet, and each letter only once. This sentence duplicates only six letters.

He Never Wins.

I have seen all kinds of racers on my somewhat winding way.
And some of them were losers, some were winners of the day.
But sum them up, or sum them down, this thing must be confessed:
The winner of the race was ne'er the one who stopped to rest.

"Mamma," asked the little boy who had been allowed to stay up and take dinner with company, "Mamma, is this desert bad for me, or isn't there enough to go around?"—Lip-

Efficiency is the only logical basis for comparison of an automobile. Few persons appreciate that fact. Ask any Studebaker-Garford owner; he'll tell you the worst that it's due to the higher efficiency of the Studebaker-Garford that he is the owner of time.

Regardless of rating, these cars excel in year-in-and-year-out performance. If an owner wants a new model he always wants a later one of the same make; therefore he brings his old car to us—for, better than anyone else, we know and appreciate its value.

Let us send you a list of owners of Studebaker-Garford cars men of prominence who have driven their machine three, four and five years. Let their verdict determine your choice.

('Cupid at Badger's Camp'—Concluded.)

"'You hadn't ought to blame him,' I says. 'He didn't mean to do it, an' he wan't at all anxious to. Old man Badger was as well-meanin'—"

"She stopped my talk by yellin' to the girls to come to her.

"We had to camp right there on the desert and argue the matter, an' it was the warmest debate I ever 'sawed'. All of the girls was cryin', an' the old lady kept gettin' madder an' madder the more she listened to her own voice. We tried to make them see that we meant well, an' that we wan't responsible for Old Man Badger's gettin' under that stone, but the more we talked the more the girls wept, while the old lady's voice kept gettin' shriller and shriller. Finally the Elder took a hand,

"'Dear madam an' even dearer young ladies,' he says—'he always had a soothin' way with him—we recognize how your feelin's must be outraged to think that old man Badger went an' got killed, an' we sympathize with you deeply, while not exactly condemning him, yu must allow that the camp would be a fitter place to continue this argument than is this desert where the mercy would stand at 124 in the shade if there was any shade. So if you'll come on to the camp now we'll do the right thing by you or break a cog, for that is our intention.

"Well, the women see he was right, an' so the procession started again, but the rest of the way we were more or less flooded by tears. I wouldn't lie, suppose that the women could strike water so easy out there on that desert.

"After we had reached Badger's Camp we laid the matter square before them trustin' females at once.

"'Ladies,' says the Elder, 'there's five of us and there's six of you, to say nothin' of the mother, who didn't expect to count in this matrimonial shuffle. There's the fact; there's six of you an' there's five of us, an' we can't call back the dead who is believed to be sleepin' under 'round here. Now what we propose, under these harrin' circumstances, is that you six draw cuts, an' the one of you that draws a blank gets no husband, but she gets $500 that we're willin' to chip in to sooth her lacerated feelin's. How does that strike you?'

"It struck them that the proposition was tough, an' the old lady didn't hesitate to say so. She said that the poor girls had gone out there to be married, an' that everybody knew it, an' that if one of them went back unwedded she would be forever disgraced an' dishonored. Her language was quite eloquent, an' she herself wept when she heard it.

"Well, then,' says the Elder, as soon as he got a chance to chip in, 'if that proposition don't suit you, here's another that we have thought of: None of us is Mormons, but under these tryin' circumstances, any one of us is willin' to become one providin' two of you are agree'ble to take one of us for their only an' own husband. How does that plan hit you?'

"The old lady said it hit them as infamous, an' the girls shed some more bitter tears. I don't deny we were a mighty discouraged lot of men then, so we withdrew for consultation, shakin' our heads an' lookin' at each other glum enough. Big Bob was the first to speak.

"Boys,' he says, 'they is one thing clear, an' that is that we can't let these lone an' unprotected females trust us in vain. It's up to us to do something. Charley, is that gospel sharp that you fetched a married man, do you know?'

"We caught Big Bob's idea right away, an' we looked at Charley with consider'ble hope. His answer was comfortin'.

"He is not,' he says; 'I know, for he told me that he looked forrard to a time when he should know the conjugal bliss that we soon was goin' to know.'

"Well, this is his chance,' says Big Bob, 'an' if you fellows will join me we'll see that he makes the most of it.

"We didn't take much time to consider the matter, for we seen our duty clear. We sent for the parson, an' we appointed Little Willie to state the case to him, bearin' in mind that he had the most commandin' presence. As soon as the parson come Little Willie got down to business.

"Reverend sir,' he says, you can take a reasonable amount of time in answerin', but which one of these peerless ladies is your choice for a wife?'

"The parson was dumbfounded.

"'Wha-wha-what do you mean?' he says.

"Bein' as you're a man that humbly tries to do his duty,' says Little Willie, 'you ought to recognize what I mean, but, seem' as you don't seem to, I'm authorized to explain that there's six ladies here to git married, an' owin' to an act of Providence, there's only five of us here, besides yourself, to marry 'em. Now set right down to your conscience, an' you'll realize that it's your duty to get in an' take a hand in the game.'

"The parson twiggid us then, an' 'Never!' he yells, 'I have made other arrangements.'

"I'm sorry about the other 'rangements, whatever her name is,' says Little Willie, 'for the way the thing stands here, you can't help seein' that it's your duty to play a hand in this game, which includes drawin' a queen. We're goin' to be good to you an' we offer you first choice, but we reckon you'll do your duty after you've thought of it a while.'

"I never seen a more obstinate man than that parson; he was almost mulish, an' he kept insistin' that he wouldn't marry. There we'd given him his choice of six beautiful girls, an' he still stood off. It was disgraceful! Finally Little Willie's patience give out an' he says: "'Well, I s'pose it's nothral that you should want time for considerin' an important matter like this, so we'll just put you in Big Bob's cabin till you can decide, an' we'll take the slight liberty of lockin' the door so that you won't be interrupted.'

"The parson put up a good fight for a peaceful man, but he stood no show 'gainst five of us. After we had him where he could reflect, we went an' told the ladies that he had decided to marry one of them, only stipulatin' that he should be permitted to pass a few days in preparatory facin' an prayin' first.

"An' he is now engaged in that fastin' an' prayin', said Big Bob to them.

"You ought to have seen the glad light on them female countenances when they realized that all of them would be married. It was beautiful.

"On the fourth day the parson give up. He first tried to get us to consent to his just bein' engaged to one of the girls, but we wan't takin' chances, an' his subsequent behavior was model. When we asked him, as soothin' as we could, which lady he would prefer, he said: "'If there's a Baptist among them, I think I should choose her.' He was a Baptist himself.

"Inquiry developed the fact that the homeliest girl in the lot was a Baptist, and so everything was arranged to the satisfaction of everybody. Meantime, we had been prayin' off more or less, an' our arrangements was pretty much completed.

"That afternoon one couple after another was happily married, the Elder officiatin' at the parson's wedding. After that there were general congratulations, an' even the parson seemed pretty well satisfied—he had caught a Baptist, you know. The next mornin', before they left on their long journey to Los Angeles, we gave the parson the bride the $500 we had meant to give to the woman that didn't marry, callin' that was 'bout right.

"The marriages was average successful," said Mr. Brooks. "Let's do something to improve our stomachs."

So we did.

A New Napoleon Story.

In a discussion at one of the sessions of the Council of State concerning the organization of the navy the First Consul said:

"A man who has been forty years a pilot is not the man for commander of a ship. He who has obeyed for forty years is not capable of commanding. On this subject my opinion is contrary to that of other people. It has been said that in order to command one must know how to obey. I think that a man who has merely known how to obey for forty years is no longer the qualities of a commander, and that it would not be right to give the command of a ship to a man who, when he is not receiving orders, knows only how to go to bed."

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire Press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement.

In short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and equipping 2,000 card papers per week, we have no unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover Congressional districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

Liberty of the Press.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." It does not say that no state legislature shall do that, but only that Congress shall not, and yet there are comparatively few papers in this country that do not circulate in more than one state, and many of them circulate in all the states of the union and countries of the world. It was not, apparently, foreseen that the American press was to be essentially national, not state, and, therefore, as fit a subject for national as for state control.

There is no such thing in this country as legal control of the press, either by state or nation. There are laws for punishing libel and slander, but those adjudged guilty of libel may be punished as readily if the libel be written on a billboard, a postal card, a goods box or in a letter to a friend, as if published in a newspaper circulating in every state in the union. The press is not recognized by law as an institution, but whoever prints or publishes is recognized merely as a citizen, and held accountable for his acts as such.

Anyone may print or publish whatever he wishes and there is, in this country, no power to prevent him, but when he has once printed and published any statement, there are laws for his punishment, criminally, by fine or imprisonment, or, civilly, by suits for damages if injury has been inflicted.

In some countries of Europe, notably Russia, it is different. There are press censors who must read and approve every book or paper before it is published with the view of preventing such publications as are likely to prove injurious. It was formerly so in all countries, and it was a long struggle to our present position where publication cannot be prevented, but only punished after the injury has been inflicted. At first thought, it would appear contrary to sound policy, for, generally speaking, the law should strive to forestall the commission of offenses, an ounce of prevention being worth a pound of cure.

But human experience has shown that no one but the publisher himself can safely be entrusted with the power of press censorship. The censors of Russia not only strive to keep from the public literature that would be bad for the public, but literature that would be good for the public and only bad for those in office. It is inevitable that any power of official censorship, no matter to whom entrusted, would be abused to the public hurt. The writer remembers hearing two high officials of a California railroad discussing "The Man With the Hoe," and both agreed that Edwin Markham should have been imprisoned for publishing that splendid poem, and that corporation would, to-day, if it had the power, censor the press of this state as not to allow a word of criticism of it to be printed or published.

And yet it cannot be denied that the abuse of liberty by the press of the country is a trying affliction to the public. Lies are told without stint, and abuse is heaped upon the innocent to an extent that shocks the moral sense of all who possess a moral sense, and there seems to be no adequate remedy for it.

There is no apparent lack of law. The constitution of California declares that "Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right, and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. In all criminal prosecutions for libels the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and, if it shall appear to the jury, that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted. The black letter lines in this paragraph epitomize the spirit of the law in this country, and England, regarding the freedom of the press.

Once again let it be affirmed that there is a law on paper and a law written in the hearts, minds and consciences of the people, and that the law so written transcends the printed law. The whole destiny of the press in this country hangs on the attitude of the jury toward the press. This jury, normally empaneled, reflects public sentiment at the hour that a case against a paper is submitted to a jury, and it makes little difference in the verdict that jury will render what the statute prescribes or the constitution contains. Humanity has suffered so much from repression, so seriously from keeping the truth away from the people, that the consensus of opinion is that it is better to suffer the ills of libel and license than the tyranny of censorship of speech or publication. The most effective weapon of defense the public has against a venal and scurrilous publication is to refuse to have it in the house, a weapon that has been less used than it deserves to be.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person signing in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

SIGNIFICANT EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The most important event of the week was the convening of Congress in extra session to undertake a revision of the tariff. The President's message was short and, beyond a reference to his tariff views as expressed in his inaugural address, merely counseled diligence in preparing the tariff measure and a refraining from other legislation. In his inaugural address the President laid down the principle that the primary purpose of tariff should be the production of revenue but that, incidental to revenue, such protection should be afforded American industries as will make up the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home. How far those preferences of the President will be respected by Congress remains to be seen, but that they may modify the selfishness of the general scramble is to be hoped.

There are intimations that Washington is to take positive action regarding Central America and that Mexico is in accord with the United States in such a policy. Former Governor Magoon, of Panama and Cuba, is likely to be our special representative in Central American states. It seems probable that a movement toward intervention may put those dictatorial republics on their good behavior for a time, but the manifestation of a purpose to intervene if need requires is of itself a bit of news of great interest. Every year that the Government of the United States delays asserting authority in those republics constitutes a dereliction of national duty. Consideration for humanity requires that stable government shall be established in those unfortunate states.

The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, in reviewing the decision of the lower court in the "we don't patronize" cases, substantially modified the decision of the lower court. To be sure it held that the boycott by the American Federation of Labor against the Buck's Store and Range company was illegal and that the "we don't patronize" list published in the federation paper "constituted a talismanic symbol indicative to the membership of the federation that a boycott is on," and that the lower court was warranted in forbidding such publication. But, it was declared, the lower court should have stopped there without striving to regulate the distribution of other matter. That is, the information sent out by mail, in advance of the issuance of the injunction, had a right to go. Chief Justice Shepard, in a dissenting opinion, maintained a much more liberal attitude than the majority of the court. He held that the court had no power to prevent the publication of the "we don't patronize" list, but that whoever did publish it was actionable for damages or criminally liable if libel was committed. This has been the view of courts heretofore and it is not improbable that still higher courts will take the view of the chief justice rather than of his associates. The case involving the imprisonment of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison has not yet been heard on appeal.

BY

William Frederic Bade

French ambition to maintain a navy the equal of that of Germany has sustained a severe shock in the discovery that French naval contractors have been so unpatriotic as to combine for the purpose of extorting great prices for naval construction work of indifferent quality. Premier Clemenceau has instituted a rigid investigation and the public mind is greatly exercised over the facts that have already developed.

The issue between the United Mine Workers of America and the anthracite operators has not been adjusted. With a stubbornness suggestive of fatuity the operators refused to treat with the representatives of the union as representatives of the union, but only as representatives of the miners working in those particular mines. However, the operators did suggest a willingness to continue the present working agreement three years more, and it may be that the miners will accept the proposal, although there are many points in it not to their liking. The old agreement expires the last day of March and, if an agreement is not reached meantime, it is anticipated that a strike will be ordered and the old strife renewed. Commercial interests are watching the situation closely for peace or war in the coal regions means much to commercial life.

The iron and steel industry now holds the center of interest in the industrial and commercial world. A general reduction in wages has been ordered in nearly all of the steel plants, including the great United States Steel corporation. It is not yet certain how the laborers will receive this action. Their present attitude seems to be that of a willingness to submit to a temporary reduction in wages if the investors will also submit to a pro rata reduction in dividends, but they do not wish to submit to a reduction in wages for the purpose of maintaining dividends at the normal standard. No reasonable person can take exceptions to this attitude of the laboring mind and if the capitalistic mind will betray a like sanity of disposition the industrial health of the country will soon be restored.

That there has been an enormous shrinkage of steel manufactured and consumed is made evident by the figures given out by the United States Steel corporation. Its gross earnings for 1908 were nearly $275,000,000 less than for the preceding year and its net earnings nearly $70,000,000 less. Evidently the country is either waiting for better prices or is not yet ready for a forward movement. The cut in prices may be, as it should be, to stimulate consumption, or it may be, as it has been reported, the beginning of a price war with the purpose of forcing into the United States Steel corporation all of the principal competitors of that corporation. There is talk also of the independents joining in another great, single corporation powerful enough to measure swords with the biggest corporation in the world, but that looks more like a movement to combine all in one than all in two concerns. There can be no true independence in production without many independent companies each working in its own way. The significance of this steel news consists in its being, next to farming, the greatest factor in national prosperity.

An issue is being fought out on French soil of surpassing interest to those who are looking forward to the happy time when the government shall own and operate the railroads and the telegraphs. The telegraph operators on the government telegraph lines are out on strike and have virtually shut Paris off from communication with the outer world. The precise points at issue have not been stated, but there are dissatisfactions as to hours and wages which the government did not make haste to adjust. Hence the leaving open of the keys, the smashing of the telephone switchboards and a walk out. Operators connected with the army have been ordered into service and they have responded, but they are too few to restore the service or anything like it. The world-issue involved is as to whether or not employees of governments are to stand in the same relation as employees of corporations, at liberty to quit when they desire, to go on strike when they please, or if they will have to enlist as do soldiers to serve until discharged or be punished for mutinous conduct. If public ownership in France determines this issue definitely it will confer upon the world an important favor.

A NATURE LOVER'S VIEW.

It is with gratification that we are able to lay before our readers an extremely well-written and good tempered view of the Hetch-Hetchy water problem, prepared for The California Weekly by Dr. William Frederic Bade, of Berkeley, one of our enthusiastic lovers of nature. There are those, very likely, who regret public discussion of the pros and cons of this issue, saying, "It is not with the right or the wrong, the fairness or unfairness, of the proposal that we are concerned, but can we get it?"

It is needless to say that The California Weekly has no sympathy with such an attitude of mind, and no faith in the policy of the ostrich hiding the head in the sand to avoid confronting a disagreeable prospect. Besides, our coast and state are being flooded with eastern periodicals and eastern periodicals are being flooded with anti-Hetch-Hetchy literature.

The wise policy is to thresh the issue out here at home that we may come to one mind on the proposal if we can. The article of Mr. J. D. Galloway, a fortnight ago, and of Dr. Bade in this issue, mark progress, but the issue has not yet been fully joined and further discussion is needed.

It is a splendid possibility which Dr. Bade holds out to San Francisco and the associated bay cities when he makes it clear that the Tuolumne source will not only supply an abundance of pure water, but also an abundance of electric power for public utilities and at a price many millions less than from any other source. If it be true, as claimed by him, that the enjoyment of this use will wholly deprive the public of the use of a most interesting area of Sierra outing ground, then it is inevitable that one or the other, the public or the bay cities, must make great sacrifice. Which shall it be? Is it not defensible on patriotic and moral grounds for residents of the bay cities to say that it shall not be the bay cities who are to make this sacrifice if they can avoid it?

Another point worthy of consideration: If there be other sources of water supply for the bay cities there are there not also other outing grounds for the American public adequate without the Tuolumne watershed? Have our Sierras so shrunken that, from Mount Whitney to Shasta, there are not enough of rugged fastnesses so that this one area can be set aside without public deprivation? Those conversant with our higher mountains might profitably be heard on this phase of the issue.

Again, those who oppose the Hetch-Hetchy plan confess a willingness to oblige the bay cities to the utmost except they will not do so merely to save dollars, and they speak of $10,000,000 as though it were a bagatelle, but is it? San Francisco has, within three years, undergone the greatest single destruction of property in authenticated human history. The generation that sustained that loss will not live to recoup it. In the light of the great fire it would seem that the item of "mere dollars" might be entitled to more consideration than has been given it. But of this, too, further discussion may well be had.

THE HOLD-OVER PRODUCT.

Fresno is up against a hold-over surplus in the hands of merchants that prevents the movement of the new raisin crop, to the great distress of growers and dealers. What is to be done about it?

There are two ways of relieving a condition of that kind, diminish the product or extend the use. Left to themselves the natural laws of trade apply both of those remedies automatically and effectively. The cheapened product works its way into new uses and markets, low prices discourage production somewhat, and equilibrium between supply and demand, always unstable, is restored.

Fresno is striving to facilitate this process by teaching the people of the United States new uses for the raisin. This is the wisest measure Fresno has yet attempted in its struggle on behalf of raisins. It will lack in expedition but the cure will be fairly permanent.

Modern combination has sought to overcome the fluctuations of supply and demand by keeping the market in a state of artificial hunger. This implies both a restricted product and a restricted consumption and is repugnant to sound policy, which should strive for an ample supply and an ever widening use. Fresno tried combination and failed. Competition, also, an immutable law of trade, has finally broken every such effort down.

The best, or worst, that combination in restraint of production and consumption has so far done has been to delay, not overcome, competition. The reduction in the price of steel, lately witnessed, was a confession on the part of the United States Steel Corporation of its inability to prevent competition. Brazil issued its bonds in the sum of $100,000,000, and invested the proceeds in coffee, in order that its growers might go right on producing coffee with unabated zeal, notwithstanding the fact that the world is drinking "small blacks" instead of large. Brazil is not likely to repeat that experiment.

Combinations in restraint of trade are against public policy because they tend to keep the world hungry instead of filled, the consuming power of the people low instead of high, the range of consumption narrow instead of broad, and, finally, because they ultimately fail in their purpose and make the last condition worse than the first.

Fresno is doing the right thing at last, and it is a pleasure to note that Mr. Horschburgh of the Southern Pacific company, in aiding the work with the invaluable help of the publicity department of that corporation, and much to the credit of that corporation, Americans use only one pound of raisins per year per capita while Englishmen use six. How is it with us when we do not know a good thing when we eat it? The 30th of April is to be raisin day. Let each household help it along by having a plum pudding at least.

THE ANDERSON DECISION EXPLAINED.

A week ago reliance had to be placed upon Associated Press dispatches regarding the non-suiting of the government in its case against the Standard Oil of Indiana. Chicago papers give the decision in fuller detail.

Judge Anderson held that no one can be prosecuted for receiving rebates from anything except a legal rate. To be legal a rate must be made by an authority having legal power to make it. Copies of the rate sheet must be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and three copies kept posted in every freight office of the rate-making railroad. The only authority for making a rate sheet is the railroad that paid the rebates. That is, one of the parties to a crime against the public has the power to relieve the other offender from punishment by failing to do some one thing required to be done in order to constitute a legal rate, and then it may itself secure immunity from punishment by volunteering to furnish testimony.

Again, the trained judges of the court of appeals (who trained them?) held that, whether or not this particular rate was legal, was a matter about which they themselves differed. Therefore it would be impossible for a jury to believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, in the legality of such rate. If they did so agree their verdict would be set aside. That is, where judges may differ jurors cannot be permitted to agree.

It is a principle of law that what is alleged in the indictment must be proved by the evidence and not something else. The indictment alleged that the rate over the Chicago and Alton from Chappell, Illinois, to St. Louis, was nineteen and one-half cents per 100 pounds. The proof was that the rate over the Chicago & Alton was eighteen cents to East St. Louis and that the bridge company a separate corporation, received one and one-half cents more for hauling across the bridge to St. Louis, making the nineteen and one-half cents. This, according to Judge Anderson, constituted a fatal variance between the allegation and the proof, although the Chicago & Alton did in fact charge the whole nineteen and one-half cents, itself settling with the bridge company. This variance was fatal to justice, not to common sense.

Another reason why the rate was illegal was that the sheet filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the oil rate on it, but did have a cross reference to another sheet that did have the oil rate. The other sheet was not made out by the railroad, but by a railroad and warehouse commission created by the State of Illinois and over which the United States Government had no jurisdiction. Using the cross reference instead of the rate was fatal, although that cross reference was part of the rate sheet and made the only rate there was.

Now the facts are that the only rate that any other shipper of oil could get to St. Louis was nineteen and one-half cents per 100 pounds. This was more than the traffic would bear, so there was no other shipper. But the Standard Oil company shipped thousands of cars at six or six and one half cents per 100 pounds, contrary to the only rate there was, and it cannot be punished for it because of the hairsplitting distinctions drawn by Judge Anderson and the court of appeals before him. Those decisions may be law as the courts have made the law, but they are neither just to society nor founded in common sense.

The soul of justice has departed from this whole proceeding. The spirit of Judge Anderson's decision is destructive, not preservative, of social order, and society cannot permanently survive such successive miscarriages of justice. The decision of Judge Landis was notice to the great law-defying corporations that they must obey the law or suffer confiscation of their property. It was notice that needed to be given. The decision of Judge Anderson is notification to such corporations that they need obey no law not to their liking, that in the final pinch judges may be relied upon to find some technicality, some twist that may be given to the process of reasoning, some helms committed by some party to the crime, that will preserve them harmless no matter how flagrant their offenses against social order may have been.

Honor to Whom Honor Is Due.

The most powerful protective measure society can apply as penalty for moral delinquency is social ostracism. If those who transgress the laws and flout the decencies of life are honored, commended, with a cordiality seldom accorded to those who walk uprightly before God and men, society disarms itself and stands helpless before the face of iniquity. Time was when notorious courtesans received the first men of nations in their salons and statesmen openly vied with each other for the favor of their smiles. Men have hoped that that time had passed. Common notoriety does the owner of the Oakland Tribune wrong if it be not true that he makes merchandise of the influence of his paper. To do that is journalistic harlotry, yet the governor of his state, the mayor of his city, two justices from the state supreme bench, a representative of the national government, heads of great corporations, merchants, leading lights at the bar, lately joined to honor this editor as no other Oakland editor ever was honored. What conclusion must we draw from this incident? Either that these first men of official and social life are no better than he, that they shamelessly honored a man whom they in their hearts despise, or they believe that, in the aid and comfort given those who have debauched civic life in San Francisco and have sought to break down the law, he has bravely performed God's service and, therefore, honor to him is due. The issue is referred to those thousands of his fellow citizens who would no sooner admit a case of leprosy than this man's newspaper to their homes.

Honor to Doctor Blue.

Arrangements are making for publicly acknowledging the debt of gratitude San Francisco owes Dr. Rupert N. Blue for the service he has performed in driving the germs of bubonic plague from this city. This is splendid. It is in splendid contrast with the conspiracy of falsehood into which the city, the press, the state and the government entered a few years since, with the result that one who occupied the position now occupied by Doctor Blue was hounded from the state and San Francisco was made to stand convicted of bad faith in the full view of the whole country. From that event to Doctor Blue is from the ridiculous to the sublime, from dishonor to honor, from falsehood to faith, from an insanity of fear to the sobriety of sound judgment. It can never be foreknown when an incoming ship may discharge plague-infected rats into the wharves and streets of San Francisco, but let it never again be forgotten that good faith in the eyes of the nation is an asset of inestimable value.

To the Credit of Kruttschnitt.

When it was announced that the Southern Pacific company would afford full publicity regarding the causes and consequences of accidents upon its lines few expected that good faith would attend the reversal of the former policy of smothering the facts and, if possible, beguiling the coroner into making a report exonerating the company from blame. Indeed, the election of coroner was not beneath the manipulation of the political bureau of that company. But events seem to show that good faith has been maintained with the public in relation to accidents. Not only have the facts been given but, upon the initiative of Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, citizens have been called in to aid the railroad officials in getting at the facts in each case. The late accident at Suisun affords a typical example. Here three disinterested citizens were called into consultation and the findings of fact, in which they joined, left nothing to be desired. Whenever railroad managers resort to a policy of good faith they will find the public, and the reputable press, meeting them fully half way.

Outlawing School Frats.

It was probably a good thing to have the legislature ordain that, on and after the going into effect of the will of the people of California, there shall be no more secret societies connected with the public schools below the grade of college or university, yet the incident what do our young Californians feed that they cannot be spanked without ordering out the militia?

San Francisco's Gas Bills.

The board of supervisors is doing well in making a careful examination into the alleged illicit increase in gas bills in San Francisco. It would be no new thing to have a great corporation convicted (out of court) of two offenses: grand and petty larceny, but when the affairs of such corporation are in the hands of such a man as John A. Britton it is proper to suspend judgment until the evidence is in. While in charge of the gas company in Oakland that city had no quarrel with Mr. Britton or the company he managed, unless it was that the quality of the gas furnished was not at all commensal in the interests of a larger use. Why he should wish to do otherwise in San Francisco does not appear, but suffer the facts to be threshed out and no guilty man to escape. Fortunately Doctor d'Ancona can be relied upon to give all parties a square deal.

Great On Genealogy.

The people of New England feel that they are by now so far removed from the apex end of the family tree as to make it tolerably safe to indulge in genealogical research and, to this end, the Massachusetts legislature is preparing to demand that the records of Revolutionary pensioners, stowed away in the archives at Washington, be thrown open to public inspection. Why not? The narrowness and bigotry, the extravagance in denunciation and inefficiency in service of the majority of that day are so lost in the engulging oblivion of time that a common ancestry may now hark in the indiscriminating effulgence of the glory earned by the steadfast few who clung to Washington in sheer doggedness of purpose until the victory was finally won. Take off the lid.

Hurrah For Texas!

The speaker of the Texas assembly carried on the attache roll of that body, as stenographer, a lady of his acquaintance who lived in Kansas City and performed no service in Texas. For this he was driven from the speaker's chair in disgrace. The fact that the lady was not in Texas may have intensified the feeling of hostility toward the speaker, but he was driven from office for being a larcenist. If California now had in its treasury all the money that, during the last fifty years, has been larcenously paid out to legislative attaches by methods no less outrageous than that of which the speaker of the Texas assembly has been found guilty, the present legislature would find small justification for imposing added burdens upon the taxpaying public. Encouraging progress has been made when a legislature has learned that it is wrong to steal.

We did not get the thousand letters that we invited last week. We got some. We want more. Please let us have your opinion of The California Weekly.

The Deeper Significance
: : : : of Living : : : :

From childhood we have had dinned into our ears the fact of the existence of sin, but how many have a clear idea of what sin is? Many know what chills and fever are, but what is malaria? It took science long to answer that question, to turn the microscope upon the blood in the veins and direct its attention to an object smaller than the finest point of the finest needle, and say to the inquirer: "That is malaria."

The achievements of science have been wonderful beyond the power of the imagination to conceive, but science has not found out what sin is in its essence. It has found the germ of malaria, typhoid, yellow fever, tuberculosis, and may find the origin of cancer, but it has not found the beginning of sin, because sin is a disease of the soul and science has not been able to find the soul. If science be asked it will answer, "I have sought all through the body from crown of the head to sole of the feet. I have resolved the human body into little else than sugar and water. I know every organ, and almost every function of every organ, but the human soul I have not found. Where it abides I know not, and until I find the soul I cannot tell what ails the soul when it is sick." Science is right; It cannot tell. We may well sit uncovered in the present of science, for we have a strong claim upon it. The soul has taken its flight before science can have access to the human body. How, then, can it hope to find the soul?

There runs a bit of folk lore to the effect that sin came into the world in a garden, in the form of a serpent and beguiled our parents into disobedience, but few any longer accept that story as literally true, but only figuratively true, just a nice way of making a great truth so plain as to be intelligible to the duller intelligence. The burden of that story was that sin is disobedience, disobedience to the laws of God, the obligations of brotherhood, the obligations of the still, small voice. That is, perhaps, as good a definition of sin as we shall ever get, and yet it seems to fall short of being a good working hypothesis, a convenient rule for instant application in emergencies, a rule that may be carried in the vest pocket for instant reference.

There is a definition that we can all of us understand on the instant, that leaves little room for doubt or discussion. It is that sinfulness is selfishness. If this definition be not scientifically exact, if it be not theologically comprehensive and exclusive, it is at least very ready for application to any concrete case.

Now there is a difference between selfishness and self-helpfulness. Science tells us that species survive through struggle for existence, a savage devouring struggle of each member of the species to help itself, but later on it qualified this statement by the further truth that no species would have been able to survive had it not been for a struggle of the individual for the good of his kind, of the mother for her offspring, of the father for his family, of the neighbor for his friend, of the citizen for his country.

It is self-helpfulness that makes the world rich. It is selfishness that makes the world poor, the conditions of life hard and the utility of a life questionable. Whatever makes life hard and of questionable utility to offspring, family, neighbor, country, is sin.

There is no need, in order that one may be unselfish, that he shall not be self-helpful. The city of London may be swept in thirty minutes by each person sweeping in front of his own door, and just as quickly that way as if each one were to sweep unselfishly in front of his neighbor's door instead of his own. Each one should, at the very least, pull his own weight in the common struggle to get on, and more if he can, so that he may lend a hand to some one who cannot do it. We know that sin is selfishness we shall know it when we see it and so be able to avoid it.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Wireless From City to City.

The next development of the wireless telegraph seems likely to be the establishment of municipal stations in the city hall towers of all principal cities to the end that, no matter what storms may sweep the country, or how the poles of the telegraph companies may fare with winds and sleet and snow, it will be possible to communicate with the outside world so long as the city hall tower remains standing. Philadelphia is taking the lead and inasmuch as the expense is relatively slight, it is likely that all the city halls of the country will be hallooing at each other in the near future.

Passing of the Shakers.

That strange sect of queer people, the Shakers, appears to be passing out of existence. What colonies there are are only remnants and the principal one of them all, at Lebanon, Ohio, which was located in 1805, is now in the act of turning its land holdings over to a Methodist home for old people in exchange for the care of the survivors while they live. Of twenty-three survivors only five are under seventy years of age and many are much older. The settlement once had a population of 800 and planted colonies elsewhere, but it has survived all of its colonies as well as its own prosperity. The members were getting to be too feeble to care for themselves and as no new accessions came to their ranks they have been forced to surrender.

Reciprocal Coal Relations.

One of the smartest fights of the special tariff session of Congress is going to be over the duty on coal. From Pittsburgh west all coal operators wish coal to come in free on condition that Canada will let coal in free. From Pittsburgh east the operators want a tariff to prevent Nova Scotia coal competing along the seaboard with anthracite. With free coal on both sides of the line central and western Canada will buy bituminous coal from Uncle Sam's country, and New England will buy largely from Nova Scotia. The trade as a whole will break evenly, and only "By Grace of God" Baer and his associates will be hard hit. It remains to be seen whether those worthies can frustrate the new movement, for the people and the operators are up in arms for it both sides of the line.

Not Sweetened to Taste.

The love which the twin cities of Minneapolis have long cherished for each other is proverbial. The Armour Packing company conceived the idea that the establishment of a packing house between the two cities might purify the atmosphere, but St. Paul, at least, is contrary minded and is calling upon the legislature, the courts, the state board of health and imploring heaven to forefend while Minneapolis looks on hardly knowing whether to take a hand or not. The prevailing winds are toward St. Paul, but sometimes blow up stream. Minneapolis' action in the premises depends on weather probabilities. If Minneapolis could be certain that the wind would blow from the packing house town toward St. Paul, what nuts!

Progress In Corea.

Notwithstanding bitter winter weather the emperor of Corea, accompanied by Marquis Ito, representing the government of Japan, has been making a tour of the country addressing the principal dignitaries at each considerable village, counseling them all to stand by Japan and to cease wrangling over old differences and to fall to work to make Corea a progressive and prosperous nation. His majesty pointed out that Japan had been forced into two great wars because of Corea's being too weak to defend her own rights and that it is not in human nature to expect Japan to undergo a third experience of that kind from the same cause. He feels confident that Japan desires the prosperity of Corea. It seems Japan was not fortunate in a former effort to govern Corea, but appears now to be in better shape to achieve success.

The Ousting of Ahearn.

President Ahearn, of the Borough of Manhattan, New York, was found to be unfit for his office and Governor Hughes removed him. The Tammany Board of Aldermen immediately reappointed him. Legal steps were taken to set aside this appointment. The courts have wrestled with the case for more than a year but have finally decided that it could not have been the intent of the law so to nullify a power expressly given to the governor, and that the only way to reinstate Ahearn over the dismissal by the governor will be to reject him by the votes of the issue. The public interest in the issue consists in noting that the department of justice permitted a mere trick of Tammany to keep an unfit man in office until his term had well-nigh expired and some idea of the extent of the protection furnished the home of the Englishman may be formed from the character of the North Sea fleet. This fleet will carry 124 twelve-inch, 109 nine-inch, and 150 seven- and six-inch guns. In the active fleet will be twenty-two first-class battleships and cruisers and, in reserve, eighteen additional battleships and cruisers three-fifths manned. This great force will patrol the east coast of Britain from Dover to Cromarty Firth. There will be still another fleet patrolling between the Irish coast and Gibraltar where it touches with the Mediterranean fleet. Besides there are British ships of war in all other seas of the world. To say that John Bull is armed to the teeth does not half tell it, yet four more Dreadnaughts are being provided for this year. Where will it all end?

Defending the Englishman's Home.

If John Bull is afraid of burglars at least he is not covering in fear and is preparing to give them a warm reception. He has just added $15,000,000 to last year's naval budget, and some idea of the extent of the protection furnished the home of the Englishman may be formed from the character of the North Sea fleet. This fleet will carry 124 twelve-inch, 109 nine-inch, and 150 seven- and six-inch guns. In the active fleet will be twenty-two first-class battleships and cruisers and, in reserve, eighteen additional battleships and cruisers three-fifths manned. This great force will patrol the east coast of Britain from Dover to Cromarty Firth. There will be still another fleet patrolling between the Irish coast and Gibraltar where it touches with the Mediterranean fleet. Besides there are British ships of war in all other seas of the world. To say that John Bull is armed to the teeth does not half tell it, yet four more Dreadnaughts are being provided for this year. Where will it all end?

The Lay Brotherhood.

The evangelical churches of America are organizing a stupendous lay movement for the advancement of the cause of Christianity. It aims at the enlistment of a million laymen in active co-operation with the clergy in spreading the gospel and strengthening missionary movements at home and abroad. The idea is that there shall be one head to this army of workers, that it shall be non-sectarian at the head, but working out to forefend while the denominations, with the work divided into district branches, with the work divided into district branches, with the work divided into district branches. The hope is that there will not be so much struggling between the churches as by all the churches to reach the unchurched. If carried out as planned the idea should produce great results.

Still Bigger Ships.

The Hamburg-American steamship company will pay its stockholders no dividend this year. Two years ago this company paid 10 per cent, one year ago 6 per cent, this year nothing. Two principal causes are assigned for the inability of this company to make profits: the almost entire cessation of immigrant travel toward the United States last year, and the building of the Lusitania and Mauretania by the Cunard company. Until these vessels were built by the British company the German line had the largest and swiftest transatlantic palaces afloat, but now that the Germans have been beaten in time and in size of their ships the cream of the trade has gone from them. There is nothing for it, then, except to build bigger ships with more powerful engines. Great, but unavailing, efforts were made to so organize, or Morganize, the transatlantic carrying trade as to eliminate competition and impose all that the traffic will bear. National pride is a sentiment that even the trust spirit has not been able to overcome.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

A MENDER OF BROKEN HEARTS

By JEROME LYNCH.

Just as Superior Judge Lindsey of Colorado has achieved international fame in confronting the vexed question of "What to do with our bad boys and girls," by his unerring aim at the hearts and sympathies of erring childhood, so Superior Judge Thomas F. Graham bids fair to attain equally signal success by his solution of the enigma, "What to do with our unhappy husbands and wives." Judge Graham, a kindly jurist of San Francisco, has passed beyond the experimental stage of his judicial labors in this respect, for scores of reconciled men and women, re-united in happy homes, stand to-day as efficacious monuments to his success of several years' labor.

In referring to Judge Graham as the "San Francisco jurist whose methods in the divorce courts are picturesque," an eastern magazine says:

"Results of his eminent success have suggested similar methods to other courts throughout the United States, and have justified newspaper agitation for a 'court of broken hearts,' or in less romantic language, the segregation of the divorces into one department under Judge Graham.

The methods of this judge have been as prolific in success along their particular line as have the humane efforts of Judge Lindsey in dealing with incorrigible boys and girls in the juvenile court of Colorado. Both jurists are exemplars of a high type of common good, and in the labors of both men ultra-humanitarian benefits have accrued."

The methods of Judge Graham in effacing the divorce evil are simple but highly effective. It is by his very simplicity of method in reaching the human spot, in each instance by direct and incisive sympathy, that broken hearts have been healed, broken homes restored, and broken lives re-united. By the deft touch of sympathy, and the right word said at the right moment, he has opened up vistas of hope and dispelled hatreds, where an ordinary apathetic obedience to his oath of office and the bare performance of his judicial duty might have split in twain men and women struggling in hateful bonds, sending them forth embittered with the world, with shattered idols of love as their only souvenirs of happier days.

Judge Graham, who was young himself not so very long ago, is very young in spirit still. He keeps a cozy corner in his heart for the boy and girl reveling in a wild melody of love, and, remembering, he strives to restore the old time harmony where years have outlived the echoes. One word that arises to his mind as each man or woman comes to him for a divorce is "reconciliation." No matter how hopeless the case may appear, that word comes forward as a possible solution of the trouble.

Reconcilable cases arise principally from jealousy, thoughtlessness, brooding over instead of reforming wrongs, and that inscribable irritation which creeps into most wedded lives after the novelty of wedlock has worn off. More difficult cases are those of wanton cruelty, marked inadaptation of temperaments, disparity of ages, hatred of offspring, chronic misconduct of either party, infidelity to the vows of chastity and marked opposition of racial or religious views. Few cases are absolutely hopeless, he believes, but there are some, among them being irreducible jealousy, apparitions of flagrant misdeeds prior to marriage which justify to mock the innocent spouse after the knot is tied, permanent insanity, felonies, and other causes tending to destroy the future of happiness and render marital life impossible.

Like all students of married conditions, Judge Graham believes the principal blight of wedded peace is the hasty, thoughtless marriage, and no couple can come to him to be joined in wedlock until he is satisfied that theirs is a deeper affection than a transient infatuation springing from a brief acquaintance.

Judge Graham, by the way, is averse to performing marriages at all. Of course, he will marry a couple if they insist, but he invariably seeks to ascertain first if no possibility of a church benediction is possible. He believes every marriage should be endowed with the blessing of the church, whether the faith be Christian, Jew, or Mohammedan. He generally advises the pair to go to the priest, minister or rabbi of their faith, having an idea that the benediction of their creed tends to stamp the union with deeper reflection and permanency of motive in retaining the bonds until death ends the ties.

An occasional visit to Department No. 10 of the Superior Court of San Francisco is a revelation. There the visitor may find every phase of human emotions portrayed, from pathos to humor; and misery to happiness.

"Judge, that old woman is all right when she's in a good humor, but she's never that way no more."

A withered little old man shook his head ruefully as he told his troubles to the court, while his helpmate, a waspish looking woman, eyed him askance with palpable disfavor. As he began to unfold his woes into the attentive ear of the bench, and the judge with abstracted eyes was figuring out how he might effect a reconciliation, the woman broke in with:

Judge Thomas F. Graham.

"Yer honor, that old man is the torment of me life. It's every morning, noon and night that he plagues me with nagging and telling me that he's sorry that he's married. But I like him, all the same and—"

A smile of ineffable satisfaction irradiated the face of the bench and a few moments later the two bent old forms went out of the court, arm in arm, back to life that was to be theirs, happy in their newly awakened love; she volubly blessing the court, and he mumbling that he "didn't quite understand before."

How was it done? Nobody there seemed to know, but it happened somehow, and it did not take more than a few moments of earnest talk by Judge Graham to do it.

A stout woman, with arms akimbo, eyed her husband with compressed lips as he explained to the court that his wife, who was a dozen years older than himself, had left him, and taken their joint savings and his step-children. No, he had no explanation of the cause, but she simply went. The woman told her side of the story. She said her husband had twitted her about her age, and boasted that he might have married a much younger and prettier woman than herself. The husband admitted this, but said he had only done it in a moment of anger and never meant it.

Again a reconciliation was effected, just how no one exactly knew, but it happened and the couple left court without the divorce decree, but on a better understanding with each other.

A young wife told a tale of neglect. Her husband, she said, was a man of some wealth and provided for her comfort, but he went off on long duck-hunting expeditions, leaving her lonely home. Quarrels were frequent and the split between them reached the divorce stage. Then the judge again conquered. He pointed out, with judicial compliments, that the young wife was a fine, healthy, sturdy girl well able to share the rigors of her husband's hunting trips. He told her of the society women who enjoyed the exhilarating pursuit and then turned to the husband. One of the finest forms of enjoyments, said the judge to the wondering husband, was for a man to take his wife along with him on hunting trips. It was a novelty of which few knew until they tried, and happy indeed was he whose wife was strong enough and willing enough to accompany him on a rollicking trip with the shotgun. That this maneuver proved successful was shown conclusively enough a short time after when the lady was arrested by the game warden for shooting birds out of season; but that is an incident. The pair found a common hobby and are now hunting chums as well as happy man and wife.

Pretty, feather-brained little Mrs. Blank, with nodding plumes of palest blue in a monstrous merry widow hat, and gowned in riotous colors, appeared in court to contest her husband's suit for divorce. The man said his bride of less than a year thought of nothing but "gadding about," visiting friends, and winking at acquaintances on the street. When he returned home, she complained, there was nothing to eat except cold scraps in the pantry. It appeared that the stork also hovered over the unhappy domicile, which added to his distress. Here the stork formed the healing balm. There was again an earnest talk, the shedding of some pent-up tears, an earnest vow to stay at home and cook George's meals, and settle down to the happiness which the years to come held out for them both. Mrs. Blank kissed Mr. Blank in court and she went out with a smile of happiness through her tears as she thanked the bench for explaining things in a proper light.

Then there was a story of two old people who had married late in life. With the infirmities of age they shared many oddities and differed in many opinions. One bone of contention was the old yard. The old man claimed that he raised more fowls than his wife, while the old lady indignantly repudiated this fine point. Their differences reached a point of intoleration and both hid to the divorce court. This was somewhat of a poser for Judge Graham, but he was equal to the occasion. Why not, he suggested blandly, fix a dividing fence between her chickens and his, and thus raise individual hen interests? Why not, indeed, echoed the old people as the light dawned upon them. They left court, forgetting about the divorce, and both are now raising flourishing chicken flocks to their mutual adoration.

Of course all cases do not end so happily. It was only last week that a foolish old woman, with grandchildren, was sued by her husband, a most estimable old man, on grounds of desertion. The woman had left her home and children for an affinity as old as herself, and the two lived a short distance from the broken home, outraging the proprieties, a reproach to husband, daughters and little grand children. One of the daughters, who had daughters of her own, had tearfully pleaded with the erring old woman, but in vain. In that instance Judge Graham exhausted every expedient and granted the decree. Parallel cases occur from time to time, but he is reluctantly obliged to acknowledge defeat, but his conquests far outstrip the failures.

THE PASSING OF THE TEDDIE BEAR

By TOM GREGORY.

The other day, while great political changes were taking place in this land, the small folks of the world did not quite know how significant those changes were to them. The Teddie Bear, that tiny animal King of Toyland, was passing. Like his canine cousin, the dog, Teddie had his day and when his hour was striking he struck out for the timber. For a season he had ranged growlingly up and down the nursery, scaring the dollies with his white teeth till their waxy cheeks were pale with terror and they did not dare to lie down and shut their blue eyes for fear the fierce little beast would eat them up before they got awake. But he is gone—they do not know where, and they all feel safer. The Little Boy Blue and the other toy creatures are returning from exile in the closet, believing that the good old time when they were made much of is coming back again. The Angora Kitten hated the Teddie Bear with all the ferocity of her feline nature because that Ursa Minor was her rival in the heart of the little girl mistress of the place. Kitten also despised the Teddie because he was only a dead and stuffed imitation of an integral part of the animal kingdom. Now she is making the nursery vocal with her solo purrs. And the Plaster Pug, who was never played with, not even kicked nor thrown around, because he was so breakable, and had no use in that house except to sit in some corner and try to be a cheap ornament, is blinking his big goggle eyes and is glad. If the Bunny had any mind or individuality and was anything but a stupid make-believe rabbit, he too, would be happy over the change.

So it's joy for the things of toytown and back to the wilds for the Teddie Bear. After his little flyer in civilization he returns to savagery. After his day of playfellow to infantile humanity he takes up the work of nosing out an existence in the night of the inhospitable jungle. While lost in the forest depths will the Teddie Bear oftentimes think of his past when he played the idol of his erstwhile small owner, and will his glass eyes grow misty with tears when he remembers how he was petted and scolded and cuddled and mauled and loved and quarreled over and cried over and given and taken and back again and ridiculously dressed in Dollie's clothes and left forgotten out of doors overnight with the evicted cat who viciously scratched him because he was neither a doll nor a cat nor anything and because he had supplanted her in the household and was as useless for mouse-catching as the Plaster Pug?

Crawling into his cold bed of leaves under the stars will he be reminded of the comfortable naps with his baby mistress, folded closely in her warm arms as she slumbered in her snowy cot? Will he pass again into the dreams he dreamed with her, the dreams in which they wandered afar in that mystic land that lies beyond the borders of sleep? Will he recall when they buried the dead Canary out in the flower bed and they two were the chief mourners and he sat doubled up at the graveside and, tho' he did not in the least understand it all, silently cried because she did and, like her, was sad all day because of the bird-singer left mute under the white daisies?

And will he wonder if he is missed? If Little Boy Blue and his squad of toy soldiers again on guard are watching against his possible return? If the dollies whom he frightened with his white teeth are, after all, sorry he went away? If the Angora Kitten again would scratch the yellow fur off his face if he caught him in the nursery? And if the Bunny would have intelligence enough to recognize him?

Why he was driven out, in this exile, he can never know, because the reason is outside the mentality of the Teddie Bear. Even human creatures often fall far short of knowing, and imitation usro minors, even with major titles, are almost as limited in the thinking faculty as folks of the genus homo. Those superior creatures will feebly attempt the solution of the Why and then go to pieces at the first interrogation point. Possibly the Teddie Bear won't try to think, but will join some where in the dim land of the Has Beens that innumerable caravan moving to its place beyond the verge of memory, and so forget it all as he will be forgotten here.

Yet I do not believe the Teddie Bear will pass so soon and so surely out of recollection. In his cute, cubby way he trotted into a place no other toy person ever filled as he filled it. Even Dollie, with generations and more generations of precedence—Dollie, who came down with infant humanity from the household of Eve, found the newcomer first in the nursery, first in the playground and first in the heart of their baby-mistress. He was not comely. Dollie could put it all over him there, and his grotesqueness was in marked contrast to her dainty prettiness. Maybe her manifest aversion to him was the cause of his rough, bearish conduct in her presence. Anyhow, her ladylike manner never seemed to polish him, and he was always a bear—a Teddie Bear—in doll society. The pair were the old fairy "Beauty and the Beast," wedded again for the entertainment of childhood. Though he were dead, yet will the dear little Teddie Bear live till the nurslings who loved him and cherished him are hence.

The Teddie Bear is dead! Long live the Teddie Bear!

MORE NAPOLEON STORIES.

Napoleon once said to Roederer: "My policy is to govern men according to the wish of the majority. That, it seems to me, is the right way of recognizing the sovereignty of the people. It was by making myself a Catholic that I ended the War in La Vendee, by making myself a Mussulman that I got a foothold in Egypt, by becoming an 'ultramontane' that I won over men in Italy. If I governed a nation of Jews I should restore the Temple of Solomon. I shall continue slavery in Ile de France, even in the slaveholding part of Santo Domingo. But I shall soften and limit slavery wherever I maintain it; likewise I shall keep order and discipline wherever I allow liberty."

"You are like politicians in general," declared Roederer to Roederer, in discussing religious matters. "You think that no attention need be paid to the priests as long as they are quiet, and that they should be stopped when they grow turbulent. You might as well say: 'There are men with lighted torches surrounding your house, leave them there. But if they set the house on fire, stop them.'"

Later on he said:

"I love power, but I love it as an artist. I love it as a musician loves his violin."

"When he plays it well," suggested Roederer. "I love it," continued Napoleon, "to get from it such sounds, chords, harmonies. The King of Holland talks to me of private life. Of all three brothers, the one most fitted to live quietly at Montfontaine is myself. In me there are two different men; the man of head and the man of heart. At home I am the man of heart; I play with children, I chat with my wife, I read aloud from novels."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Address to a Venerable Duck.

The remains of a prehistoric duck, estimated to be 3,000,000 years old, have been found in Wyoming.

Oh, ancient duck—Forgive, if thou'rt a Miss,
The adjective I thus apply to thee,
And let me remedy my fault like this:
Oh, duck of age uncertain, fancy-free,
'Tis long indeed since thou didst squawk and quack

Above some dank and prehistoric glade,
Ere Adam turned on Eden's gate his back
And Eve her simple, fig-leaf costume made.

Yes, it has been a weary time, I say—

Enough, perhaps, to try the Calhoun case—
Since eggs primeval thou didst fondly lay,
Through which proud ducks track their lineage
may trace;

Yet not so long, for aeons e'er afford
Some mysteries to miracles akin,

And I do vow, at my landlady's board,

But yesterday, I did attack thy twin.

L'Envoi.

Oh, fowl, time-toughened, of the long ago,

In pity hear and heed my doleful plea;

Since marketmen will welcome thee, I row,

Let not my landlady set eyes on thee!

The Next "Sweating" Process.

"I notice," said the man who sat next me on the boat, "that the San Francisco police have 'sweated' a hotel waiter to make him confess that he stole a pearl necklace, and have found several valuable clues, valuable because they hadn't found any other kind. 'Twas a noble proceeding, and the fact that it was taken in defiance of law makes it the more heroic. When inquiry is rampant, crime stalks abroad, and law is violated, violate some more, and all may yet be well.

"I understand that our efficient and patriotic force are going to sweat Patrick Calhoun next. Like everybody else, they recognize that bribery has been committed; committed in behalf of the United Railroads, and they wish to ascertain what the head of that organization knows about it.

"So they will place him in solitary confinement, and about stem times a day will visit him and put the soul of him on the rack, as they do with others, and at last, pale, tortured and trembling, he will confess all. The proceeding will warp the law some, but think of the good it will accomplish!"

"I don't believe it," said I.

"Why not?" the man inquired.

"Did you ever hear of a man with a million being 'sweated'?" I inquired.

The man appeared to be indignant.

"Say," said I, "do you mean to insinuate that those heroic defenders of the public are such slinks that they would 'sweat' a man if he was without friends, but would let him alone if he had influence?" Do you mean to suggest that—

"I suggest nothing," said I, "but I sort of feel that I have had a hunch."

Just then our boat pulled in to the pier, and we made our rush with the rest.

A Liberal Allowance.

The works of Ambrose Bierce are to be published in ten volumes.

But are not ten cruets of vinegar on one table at one meal rather overdoing that article of the menu?

Veniremen, Tailors and Men.

It takes nine tailors to make a man. It takes 235 veniremen (witness the Calhoun case) to make a man who is fit for jury service. Evidently, then, it would require veniremen to the number of—

Work it out for yourself, Cephas; work it out for yourself. It merely struck me, in watching the progress of the case, that it must take a considerable number of veniremen to make a tailor.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Fishin' in the big pond o' life, 'tain't how much but what you ketch that counts. One good bass is wuth more'n a hull string of suckers.

The feller that expects nuthin is mighty apt to git it.

You say you don't like no 'ttry, Silas? Neither would my pup care about Miss Crocker's pearl necklace.

I b'lieve my soul's immortal, but, b'lievin' this, I'd feel better satisfied with it sometimes if 'twould take somethin' fer its behavior. I judge that the pain of war 'in somethin' an' then not gettin' it, is more'n offset by the pain of gittin' it an' then not wantin' it.

Don't laff at children that skeer each other by sayin, "Boo!" Prob'ly that's life's way of teachin' them to take their part in a financial panic when they're growed up.

"A diamond in the rough," 'es I understand it, is a feller that kin be most ev'rythin' that's disquietin' an' yit remain the noble hero of the hook.

I s'pose the reason San Francisco wimmen wear seaskin cloaks an' openwork stockin's on the same day is so's to strike a happy av'rage in their suffrin's.

Lots of people are reel sympathetic; only, the stock they have on hand ain't more'n they want for themselves.

A linn on a lout is worth two in the bush. If you don't b'lieve it, wait till you have to pay for one.

A Toast to Saint Patrick.

Here's peace to Saint Patrick, but not for the shinkus.

For to shake on these pavements is rare. Here's bliss to his sow, for they say that it takes

The grane little isle in its care.

But 'twas nuyther for that, and 'twas nuyther for this,

But 'twas lovin' and praisin' his day,

I an' 'twas him that my Mary first gave me a kiss.

And shole all my sineses away.

Oh, Mary, my Mary, I raily don't know if my sineses will iver return,

For still, whin you kiss me, I'm falin' the low.

Of a fire thot foriver will burn.

It is older we're growin', for time iver flies, Forging the thunderbolts of War.

But join wid me, darlint—now lift up your eyes—

In a pledge to Saint Pat and his Day.

"Gods, What a Fall!"

Alfred Austin, the poet laureate of England, has written five verses, entitled "You and We," for Hampton's Magazine. Three of them follow.

I shift my gaze from Old World shores
Unto the younger land afar.

But there, too, furnace flames and roars,
Forging the thunderbolts of War.

Be then star-strangled flag unfurled
With Union Jack, restless twain,

Proclaiming to a trembling world,
"Peace shall be lord on land and main."

In noble aim united thus,
Let all their peaceful lives pursue;

And if You will but stand by Us,
Be sure that We will stand by You!

From Tennyson to this! From "In Memoriam" to Judge! Suffering shades of the nine Muses, on what sorrowful times have you fallen! Still, Poet Laureate Austin means well; his sentiment is fine, but the poetry! Let us endeavor to continue his inspiration in such manner of verse as should appeal to him:

We also, shift our gaze a bit
Unto the Laureate—salaam—

And there, too, poetry is hit
By thunderbolts and batt'ring ram.

Be then star-spangled Fudge proclaimed,
With Union Bosh, poetic beast,

Proclaiming to the Muse, defamed,
"Stay in your coffin! You're deceased."

In ghastly aim united thus,
Their bitter cud let poets chew,
And though the Muses all may cuss,
They will drop dead at hearing You!

Unfortunate Mr. Oppman.

It is to weep with A. W. Oppman, a retired brewer of Cleveland, who, accompanied by his wife, recently visited the Yellowstone national park and was there snowballed by "reckless and unscrupulous society women" of San Francisco. Moreover, these women dressed themselves as Indians and "emitted loud and wierd shrieks," thereby disturbing Mr. Oppman's sweet dreams. It is a pathetic tale, as he tells it.

But why, oh, why will not this representative of Cleveland's beery aristocracy make allowance for Californians? We take up no general gage of battle for our "society women." Indeed, there are some of them for whom we have blushed ere now. But not for snowballing—not by any means! On the contrary, all Californians should be entitled to the free privilege of throwing snowballs if ever they have the opportunity. Once in twenty or thirty years, more or less, a wee flurry of snow falls in San Francisco, and then the city goes mad. Business men whose estimation of their dollars compels them to look solemn, professional men whose duty to the public necessitates their appearing profound, clergymen who have their dignity to maintain, schoolma'ams who dare not part with the look that awes the pupils; in short, everybody expects either to throw snowballs, be hit by them, or both. Mr. Oppman should understand the memories which the sight of snow awakens in a multitude of Californians.

It is fitting to inquire on what malt hath this, our Oppman, fed that he hath grown so tender.

The One Creed.

I know not where I journey,
Nor the country whence I came,
And I'm mixed, I'm free to mention,
On the theologic game,
And I even dare to wonder,
When the parson says it's so,
If what he seems to know the best
Is what he doesn't know.
But to one creed I am holding,
For it seems divinely planned:
If I love my brothers truly,
On that record I can stand.

There was One who supped with sorrow
Spoke this message long ago,
What man builds to hide His wisdom,
Haply I may never know,
But His great commandment urges,
"Mine is truth, and mine alone."
Though the rest be all forgotten,
I will lead you to the throne.
As ye would receive from others,
Even so to others do.
Though mine eyes by mist are blinded,
I will ever hold it true.

Human creed on dogma piling,
Build your structures higher still;
Let each cry, "Here Truth abideth,
And all other truth is nil,"
But the message that was spoken
By the shores of Galilee
Gleameth o'er all mortal wisdom
As the stars above the sea.
So I'm free to take my chances
In the mist He 'round me drew,
If I do unto my brothers
As to me I'd have them do.

My bushel-basket's disappeared—
Now, what do you think of that!—
My bushel-basket's disappeared,
But Mary has a bran-new hat!

THE GRAFT CASES.

As the horse on the treadmill travels laborious and wearisome miles, at end of them all to be precisely where he began, so the prosecution of Patrick Calhoun has toiled through another week, and has gained—nothing appreciable. To be sure, three or four men have been passed temporarily into the jury box, but there is no certainty that they will remain there. Indeed, the chances are that the most, if not all, of them will not.

But while little has been gained, one development in the case is worthy of note. Pierre E. Duchenein, a prospective juror under examination, had sworn that he held no fixed views concerning the case. Then the prosecution showed by the testimony of a detective formerly in the employ of the United Railroads, as well as by that of another man, that Duchenein did possess a positive opinion, that he had expressed it, that it was favorable to Calhoun, and that a written report to that effect was in the United Railroads' keeping. Nevertheless, the attorneys for the defense had evinced a strong desire to have Duchenein on the jury. Thus do straws show which way runs the defense's "fair trial" current.

It is as impossible to-day as it was two months ago to say when the case will be ready to go to the jury.

Last Friday Judge Dunne granted former Supervisor Michael W. Coffey, convicted of bribery, a continuance of twenty days in which to prepare his appeal.

The retrial of Adolph S. Newburgh, who is charged with an attempt to bribe a juror to vote for the acquittal of Abe Ruef, has been set for next Monday. Superior Judge Conley of Madera county will preside. District Attorney Langdon, assisted by James M. Hanley, will prosecute the case.

PRAYER.

By Alfred Tennyson.

Pray for my soul. More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice

Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?

For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

Several times lately the writer has seen groups of citizens greatly annoyed by the unseemly conduct of drunken men when, if the offender had not been drunken, his trespasses would have been reasonably and possibly, chastisement inflicted. If drunkenness is not to be taken as an excuse for crime, why should it be for misbehavior? Insane persons can be taught to behave and it should be possible to so wallow the social amenities into the inner consciousness of gamblers as to make them gentled whether drunk or sober. The writer would like to see it tried. He objects to having one standard of gentility for inebriates and another for men in their sober minds.

Here is a new argument against the custom of giving tips. It is that the tippers, in hotels and restaurants, to the number of 75 per cent., play the races with the proceeds, and they play them purely as a game of chance without the smallest acquaintance with the horses or the jockeys in charge of them. These are the minnows which the big fish swallow.

There is another reason why the charity of tipping is doubtful. It is that, in effect, the tip often goes to the proprietor rather than to the waiter or porter. In other words, these servants receive from the house, on an average, as much less than a living wage as the average sum in tips. From the Pullman car company down to a lunch counter the proprietary interest is not averse to receiving tips by proxy.

There is, however, one justification for the tip system that is at least worthy of consideration, despite the statement that tips either reach the coffers of the book-makers at the race tracks or the tills of the owners at the desk. It is that courtesy is impossible between equals, that it has its inspiration either in condescension or kow-tow, that unless there be a giving class distinctly inferior, and a tipping class as distinctly superior, gentility will depart from us and we shall all be barbarians together. How thin must be the veneer of our civilization if this be true!

But to return to horse racing: The issue is not, as the uninitiated might suppose, merely a try-out to see if one horse can go faster than another. It is not as simple as that. The horses are first classified into fast, very fast, slow-fast, fast-slow, slow and very slow, or other gradations that answer to this non-technical classification. The writer does not know the horse language. Horses of each group are then speeded against other horses in the same group, never outside of it—unless some owner is slyer than the managers of the track. If too much difference develops between horses in any one of these classes the swifter horse is weighed down with more pounds to carry. Then the devotees of the track proceed to their alleged judgments on horses picked from each group, with handicaps, track conditions, condition of the horses, the variants of accident, the knavishness of the jockeys and the duplicities of book-makers and owners all entering into the equation. It is all scientifically artificial and preposterous, and not at all like the racing in the good old days when the 'fastest hoss got there fastest.'

And it is over this sort of an artificial, not to say artful, bit of humbuggery that men and women go insane, that they commit all the offenses in the criminal calendar, vacillate between diamonds and bone buttons and, when all is done, hie themselves to the sand dunes and blow hot their addled brains. Look steadily into the eye of the race-track habitue, until you perceive what shines through, and, if you don't see the inconstant scintillations of dawning madness it will be because you have not first cast that same devil out of your own tell-tale orbs.

The writer does not happen to know anything about the statements set forth in the above paragraphs. He merely overheard them explained.

By THE WATCHMAN.

Uncle Joseph Given a Jolt The victory won by the Republican insurgents and Democrats in the organization of the House of Representatives Monday was neither glorious nor decisive, but it tended toward a more representative form of government of that body and will encourage further efforts toward making the speaker the servant of the house rather than its imperious master. The house must do business, and it can neither allow public business nor public mores to be talked to death by exhaustless gasbags, but if we are to have a one-man government let us choose an emperor, not a boss.

The Real Purpose They Had In View It was from the first evident that, apart from the alien land bill fathered by Assemblyman Drew, the anti-Japanese legislation that pestered the legislature was not aimed at the Japanese. There was some question as to whether its primary purpose was so to obscure the political horizon as to permit mischief to be done unseen under the dust, to embarrass the closing weeks of the Roosevelt administration or to raise a disturbing influence here in San Francisco. It was morally certain that the purpose pretended by Grove L. Johnson could not be the real purpose, but what was it? An inside tip gives reason for suspecting that, while the other objects suggested were not out of mind, the main one was to so force the Lincoln-Roosevelt members of the legislature into a support of national Roosevelt policies as to "quer" the Lincoln-Roosevelt League men with the labor element in San Francisco. This explanation leaves little to be desired.

Unhappy Harper Of Los Angeles Los Angeles is capable of a genuine moral enthusiasm. It knows right from wrong and, upon occasion, is able to rise in righteous wrath and make its power felt. It made it so warm for one of Mr. Herrin's mayors that he simply skedaddled. Mr. Herrin's handy man Parker came to the rescue and undertook to put in former Mayor Harper's place one who would be more decent but not less servicable. The moral wrath of Los Angeles rose at that and the vacant place was filled by a gentleman to whom no one can object. It is expected that the recall election will go on to a finish fight at the polls. The recall has been looked upon with many questionings, but without it Los Angeles would have had to sweat and stew under the Harper regime until the end of his term. The recall justified its existence by this one ouster even if no further use be found for it for a decade. What is now needed is to find some means as effectual for getting rid of the city boss as one of the functionaries he puts up to represent him.

State Pensions Unconstitutional We are not, as at one time feared, to have the beginnings of a state pension system, through provision for retirement pay to employees in state hospitals after twenty-one years of service. The bill passed the Assembly, but after it got over into the Senate it did not take the lawyers long to discover that the state constitution forbids the making of gifts from the public treasury and that a pension would be a gift.

Records of Convicts To Be Made Promptly A bill passed by both branches of the legislature, and which will no doubt be approved by the governor, provides that when a person has been convicted of a state prison offense the trial judge and the district attorney shall join in a statement of their views respecting the convicted person and such statement shall be forwarded to the prison directors. In order to be able to make up such statement the court must take pains to elicit such evidence as can be had showing the criminal's personal records, and the prisoner. One of the objects, and no doubt the principal one, of this act is to have on record at the prisons the facts with regard to convicts so that they may be used in connection with applications for parole, pardon and commutation. Hitherto it has been impossible, in cases where judges and district attorneys have forgotten, or have died, to determine the circumstances of the crime committed or the previous record of the convict.

Is It a Growing State Or Growing Extravagance? The increasing cost of state government is made evident through a comparison of the general appropriation bills passed during the Pardee administration and those of Governor Gillett. The bills for 1903, Pardee's first two years, totaled $5,470,996. For his second two years the total was $7,376,052. For the first two years of Gillett's administration the general appropriation bill carried $8,305,164. The bill for the next two years appropriates $9,697,335. The general appropriation bills carry the fixed expenses of state living and determine in a general way whether the state is living extravagantly or economically, though it must be remembered that a growing state has growing needs and a constant tendency to elevate the standard of state expenditure. The legislature has at this session advanced salaries all along the subordinate line as the voters advanced them at the last election for the heads of departments. But who cares for expenses? Mr. Harriman says that things are coming our (his) way.

Growth In Cost If Not In Grace The increase in cost of certain state institutions during the coming two years, as compared with the cost during the two years preceding, is made easy to understand by taking up one another the figures from the general appropriation bill just passed and that of two years ago. The new appropriations are for the period from July 1, 1909, to June 30, 1911:

	Appropriations 1909	1907
For State Hospitals	$2,625,250	$1,991,250
For Home For Feeble-minded	311,000	243,872
For Adult Blind Home	60,400	55,000
For Inst. for Deaf and Blind	1,100,000	1,355,000
For State Prisons	1,012,200	902,510
For Reform Schools	465,250	353,510
For transportation expenses in connection with part of above	180,000	140,000
Total for two years	$4,848,650	$3,924,971

State Institutions Of New Capital While the general appropriation bill, as already explained, carries the state cost of living, the special appropriation bills, apart from some private claims against the state of more or less validity, carry the items of investment of new capital, or what the railroad people would call betterments. All of the institutions of the state have pressing needs in the line of betterments, more buildings, more land and more modern equipments. If money for these purposes be wisely expended it may be wisely voted up to the point where taxation begins to trench upon the earning power of the people. After the first session of the legislature in the Pardee administration, 1903, the governor approved special appropriations in the sum of $2,051,157.18. At the close of the session of 1905 he approved appropriations amounting to $2,592,381.97, and at the special session in 1906, after the great fire in San Francisco, he approved special appropriations amounting to $1,365,055. Governor Gillett, at the close of the session of 1907, approved special appropriations amounting to $3,026,613.08. What the special appropriations will amount to at this session cannot be told until after the session ends, but the legislature has been liberal in passing them.

High-Grading Made Harder An act has been put through the legislature, and may be signed by the governor, is aimed at the high-graders in the gold-mining towns and camps, especially in Grass Valley and Nevada City. It puts purchasers of gold quartz and gold bullion on the same basis as pawnbrokers, in that it requires them to keep a register of all their purchases and to exhibit the same to any officer who demands to see it. Prominent mining men have been working to get this bill through, and they have told some remarkable stories about the extent to which high-grading has gone. They have even said that there is danger that some of the mines will be closed unless this legislation can be enacted. Estimates of the losses of the Grass Valley mine owners from high-grading have been made as high as $400,000 a year. State-ment has been made that a good many of the comfortable homes owned by miners in Grass Valley represent the profits of high-grading.

Important Measures Likely to Become Laws The Anti-Race Track Bill; a Direct Primary Bill; a Railroad Regulation Bill; the Banking Bill; the Standard Fire Insurance Policy Bill, and the Three-cent Tax for University. The foregoing are some of the measures which, from present appearances, the people will be able to set down to the credit of the legislature of 1909 when it adjourns. The anti-race track, banking and standard policy bills have already passed, and the others are all but certain. All are important, and though they may not be in all respects as they should be, they will be pretty good legislation, presumably. It is to be hoped that there will be added to the measures above mentioned the Denman bill to print the names of judicial candidates in columns by themselves on election ballots.

State Board Proposals To Go To The People Among the propositions of a financial character which will be referred to the people by action of the legislature will be: Governor Gillett's $18,000,000 good roads bond measure; Senator Welch's $9,000,000 San Francisco seawall bond bill; the India Basin proposition—purchase of sixty-three blocks of Islais Creek lands; Senator Wright's $1,500,000 bond bill for San Diego harbor.

Taxation Amendment Again To Be Voted On The constitutional amendment to separate state and local revenues has again passed the legislature and will be submitted to the people in its amended form. This measure was not perfect when submitted to the people two years ago, and it will require close scrutiny to determine if it be in better form this time, but the principle is sound and must win out in the end.

UP AND DOWN : : THE STATE : :

While San Francisco has been considering where and how it shall secure water, San Diego has, through the Southern California Mountain Water company, "got down to business" and secured an immense supply of excellent water. The Barrett dam, just completed at a cost of more than a half million dollars, impounds the waters of Cottonwood river and, Pine creek, and with other sources, gives the company a storage supply of over 42,000,000,000 gallons, which, it is calculated, would carry San Diego through seven years of drouth. The people of San Diego have a way of "doing things."

After the robbery of the Roseville post-office, mentioned in this department last week, Sheriff McAulay of Placer county set himself upon the trail of the robbers, ran them to earth, and, as they are not higher-ups, terms in prison probably await them without much delay. This in itself is good news, but if the marauders are, as detectives believe, the gang that has been robbing numerous post-offices in this state, it is even better. There is hope that the postmasters may soon feel justified in discharging their bulldogs.

On the twentieth of December, 1849, the state government of California was formally established and, at San Jose, the state's first capital, Peter H. Burnett was duly installed governor. The Santa Clara County Historical Society proposes to signalize the event by the construction of a statue of Governor Burnett, to be unveiled with appropriate ceremonies on the sixtieth anniversary. It will be such a celebration as should interest all patriotic Californians.

The best advertiser for any state is the country paper. This truism is called to mind by a special edition of the Roseville Tribune. The Tribune is but thirty-five weeks old, and Roseville is not a large place, but this issue would do credit to a long-established paper in any community. There are sixteen large beautifully illustrated pages, and what the paper does not tell about Placer county and Roseville would not seem to be worth telling.

Times are "picking up" over in Mono county. Arrangements are being made to utilize the water power of Rush and Leeveing creeks, each capable of supplying 15,000 horse power. When this is done numerous mines will be opened, those already opened will increase their output, and, as the Bodie Miner says, "dirt will fly and the wheels go around." Mono has seemed a long way off the map, but before long it will be noticeably on it.

Things are "doing" in the eastern, mountainous part of this state. Witness the fact that land has been purchased at Sacramento for a terminal of the Lake Tahoe and Sacramento railroad. This seems to indicate that that railroad soon will be off paper and on hard ground, and "All aboard to Tahoe—direct route!" are words that are likely to lure the traveler in not distant days.

Joseph V. Bell, who has been in the newspaper business in this state since the early days, has sold his Salinas Democrat to a company, and announces that he is about to take a rest. If forty or fifty years, more or less, in the newspaper fold does not entitle a man to a vacation it is hard to imagine anything that would.

California's output of gold in 1908 amounted to $19,581,570, as against $18,853,500 in 1907. Big figures, but the day is past when they counted as California's main stock in trade. Her chief wealth now comes from her soil. With her mineral supply exhausted, this still would be the "Golden State."

Chico now has a Twenty-five Thousand Club intended to boost that thriving city to the stated figure. It may or may not succeed, but the city will be more prosperous for the public spirit which expresses itself in such an organization. Time was when central California had no "booster clubs." It is one of the hopeful signs of the times that they now are fairly abundant.

The Sotomayo Scimitar, published at Healdsburg, is a year old and is good enough to be older. It is big mainly in ideas and convictions, but in this respect few papers are larger. Its published creed is good enough for anybody: "Let us be as good, as true, as honest as we may, and accord to the other as we hope for them ourselves; let the fear no man so long as we are within the law and doing right as we see it—time and opportunity will strike the balance."

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Berkeley, March 12, 1909.

Editors California Weekly:

It has occurred to me that it would be a splendid thing if your paper, being the mouthpiece to a national state and national League of Justice, composed of men and women to form branches in every hamlet, town and city, with a large, dignified way shall have the force of numbers of the respectable element, force greed and rascality to stand back, a League of Justice, I am sure some such plan has occurred to your staff, but the work is so big that you may have hesitated to undertake it.

Yours very truly,

JULIUS R. WEBER.

The breaking down of the machinery for establishing justice, when it has to deal with the millionaire or the mob, is characteristic, not of San Francisco alone, but of the state and the nation. It is as true of the United States courts as of state courts, in witness whereof attention is called to the Grosscup-Anderson decisions in the Standard Oil case, decisions which have brought the power of this great government to a full stop in the face of one of the most colossal violations of law in human history—a giant bound hand and foot by the fine-spun webs of judicial spiders. Two facts stand out clearly: Judges are too often selected through the influence of those predatory interests which flout justice when it stands in their way, with the expectation, seldom unfulfilled, that such judges will remember, at the crucial moment, who it was that made them judges. Second, jurisprudence has become artificial and unresponsive to social needs. It tithes mint and anise and cummin, but neglects the weightier matters of the law, strains at gnats and swallows camels, observes the forms to the sacrifice of substance and must get back to first principles or society can hold together only through force, as in Russia, not through an impartial and speedy administration of justice as humanity had hoped. What the California people do toward remedying this unfortunate condition will be done gladly enough, but such decisions as the appellate courts of California rendered in the Schmitz-Reuf case, and as the Grosscup-Anderson courts have rendered in Standard Oil, are outrageous the greater service. They have so perverted the national sense of justice as to put a revolted public sentiment into action. There is scarcely a free man in America who is not daily pondering these things in his heart.

THE STAFF.

San Francisco, March 17, 1909.

Gentlemen: Permit me to express my unreserved admiration, not only for the quality and interestingness of your magazine, but also for the men who keep it week by week at such a high level, as well of "heart interest" as of "practical matters." But I wonder if The California Weekly could find it feasible to establish a department of dramatic criticism on plays appearing in this city, with the same independence that characterizes your political editorials, with resulting benefit to the drama.

Yours very truly,

EDWARD O. ALLEN.

Many thanks for kindly expression regarding the quality of our paper. As to a department for dramatic criticism it has so far stumbled up. Let us frankly confess that The California Weekly cannot, until it gets more firmly established on its feet, hire any more people to help it spend money. If a book review is to be of value it must tell the reader of it whether or not it will be worth his while to read that book; and dramatic criticism, to be of value to the playgoer, must likewise tell the reader whether or not it is going to be worth his while to pay an exorbitant price to see that play. Therefore the criticism should be prepared by one conversant with the theatrical world, with play writers as well as actors. It should be discriminating and just, not a mere advertisement of a play. There is no one on the staff of The California Weekly competent to conduct such a department and one competent cannot be hired until our income is enlarged. Stuff furnished by, or written in the interest of, the box office is of no more value than patent medicine testimonials. No dramatic department at all is preferable to one that is less than intelligent, discriminating, independent and fair. We shall get to it as soon as we can and, meantime, the best way to help us to it is to help us to get more subscribers and more business.

Our National Tax Bill.

The New York Sun estimates (or guesses) the entire tax-paying burden of the people of the United States—nation, state, city, county, township—to be $1,800,000,000 a year. About one-third of this goes to the national government. The earnings of the country in farming, manufacturing, mining, forests, fisheries, etc., are put at $28,500,000,000, making our taxes a little more than 6½ per cent of our earnings. The total wealth of the nation is placed at $120,000,000,000, so that our taxes are about 1½ per cent of our wealth. It looks as though we should be able to stand that if distributed evenly.

SAN FRANCISCO

NATURE LOVERS' VIEW OF HETCH-HETCHY

By WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE.

SAN FRANCISCO ought to have a good water supply, and by the municipality. No public-spirited citizen will take issue with Mr. Galloway on that point. Much else that he has written in his article is open to controversy in regard to both fact and inference. It ought to be possible to clarify the issue by dispassionate discussion. Nothing is gained by covertly or directly abusing an opponent with whom one does not happen to agree. A very few of my best friends are not in agreement with me on this question, but I do not expect to lose them on that account. There doubtless has been needless and unjust imputation of motives on both sides. The point of view of the Spring Valley company may be regarded as a third side which I shall simply omit from my discussion. Mr. Galloway probably will admit that it is both misleading and unjust to bracket Spring Valley and "nature lovers" in such a way as to imply an alliance between them. The former is opposed to a municipal supply, the latter to the identification of Hetch-Hetchy with the desired supply. The six-to-one vote, I submit, was primarily in favor of the municipal supply. Under the circumstances it is easy enough to claim that the vote on the double issue was a vote in favor of the Hetch-Hetchy project. Col. W. H. Heuer, U. S. A., engineer and chairman of the executive committee, an acknowledged and unbiased authority on the matters under dispute, is quoted in the San Francisco Nichants' Association Review, July, 1908, as follows: "Engineers who made the surveys of Lake Eleanor and Hetch-Hetchy inform me that there are other supplies which can be brought here at much less cost than Hetch-Hetchy. The latter by persistent advocates has been preached, almost forced, into acceptance by the people of San Francisco." (The black letters are mine.)

Who the Nature Lovers Are.

Furthermore, Mr. Galloway's reference to "one Johnson," a "sub-editor" and "the self-appointed leader of the so-called 'nature lovers'" is not fair to his able and well-informed opponent. Mr. Robert Underwood Johnson, Associate Editor of the Century Magazine, is a well-known public man, who takes a modest view of his own efficient share in the effort to save Hetch-Hetchy from needless destruction. It is common knowledge that John Muir, the celebrated naturalist and author of "Our National Parks," is the acknowledged leader of the disinterested opposition. Only those who stand near to him know how unselfishly he has given of his time and his means to expose the spurious necessity plea under which the Hetch-Hetchy project is being urged upon San Francisco's citizens. I have it on Mr. Muir's authority that the first suggestion for the erection of the Yosemite National Park came from Mr. Johnson, during a summer they spent together in the Tuolumne regions. He afterwards, with John Muir's enthusiastic support, pushed the matter to a successful issue in Congress. Let it be borne in mind that this national park was created in 1890 in order that Hetch-Hetchy, the Tuolumne Meadows, and the wonderful canyon which connects them, might be saved from the hand of the spoiler. Yosemite Valley was already included in the state park. My readers, therefore, may judge for themselves whether this depreciatory reference is just to a man whose zeal for the public good led him to work for the establishment of Yosemite National Park, and whose only offense now consists in his well-founded opposition to those who wish to deprive the nation of the benefit of his labor. Why not exploit, now, the fact that neither Mr. Garfield nor Mr. Pinchot has ever seen Hetch-Hetchy?

Other Sources Are Available.

Before taking up some of Mr. Galloway's

DIAGRAM OF YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

"answers," let it be noted that the disinterested opposition has steadily expressed its readiness to approve the diversion of any part of the national park if it can be shown that it is the only place from which San Francisco can derive a satisfactory supply of water. Life is more than its enjoyments. But the very full testimony given during the hearings before the public lands committee of Congress, and the corresponding committee of the Senate, shows conclusively that other sources are available. In the last analysis comparative cheapness is the real reason for desiring Hetch-Hetchy, for it was believed that it could be "got from the federal government for next to nothing." There are thousands of us who believe that such a unique national property, dedicated to the enjoyment of the entire nation, should not be sacrificed for the mere pecuniary benefit of any municipality.

1. The resources of the Spring Valley plant are pertinent in this discussion because their system will doubtless have to form a part of any Sierra system. Mr. Galloway controverts what he calls Spring Valley's claim to be able to develop 109,000,000 gallons a day. It should be added that this is Mr. Grunsky's estimate of these resources. Col. W. H. Heuer believes them capable of a development of at least 100,000,000 gallons, or three times the present consumption. Prof. Geo. E. Davidson, of the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, maintains the same figures. Several prominent jurists have assured me that the legal power to condemn for domestic purposes is undoubted, and vindicated by precedent. I am not now referring to the city's power to condemn the Spring Valley plant. The litigation to which Mr. Galloway refers is therefore not an absolute, but a relative difficulty. But even if the Alameda creek source were abandoned, the possibilities of the plant would still far exceed the present development and become a valuable adjunct to any Sierra system. As Mr. Grunsky says, "it ranks first in reliability of service."

Private Ownership Not a Fatal Objection.

2. Mr. Galloway, after dismissing Lake Tahoe, states that "the reservoir sites and the waters of all other rivers are in private ownership."

But private ownership is no fatal objection unless the city refuses to buy or to condemn. In the proceedings of the Commonwealth Club for 1907 I find this statement attributed to Mr. Galloway: "The writer is familiar with the Sierra Nevada mountains from the Yuba river on the north to the Tuolumne river on the south. There is no question but that a good quantity of water can be obtained anywhere in this region." At the same meeting of the club Prof. C. D. Marx of Stanford University stated that "it can readily be shown that the drainage area needed for a water supply capable of furnishing 200,000,000 gallons per day can be had on a number of Sierra streams. That the drainage areas of streams north of the Tuolumne give better promise of meeting the requirements cannot be denied."

It cannot be said that the physical data now available are such as to admit of a reliable comparison of the relative value of the various sources of water supply for San Francisco from the Sierras. That no comparative survey has been undertaken since then appears to be admitted by everyone. In 1908 the board of supervisors published a book entitled "Reports of Water Supplies of San Francisco." These reports were made by Messrs. Grunsky and Manson, the one the former, the other the present, city engineer. For the sake of brevity let the report in this regard be designated by the letter "WS." On page fifteen Mr. Grunsky admits that "in the case of San Francisco there is no single source of supply so pre-eminently available that it could, without question, rule out others from comparison." Lake Tahoe and the Yuba river are rejected because of "the relatively high cost" (WS, p.

32). The Mokelumne river is dismissed because "outranked" by the Tuolumne (p. 27). The San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers are deemed ineligible because "these sources are not so close at hand that reduced cost of work necessarily compels their consideration in comparison with Sierra Nevada sources" (p. 35). Mr. Galloway himself cites one case in which the obstacle is $10,000,000. The difficulty is one of dollars, not of available water.

Another objection is stated by Mr. Galloway as follows: "On the San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Mokelumne, American, and Yuba rivers are large electric power plants which use the water. It is also used for irrigation." The availability of water is not affected by previous use for the generation of electricity.

It developed at the hearings in Washington that no serious attempt had been made to ascertain on what terms the tail-race waters of any of the power companies could be obtained. During the previous city administration one power company operating on the Stanislaus river with storage capacity greater than Hetch-Hetchy valley and protected by a forest reserve, offered to build a complete water transmission system to San Francisco for actual cost plus 10 per cent, and to guarantee all titles and a maximum supply of water equal to any possible requirements. This instance is mentioned only as an illustration of unexploited possibilities. Along rivers north of the Tuolumne the rainfall increases and there is less irrigable land. The amount of water used there for irrigation is a negligible matter in this discussion. The irrigation difficulty is greatest on the Tuolumne river, and there it is proposed to solve it by impounding the flood waters. Congressman Englebright, himself a civil and mining engineer and for five years superintendent of the Nevada Division of the South Yuba Water company, testified before the public lands committee of Congress that there are untutilized storage facilities on a number of Sierra streams. The following is an excerpt from one of the hearings, in reference to the Middle Fork of the Yuba:

Mr. Englebright.—Yes. There would be no trouble at all for him to gather 100,000,000 gallons a day.

The Chairman.—At those points?

Mr. Englebright.—Yes.

The Chairman.—How would the taking of 100,000,000 gallons from one point where it is now reserved, or from some available point below, affect the lower Yuba as to present uses? Is the water now used for irrigation—the lower Yuba?

Mr. Englebright.—No.

The Chairman.—It is utilized for mining?

Mr. Englebright.—The amount of storage water that is used is utilized for nothing. The only use is on the North Yuba and the South Yuba. The North Yuba is used for power and some irrigation. The Middle Yuba is practically unused at all, except by a single mining company.

In view of these facts Congressman Herbert Parsons appears to be justified when he declares in his report "The real difficulty with San Francisco is that it does not wish to consider any other supply. The others might cost more." In support of his view he goes on to quote Mr. Galloway: "The amount of storage water that I can see it, has nothing to do with the question of whether the United States grants us the use of the lands in the Hetch-Hetchy valley." Our contention is that the availability of other sources has a most important bearing upon that question. The same contention has been taken by Chairman Mondell of the public lands committee. I quote from his report: "I am of the opinion that the city has failed to establish its contention that the Hetch-Hetchy is the only reasonably available source of water supply in the Sierras, and that, therefore, the interests of the people of all the country should be waived on behalf of San Francisco in its claims to exclusive use of this valley." This view is concurred in by exactly half of the voting members of the committee, and one who voted on the other side, I am credibly informed, has heard none of the evidence.

Condemnation Proceedings Quite Feasible.

3. Mr. Galloway throws doubt upon the probable success of condemnation proceedings against Spring Valley. We would reply that Hetch-Hetchy and the un hindered use of the Tuolumne region of the park are too valuable a national asset to be staked on a mere doubt. Let the thing be tried. This part of Mr. Galloway's paper is best answered by the admirable summary of Congressman Parsons, who is a prominent New York lawyer. "Can San Francisco get any of these other supplies? San Francisco has the right of eminent domain. If it is not in the form most available, then it should apply to its state legislature to get it. If the state legislature can speedily pass a resolution asking Congress to grant two-fifths of the Yosemite National Park for the use of San Francisco, it ought to be able speedily to pass a bill granting San Francisco full and convenient rights of eminent domain. The fact of the matter is that San Francisco, having its eye on Hetch-Hetchy, has not thoroughly investigated other systems."

Certainly the federal government is not bound to give up to the city two-fifths of a national park simply because it is cheaper. Why is it cheaper? Because having been made a national park, it has not been possible for private interests to file upon the water in the same manner as they could have if there had not been a national park. Had private interests been allowed to file upon the water, San Francisco would not have thought of going to Hetch-Hetchy any more than to any other place. It would have chosen the place that it most cheaply could have condemned. It goes to Hetch-Hetchy because it belongs to all the people instead of to some of the people. It has been preserved and made cheap because the purpose was to use it as a national park. Having been made cheap in that manner, San Francisco desires to use it for itself by spoiling the very purpose which has made it cheap."

Electric Power City's Aim.

4. In regard to the development and use of water-power from Hetch-Hetchy Mr. Galloway says: "All the water-power which can be developed will be used to pump the same water over the Atlantic summit of the Coast Range. If any excess power be developed it must, by the terms of the grant, be sold to the irrigation districts at cost for pumping water." Can a reader derive any other meaning from this statement than that the grant limits the city's use of the power generated to the pumping of the water? Mr. Galloway must have misread Section six of the grant: "The city of San Francisco will, upon request, sell to said Modesto and Turlock irrigation districts for the use of any land owner or owners therein for pumping sub-surface water for drainage or irrigation any excess of electric power which may be generated such as may not be used for the water supply herein provided, and for the actual municipal purposes of the City and County of San Francisco," etc. Furthermore, in the preamble of the grant Mr. Garfield enumerates among the advantages to be derived by the city "the cheap and bountiful supply of electric energy for pumping its water supply and lighting the city and its municipal buildings." The grant allows the city to use the power for any municipal purpose, except the street car, if it chooses to make a municipal affair of it. Any one will see how, in the eyes of some men, the prospect of these advantages enhances the desirability of Hetch-Hetchy over sources where the power privileges looked this aspect of the case for the first time. In his report a 16,500 horse power from Hetch-Hetchy which would produce "a relief from taxation now imposed for lighting streets and public buildings. This averages more than $300,000; capitalized at 5 per cent, this expenditure represents an investment of $6,000,000" (W. S. p. 80-98). The "relief" together with water which can just as well be obtained elsewhere, is to be secured by irreparable injury to one of the nation's fairest possessions.

Health Demands Exclusion of Public.

5. The sequestration argument is the only one to which Mr. Galloway is willing to attach any importance, and we may add at once that he omits or minimizes the most decisive facts.

ONE of the stables institutions of one of the staidest California towns is the Galoot Club. Its purpose is declared, by its by-laws, to be "The tranquil consideration of affairs of state and—whist," but its real sphere of intility is sipping and a united opposition to all enterprises which might increase taxation. The members, despite the name which common notoriety has fixed upon the club, are men of mature years, unexceptionable habits, well-to-do and very friendly one to another. It is many a comfortable evening they while away in their club rooms together.

Often, after closing their serious discussions, and making a fringe with their upturned feet about the periphery of the mahogany center table, they fall into that mood for interchange of confidences so prolific of subsequent regrets.

"What in creation do you gentlemen suppose is the reason for Herodotus Johnson and his wife separating this late in the day?" demanded a young husband. "Wife and I have been married only four years, yet we long ago fought to a finish and came to a perfect understanding. She attends to her affairs and the babies and I attend to mine and the store, and we get on as comfortably together as doves in a cote. I cannot see why people who have somehow put up with each other until they have a house full of children cannot make out to continue the partnership until the product is finished and—marketed, so to speak."

"I know all about that case," broke in the newspaper man. "Mr. Johnson is one of those women whose head is full of ideals, and Johnson is not an ideal, you know. His little flaws have been quietly disillusionizing the lady; but what brought affairs to a climax was the discovery that Mr. Johnson had, but one time sustained. The broken heart. While the incident was anterior to Mr. Johnson's discovery of the maidenly Mrs. Johnson, that lady could not reconcile herself to the situation, was haunted with the idea that he cherished something, you know, an undying something or other, so she went over him and nibbled at his heart until it became a changed man, staid at home little, lost his temper, said mean things and a separation became inevitable. I am sorry for Johnson. He feels it, too."

"The deuce you say!" ejaculated the postmaster, sinking a trifle lower in his chair and lapsing into a contemplative mood.

"Hello! What's struck you?" demanded two or three in chorus.

"An idea, by jingo! I tremble for the safety of my household. I am on the verge, the very verge, and may heaven help me," and again the speaker lapsed into moody silence. The others smoked and waited.

"My wife is just another such woman as Mrs. Johnson," he continued, in his own good time and half to himself, "only I come a good deal nearer being an ideal than Johnson does, but I have been urging an old chum of mine back in Ohio to come out here and spend his remaining days where he can get the sea air and sunny skies. Well, he married the sister of the girl I nearly went insane over and his wife knows all about it. If those people come here it will not be three days before my wife will have pumped the whole story out of that woman and then there will be another sensation for this town to ruminate on. If I live until morning I shall telegraph Wilkinson that I have defaulted, discarded my family and friends and run away to Honduras."

"This is a great surprise to me," remarked the judge. "I supposed that you and your wife lived very happily together."

"And so we do, by dint of the most persistent hypocrisy you ever heard of. I have had the grace to tell my wife a million times that she is the only woman I ever cared to rest my eyes upon, and I lied to her every time. I hope the good Lord will not send me below for it, but I had to choose between hell here and hell hereafter and naturally put it off as long as I could. And yet our married life has been a very happy one, all because of my ability to lie consistently. But if my wife were to learn of that ancient episode I believe she would leave me yet, and we have grandchildren. I did love that girl though, and dream of her every once in a while to this day."

"You are too deep for me, Si," remarked the Doctor. "But women are peculiar, very peculiar, especially when they are out of health, which they generally are. My wife isn't though, and people can run and tell her what they please for all I care. I told my wife of all the love scrapes I ever got into, with one exception, years and years ago, and when I found that they interested her, and that my stock of them was running low, as they naturally would in course of time, I drew sight drafts on my imagination and observation for further instances and went on with the diversion. Talk about a man not being able to love more than one woman! It is all nonsense. I could love a hundred. The world is overflowing with good, lovable women, and men, too, and if you throw any two of them together a good deal, with nothing to hinder, the chances are a dozen to one that they will make a match of it. That's the result of my observations, anyway, only neither of the subjects for experiment should be morbid. You can't ever tell what a morbid man or woman will do."

"I believe that is a good deal so, Doctor," observed the newspaper man. "I always worshipped at the shrine of some little deity, even in childhood. Can't remember when I did not, but of course when I took to myself a wife I felt that I ought to be loyal to her and I have been, yet not without some effort. Every comely face and sprightly mind has a fascination for me, but as for that melting of soul into soul, that eternal oneness of twoness that the books are full of, I never could take any stock in that sort of stuff."

"I don't know about that," timidly ventured a retired farmer. "Sometimes I think that there is a good deal that is at least possible in that line, if we were only wise enough to avail ourselves of it. I was not, at least not when I ought to have been."

"What, ho! Len Harper with a romance! Give is to us Len," demanded the newspaper man. "We have got to believe what you tell us whether we want to or not, but we are under no such obligation to Mr. Come, Len, out with it. Gentlemen, do you all swear secretly? You've got to or Len will never divulge. He does not complain to the winds or make confidants of old women. Is it agreed? All set, Len. Drive ahead."

"I have always been kind of slow, you know," began Harper, with a suspicious twinkle in his eye, "never got around to sell until everybody else wanted to buy, or to buy until everybody else wanted to sell. Perhaps that is why I prospered so well in business, and so poorly in love. There does not seem to be much more business about love than there is about religion. They belong to different kingdoms, but I did not understand that as well once as I do now."

"I can't remember when I did not love Minnie. We spent most of our young lives on adjoining farms, went to school together and sang in the choir, but I do not know that I ever really said love to her once. She did not have any brother or sister and her father wasn't any hand to take her to places, and they trusted me. I went with her from childhood up, pretty much the same as though she really were my sister."

"I never said anything to her about marriage either, but had an idea that when she got a little older and stronger, for I did not believe in girls marrying until they had got along in the twenties quite a piece, and then the matter to her mind was. She was in and out at mother's every day just like one of us, and there didn't seem to be any hurry about it."

"Well, along came Jack Gilchrist, good fellow enough at heart, but as trifling a man as ever walked. He could dance better'n I could and sang tenor instead of bass, and he said to Minnie right away, 'I didn't pay any attention to what was going on for a good while and when I did, why I did just exactly the wrong thing at the right time. I got angry and scolded her, talked to her as though she belonged to me, and she resented it, said back had a heart anyway and that I hadn't, and that she did not like a human clam all shut up inside of his shell with only a saucy tongue sticking out, threw herself out of the room and I took my hat and left. Against the advice of her father and mother she married Jack within a hour and said she didn't care for the other part of the state where his people lived."

"It killed mother, who was feeble anyhow, and dotted on Minnie, and I sold out the place as soon as I could and went over on the Joaquin to get out of the neighborhood."

"Seven or eight years went by when one day, out came a messenger from the nearest telegraph office, seven miles away, with a dispatch from Jack, and it said: 'Minnie not going to get well, wants you, come quick.'"

"I told one of the men to throw the harness onto the best team I had, got ready and made that twelve miles in fifty minutes, just in time to catch the train for the north."

"They had seen hard times, Minnie and Jack, but especially Minnie, for Jack looked out well enough for himself, but poverty and heart trouble," the doctor said, had killed Minnie, and she lay there dying when I came."

"Well, Minnie said to me to catch her little girl, five years old, and bring her up, just as though she were my own," she said, and I promised, though I was keeping batch on the ranch down in the valley with only a Chinaman for housekeeper, but I could not refuse. So I reached over and kissed her, with Jack looking on, and said: 'Yes, dear, I will.' That's all the lovelomaking there ever was between us, and she went away very soon for she had borne up best she could till I came."

"So the papers were made out the day of the funeral and little Minnie was mine anyhow."

"But I do not know what I should have done if it had not been for Annie Marshall. You see my wife was a widow then and lived on the ranch next to mine. Her husband was killed a year before by the exploding of the boiler to a threshing engine on my ranch, and I had done what I could to help her get along, as any neighbor would, so I just took the little tot over for her to take care of while I superintended her ranch as well as mine by way of return. I told her all about it, too."

"The upshot of it was that, one day, when I had called to advise with her about something, and to play with Minnie's baby a bit, as I did most every day, Annie up and said, kind of quick: 'I don't know what I should have done the past year, Len Harper, if it had not been for you, and what's more I don't see how I am to get on any better next year without you, but I dislike to be so much trouble.'"

"I wish you couldn't see how you ever can get on without me, Annie," said I, though I really had not thought about loving her or anything of that sort; but I just naturally could not see how she could get on without me, not being a mannish woman at all or having any head for bossing the hands, and I don't see how I can ever get on without you, seeing I've got Minnie's baby to do for and bring up and don't know how," and I knew that people would be like that."

"Well, Annie cried a little, said it was only such a little while since dear John was killed and she did love him so and always would so long as she lived, and I mustn't think that she loved me just the same as she loved John, but she did not seem so dreadfully alone when I was not around that if I really did want her and would not expect more than she could give—"We have lived very happily together, Annie and I, but we both understand that we are married to each other just for this life. I know that she really belongs to John Marshall. As for Minnie, well, I like to think that perhaps John Marshall is looking out for her till I come. Sometimes I feel pretty certain he is, for there was not a squarer man in California than John Marshall was in his day. I am sure he'd do me as big a favor as I've done him if there was any chance.

"Now about our children, Annie's and mine. You will think that I am insane sure enough if I tell you about them. We have had four children, Annie and I. And then there is James Marshall who was five years old when his father got killed. And Minnie. I've told you about Minnie. The Judge there can tell you something about her, too, for she is his daughter-in-law.

"But as I was saying, of the four children which have been born to us we raised up two to Annie and John and two to Minnie and me. I had been revolving the matter over in my mind against a time when such a thing might come to pass and so the first time Annie said to me that she thought there was a ship upon the water, that that might bring to her and me a baby. I picked out the best likeness we had of John Marshall, took it to San Francisco, and had made from it the best life-sized portrait that money could buy and, for a surprise, had it hung in a good light in Annie's sewing room. Then we talked of John at evenings, and told each other all the bright and brave things that we knew of John saying or doing, and tried to feel that he was with us still and happy with us in our happiness.

"The next time, that was after we had moved back here and I had bought the place where Minnie used to live, and lived in the same house (fixed up considerable though) where she spent her childhood, why, I just took down John's portrait and put Minnie's in its place, and we talked of Minnie as we had talked of John and, well, all I have got to say is that anyone who ever knew John Marshall and Minnie St. John will not have to be told which two of our children were raised up to Annie and John and which to Minnie and me."

"Don't that jar you?" exclaimed the newspaper man. "And it comes right from the lips of Len Harper, the priest, most matter-of-fact, sure-thing farmer on the coast! I am plum beat out. It is enough to turn a Presbyterian into a theosophist. Len, you have shaken my firm foundation. I've got to begin all over new. And just when I've got the most comfortable philosophy concocted that ever was! Oh! that it had been who told us that so that I could dismiss the whole absurd proposition by ejaculating 'What are you giving us?' But the thought of Len Harper going around with his head full of a moon-eyed romance, pardon me Len, but I can't call it anything else, why it makes me feel sorry I came."

Automobile Notes.

A new method of construction adopted by several manufacturers is called "unit construction." It is based on the principle that a triangle cannot be racked. Hence these manufacturers are assembling certain machinery into groups separated from the struts of the rest of the car. Some are grouping the transmission with the motor, making a single unit out of this power plant group. Other makers prefer to secure the unit construction by grouping the transmission gear in the rear axle housing, thus making a single group of light weight at the center of and in front of the rear axle.

Either arrangement permits the use of a long propeller shaft between the two units and, of course, reduces the angle at which the propeller shaft joints are obliged to work, with consequent less wear on these joints, a more efficient transmission of power, and, therefore, less need for an over-powered, over-heavy motor.

New York will repeat its successful carnival of last year with a week's festivities beginning on Monday, April 5th. The parade last year included 1,463 cars, and was witnessed by more than half a million people. Nearly twice as many cars will parade this year, and the audience should be much greater, as the event will occur in the afternoon instead of the evening.

Manufacturers are now paying especial attention to the artistic decoration of their cars, and many of the best factories are equipped with an art department to carry out the ideas of purchasers for distinctive fittings and color schemes.

The Goodrich people claim to have made a great forward stride in the manufacture of tires by the introduction of a special secret treatment of the fabric which, they say, practically eliminates every possibility of blow-out.

"To exclude the people from the upper Tuolumne would be a signal deprivation of a common right." What is meant by "the upper Tuolumne?" The Tuolumne Canyon is next to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado the most wonderful gorge in America, and it lies immediately above Hetch-Hetchy. It would certainly be criminal negligence to allow the health of several hundred thousand people to be endangered by campers in that canyon. Yet to exclude them will be "a signal deprivation of a common right." The same is true of the Tuolumne Meadows. The writer must confess to surprise that a civil engineer should contemplate with complacency so serious a matter as this proposed divided use of the Tuolumne watershed.

Mr. Galloway writes about a lake which is to be a scenic feature. But who ever heard of an intelligent community that built a pleasure road around its water-supply, and undertook to construct trails for campers and tourists into a canyon where a chance pollution by the casual case of walking typhoid might mean the death of thousands? How can any one seriously suggest, as Mr. Galloway does, that "such reasonable regulations of conduct as now obtain in Yosemite" are a sufficient safeguard for an unlimited municipal water supply? The city of Ithaca thought so, and one Italian on the Efficiency is the only logical basis for comparison of an automobile. Few persons appreciate that fact. Ask any Studebaker-Garford owner; he'll tell you in a word that it's due to the higher efficiency of the Studebaker-Garford that he is the owner of one.

Regardless of rating, these cars excel in year-and-year-out performance. If an owner wants a new model he always wants a later one of the same make. Therefore he brings his old car to us—for, better than anyone else, we know and appreciate its value.

Let us send you a list of owners of Studebaker-Garford cars men of prominence who have driven their machines three, four and five years. Let their verdict determine your choice.

PERSONALIA

The widows of former presidents Cleveland and Harrison have the privilege of franking their letters through the U. S. mail.

J. C. Stubbs, traffic manager of the Harriman lines, has a remarkable memory. He is said to carry the latest crop reports of every western state in his head.

Ex-President Roosevelt has an almost exact double in appearance in an Italian named Pietro Cassini, who is the owner of a picture-frame shop in front of the Pitti Palace in Florence.

The maiden aunt from whose inspiration in stons regarding the beneficent possibilities of spinsternhood is Miss Delia Torrey of Millbury, Mass.

President Taft's bodyguard is named Lucien C. Wheeler, and is now learning the intricacies of his job from Jimmy Sloan, his predecessor, who will shortly become a United States marshal in Illinois.

Mrs. Edith Wharton has been an occasional contributor of verse to the magazines, and the first volume of her collected poems is just now published under the title of "Artemis to Actaeon and Other Verse."

The first negro ever appointed to a federal judgeship is Robert H. Terrell, a native of Virginia and graduate of Harvard. He is one of the judges of the new Municipal Court of the District of Columbia.

Max Beerholm, the English actor, declares that the middle class, despite its contempt for the failings and follies of the aristocracy, is more interested in them than in anybody else. He gives this as the reason why playwrights choose their characters from the socially elite.

Mrs. Taft is an excellent pianist, a college student (though not a college graduate), is versed in political matters and has a judgment of affairs that is highly esteemed by the president. She reads and speaks French and Spanish. She and her children are Episcopalians.

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell was eighty years old last month. His novel, "Hugh Wynne," was published when he was sixty-eight, and he has since written six novels. He is still at work in his profession—he is a nerve specialist of world-wide eminence—and still writes during his liberal summer vacation.

When George Hazelton, the author of a novel called "The Raven," based upon the love stories of Edgar Allan Poe, offered a play of the same name and upon the same subject to a great American theatrical manager, the gentleman said: "I am very much interested, but I am very busy to-day. Come around Saturday and bring Poe with you and I will talk it over."

The financially successful actors buy homes in the fashionable West Side of New York. Richard Mansfield owned a palatial residence on Riverside Drive, E. H. Sothern has one there, as have Lew Dockstader and Richard Carle. Maxine Elliott lives near the drive, and is a social light of first magnitude, entertaining lavishly in her home and daintily in the dressing room of her new theatre.

Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, whose title to royal honors has only lately been recognized, strove to have them acknowledged by offering to attend Queen Victoria's funeral, provided he should be received in England as a royal person. Several telegrams passed between Sofia and Downing Street, when Lord Salisbury cut short the discussion with the message that he "refused to bandy etiquette over the dead body of his sovereign."

Some praised us. Some condemned. The many wrote nothing, the unkindest cut of all. Please write us what you think of The California Weekly.

("Hetch-Hetchy"—Concluded.)

watershed, sick with walking typhoid, caused the death of over a hundred persons in less than two months. Pittsburgh, Plymouth, Reading, Pa., had typhoid epidemics from similar causes. Philadelphia had to install an expensive filtration plant. The severest winter cold does not kill the typhoid germ, and it has been found to maintain itself especially long in mountain streams. Mr. J. Horace McFarland, president of the American Civic Association, has made a special study of water supplies, and his experience led him to testify before the senate committee that "the whole valley which is tributary to Hetch-Hetchy, every single foot of it, must be given to San Francisco," unless Congress chooses to "give away a means of poisoning San Francisco."

I fail to see how Mr. Galloway can refer to the Croton watershed in support of the dangerous laxness he appears to advocate. Water is purified by filtration or long storage. Neither will be the case in Hetch-Hetchy, where a large river constantly flows through the reservoir. Croton lake is a storage reservoir in comparison. Yet among the regulations of the New York State Board of Health, governing the Croton watershed, is this: "neither shall any person swim, bathe, or wash in any of said lakes, ponds, or reservoirs, or in the streams tributary thereto." Apply that to the Tuolumne watershed and what becomes of Mr. Galloway's assurance that camping privileges shall not be interfered with? What more of the present tendency is in the direction of still greater restrictions?

Will Lose Best Half of Park.

Let no one be deceived about this. With Hetch-Hetchy goes the finest half of the national park. Let the city once get a foothold in the park and the very strict state laws protecting domestic water supplies will be at once invoked. That is the reason why the proponents of the scheme are not concerned about this phase of the matter in public discussion. In his report to the supervisors, however, the city engineer bluntly says the reservoir "may be expected to receive all the protection against possible pollution that could be desired" (WS, p. 52)—of course, also at the expense of the nation. In a still more recent report he gives assurance that at no time in the future can conditions arise leading to impair the purity of the water "which cannot be rigidly controlled."

There are three other weighty arguments why San Francisco should not be allowed to invade the national park, but I shall have to reserve them for a subsequent discussion. But I hope enough has been said to show that this is not such a one-sided question as Mr. Galloway would have us think. With few exceptions the public press around the bay has distorted and suppressed the real facts. But they are becoming known, chiefly through the eastern press. The presumptive right is on the side of a city which desires to free itself from a corporation. Yet the committees of Congress, after patiently examining the evidence, decide that San Francisco is demanding an unjustifiable sacrifice of the nation's property and rights. It is not Spring Valley that is defeating the city, but the inherent injustice and selfishness of its own project, as exposed by the disinterested opposition, the "so-called nature lovers." The growing "unanimous sentiment" for which Mr. Galloway pleads is now on their side. Best of all, it is growing in San Francisco and elsewhere in the state. One great opposition movement among original promoters is already on foot and will be heard from in due time.

Dance.

Try again—you've a chance—

Dance.

Get into line;

Don't whine.

Set your jaws and swell your chest;

This time do your level best.

No one cares about your fears,

No one shares your woes and tears,

No one sighs because you've lost

Or gives a "hang" how much it cost.

But woe the world is hard of heart

It holds no man back who would start

Again to climb up where he stood,

Who'll bend his back and saw his wood.

It's not the failure, but the yell,
That keeps you lying where you fell.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cleanly, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have no unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Right of Petition and Assembly.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that, "Congress shall make no law prohibiting the free exercise of the right peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." This is not saying that no state shall have power to prohibit free assembly or petition, but any state that assumed to exercise such a power would have trouble on its hands from its own citizens.

The hand of Uncle Sam is little visible to the American citizen. The postmaster is about the only representative of federal authority with whom the citizen comes in contact and he is more desirous to serve the public than to exercise authority over it. This provision in the Constitution restrains governmental authority over the citizenry everywhere except in our insular dependencies where the power of the national government to restrain assemblages is little questioned.

But our Constitution of California declares that, "The people shall have the right freely to assemble to consult for the common good, to instruct their representatives and to petition the legislature for redress of grievances." It is well for us to know what our rights are under both of these guarantees.

It has been reasoned out with judicial solemnity that what one person may lawfully do any number of other persons may do likewise, but such reasonings are subject to as many qualifications, as the right and comfort of others may impose. There is no greater fallacy than that laws are the results of parties of reasoning. Laws are determined by states of fact. For instance, the right of the reader to pass down any street cannot be questioned, but if so many others undertake to go with him as to constitute a procession the chief of police first be asked for permission and he will say upon what streets and at what hour that procession may proceed. The right of the reader to stand on a street corner is inalienable, but if so many happen to wish to stand on that corner as to block the passageway the patrolman may rightfully order the reader to move on.

So it is with the right of assemblage. It is subject to the rights of others to have free course through the streets, to have such use of public parks as law and custom have sanctioned, and the purpose of the assemblage must not be such as to provoke a breach of the peace, and it must be lawful.

The policy of British and American law relative to public assemblage has been, roughly speaking, to permit all persons to say what they please, with the added precaution to be very careful what they try to do, whereas, in Europe, generally, public assemblages have been required to be careful both as to what they said and what they did. There are few cities in America where Emma Goldman will be permitted to hold public meetings, for the reason that her language is likely to provoke breaches of the peace and to incite weak minds to the perpetration of physical crimes against society.

Authorities have forbidden perfectly lawful meetings for the reason that such meetings would provoke, or be the occasion of, unlawful acts upon the part of others. Suppose, for instance, that a body of non-union workmen, who had taken the places of striking union men, desired to march down one street and up another and the police knew that such a parade would result in conflict and riot. The parade would be forbidden, not because the non-union men proposed to do anything wrong, but because the strikers did propose to disturb the peace. If the police department felt strong enough to protect the marchers, and preserve the peace, it would be an invasion of constitutional rights not to allow the procession to proceed, but if not strong enough the courts would uphold the police power in this evasion of a constitutional right.

The right of petition is so unquestioned in our country that we wonder that any guaranty of it should be thought needed in either national constitution or state, but time was when the petitions of the fathers of the republic to the throne of the mother country were spurned.

Little importance is now attached to petitions. The habit of the people of signing any sort of petition presented, without investigating into its purport, has nearly destroyed the efficacy of petitioning, so that when a petition is presented to a legislative body it is generally "received and placed on file," in some junk room and that is the last of it. Its most effective use under the most favorable conditions is as an indication as to how the petitioners are likely to vote should the issue come to a vote. That consideration may reach the political mind when the thing petitioned for would be disregarded. The voice of the press has supplanted the right of petition, and yet the few lines required in our Constitutions to guarantee that right in perpetuity are well worth the space they occupy.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the service satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear, that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

James Bryce.

Too much honor cannot be conferred upon James Bryce by our university, city, state or nation. How much the civilized world owes to this thoughtful, forceful, kindly man will never be humanly known, but he has done more to cement the two great English-speaking nations together in bonds of friendship than any other man or assemblage of men, and this means more to civilization than any other international fact. His interpretation of us to his own people did more for us and his own people than any similar effort made during the nineteenth century toward establishing an enviable cordiality between nations. The establishing of cordial relations between France and England will prove to have been the monumental achievement of the reign of Edward VII but, important as that was, it cannot compare with the making of the two English-speaking peoples into one people in fraternity of feeling and community of purpose. All honor to James Bryce.

The Conviction of the Coopers.

The Coopers, father and son, who lay in wait and slew former Senator Carmack, were convicted and sentenced to twenty years of penal servitude. So far so good. They were judged by the plain people of Tennessee and judged righteously. The judge before whom they were tried appears to have been impartial and in earnest. What will the appellate court do? That is always the question. In what atmosphere does that court have its being? That is the test. The Coopers are "quality" people. They have on their side the prestige of social influence. It does not appear, however, that the interests of the political department of the Louisville & Nashville railroad, which nearly ruined Kentucky, are involved in the issue. This is important. The Coopers are poor. That also is a point in favor of justice. Social influence without millions or "organization" support may not be able to defeat justice in Tennessee. It is to be hoped not. The sending of such men as the Coopers to prison will do more to break up the street dueling habit in the South than all other influences combined, just as the sending of a few predatory millionaires to prison for grafting would do more than anything else to moralize the commercial and promissive atmosphere of our country. Justice is finding hard sledding, but it must stay with its job or all that humanity has gained in a thousand years will be lost.

The Cause of Defalcations.

A representative of a surety company has said that 75 per cent. of the defalcations his company had been called upon to make good owed their existence to the race track. The statement is inherently probable. But how long did it take California to legislate race track gambling out of lawful protection! Not until the entire state so demanded it that the "performers" dared no longer ignore the demand was anything done. It was no moral sentiment on the part of the "performers" that caused them to stand aside. Session after session of the legislature they had protected it, and they would still have protected it had they dared. The racetrack men were their kind of people. Nothing short of fear of such a political revolution as would throw him out of power, neck and heels, will entice a vital moral act from a "performer."

What Will the Governor Do?

There are many important bills in the hands of Governor Gillett. He can be trusted with the good ones in tolerable security. With the bad ones he cannot. "Organization" influences are behind the vicious bills of Wheelan and Grove L. Johnson, and Gillett is a part of the "organization." He will sign all the justice crippling bills before him unless the righteous indignation of the state rises in wrath and tells him plainly that he will be damned if he does. Then he won't. He wants to succeed himself as governor. If he can be made to understand that attaching his signature to those bills will bury him beyond the possibility of resurrection, as it will, he will stay his hand. If he has not the intelligence to read the writing on the wall there is one above him who has and that one will stay his hand for him. Put these issues up to the governor and put them up hard. Do it now. It will save him from disgrace and his state from disaster.

What of a Constitutional Convention?

If the legislative experiences of recent years have taught California anything worth knowing it is that no good thing of first-class importance can be gotten through an "organization" legislature without making a football wedge of the entire decent element of the state with which to break the "organization" line. This can be done for one or two "causes" every two years, but not more. That is too slow. Reform should go faster. Its progress should be made easier. Representative government is good when it represents, but it is all-killing hard to make it represent any element not bound together by the cohesive power of graft. Direct legislation ought not to be necessary to a government by, of and for the people, but if it is then let us have it. If there is no need for it it will not be used even though written into the constitution of the state. Some means must be found for taking government out of the hands of the railroads and associated iniquities and restoring it to the people. Would a constitutional convention help to re-establish justice and self-government in this state? Think it over.

Deplorable Eddie.

What a wide swath Senator Eddie Wolfe must have thought he was cutting when he introduced that resolution deploring the rapacity of the railroads and express companies in advancing rates and recommending that the railroad's non-performing railroad commission investigate the matter thoroughly! That was the most jocular incident of the session. "That's right, Eddie," telepathically wired Mr. Herrin. "Deplore all you want to and have our men investigate us all you please, but I'm counting on you to see that nothing is done about it." There wasn't. Eddie can be counted on.

Very Petty Politics.

It has been given out by the "performers" that Campbell's proposed constitutional amendment, enlarging the powers of the State Railroad Commission, might have been submitted to the people had it emanated from a Republican instead of a Democratic source. That is the pothouse politician's view, but if the "performers" were trying to make political capital for the Democrats they could not go about it in any better way than by turning down good measures merely because they came from a Democratic source. It is noticeable, however, that their antipathy to things Democratic did not extend to the infamous Wheelan bills, introduced and fought through by a Democrat, but then Wheelan is a different kind of Democrat. He is "organization."

Mr. Phelan On Hetch-Hetchy.

As John Muir and Dr. Bade love their mountains so does James D. Phelan love his native city and, as will be seen from his article elsewhere in this paper, he stands up for the Hetch-Hetchy water proposition good and strong. Two points made by him stand out especially clear: No matter what other possible sources of water there may be for San Francisco and Hetchy is the best, and the highest use that the valley can be put to is the supplying of this district, and the millions that will some day live in it, with abundant water for all time. If that source cannot be kept free from contamination from "walking typhoid," neither can any other. The forest reserves must be lumbered. Moreover, greater weight could be conceded to the demands of nature lovers for Hetch-Hetchy, untouched by the hand of San Francisco, were it not that nearly half of California is a Switzerland plus one-third of the whole United States. All indoors could turn out of doors all summer and be lost to view until the end of the season.

The records our legislators made during the session just closed are public property. By those records must those men be judged. It is not too soon to judge of their fitness for further public life. We'll see to 'em.

HAS THE LEAGUE MADE GOOD?

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League was organized for the purpose of accomplishing certain specific results. These were: the emancipation of the Republican party of California from corporate control, the continuation of the Roosevelt policies in national affairs, the election of a free legislature, an advisory vote of the people as to the election of United States senator and such a primary election law as will afford the party voter a direct voice in the selection of party candidates.

The League early espoused the nomination of William H. Taft for president and created such a public sentiment in the state in his favor that his endorsement was forced upon the Republican convention against the desires of the party "organization."

A direct primary law has been enacted and a beginning made toward free nominations of party candidates. We shall be working at that law ten years hence seeking to make it effective, but California has done as well in this respect as any other state in the union.

The legislature that has just adjourned was not free, but it was the freest of Southern Pacific domination that the state has had in forty years.

The provision for an advisory vote on United States senator is a makeshift and a subterfuge, but it was better to accept it, and so embody in a statute the principle of such an advisory vote, than to permit the Herrin machine to defeat the direct primary bill, for which bill the "organization" really had no use.

These results have been accomplished through a coalition of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League members of the legislature with the reputable element in the Democratic party, to which element great honor is due. Without its aid not one of these good legislative results could have been attained. The "performers" would have buried them.

One thing remains undone: The Southern Pacific's Political Bureau has not been forced to let go its hold upon the Republican party. The League has forced it to be outwardly more decent than before. Inwardly it has been more cunning and more devilish. When the work of the legislature can be seen in perspective it will be found that, while some of the best legislation in half a century has been written into the laws, there has gone with it some of the worst that ever disgraced a commonwealth. But of that elsewhere. The obvious good has been made a cloak to hide the subtle bad.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has made good, but its task has not been finished. The Southern Pacific's Political Bureau still has the machinery of the Republican party in its control. It is still able to succor, and perhaps save, the scoundrels who come to it for protection and who make common to it against the highest good of the commonwealth. Until that grip is shaken off the politics of this state the mission of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will not have been fulfilled.

BUT ONE ISSUE HEREAFTER.

There is but one issue before the people of California worthy to be called an issue, one purpose worthy to actuate the mind of any patriotic citizen and that is the cause of the establishment of justice in this state. All other issues sink into insignificance by comparison. Under cover of a decent reputation made by the late legislature during the early part of the session, and under cover of some legislation that was, in praiseworthy, there was slipped through, in the concluding days of the session, some as wolfish legislation as it is within the minds of men to conceive.

The initial one of these measures permits the indicted criminal to select the judge before whom he is to be tried. If this criminal happens to be one of the retainers or associates of the chief "performer" of the state he will select for his judge one who owes his elevation for his trench to this "performer" and his "performing" subordinates, a judge who is expected at the crucial moment to remember who it was that made him a judge.

The next measure enacted by this "performing" aggregation permits this judge so selected to call for the evidence given to the grand jury that found the indictment. If so minded, the judge, so selected and elected, may quash the indictment and turn the culprit loose without further ado, brushing aside with a wave of his hand what nineteen citizens have found sufficient to hold the accused to a formal trial of the issues of fact.

Furthermore, this legislature, from which so much was expected, refused to prohibit the farcical and justice-delaying device of trying the grand jurors instead of the accused, a proceeding which has consumed weeks of time and thousands of dollars of public money with no other result than to weary the public of attempting to have justice established at all.

Finally, these same unwholesome "performing" influences have refused either to make the nominations of judges by non-partisan methods or even to have their names appear upon the ballots in non-partisan columns. The upon the ballots in non-partisan columns perpetuate only purpose for this refusal was to withhold the power of the "performers" virtually to select as many candidates for judicial honors as their convenience, and that of their law-breaking friends, may require. Unless the people are fully alive to what is going on the "performers" will "work" the direct primaries as certainly as they did the conventions.

Here is a chapter of infamy that counterbalances whatever of good that legislature may have accomplished. It was a Jekyll-Hyde legislature. It was like one who plays the part of a philanthropist by day and of a burglar, hold-up man and assassin by night.

For, if we have not justice we have nothing. If the poor and the rich have not justice meted out for them, and to them, impartially and speedily, we have no civilization. For more than two years as brave and as well-advised a fight as was ever made for the establishment of justice has been made here in San Francisco, a fight to convict men whose guilt was so palpable that they have not had the hardihood to deny it, and yet not one of the big ones has found his way to prison to serve his sentence. Instead of aiding in this work, instead of making it easier to establish justice, the legislature has done its best to thwart justice and make its establishment impossible. Henceforth there should be no issue before this people except that of making the establishment of justice easy, speedy, cheap and as effective against the predatory millionaire as the anti-social man.

IF DREW HAD BEEN "GOOD."

When Assemblyman A. M. Drew returns to his Fresno home, and proceeds to give an account of his stewardship, what will be his people say? He will say to them, "I put up a good fight. I stood for what was right, clean, reputable and I was not afraid, but I lost a slice off Fresno county, the United States government was too much for me on my alien land bill, and the 'organization' hit me and my measures as often and as hard as it could. I cannot point to a great deed of mine, except some of the hardest work of my life. Fellow citizens, it is for you to judge whether I have done well or not."

How will his fellow citizens judge? There will be those who will say, "What a fool Drew was that he did not 'be good,' stand in with the governor and the machine of which the governor is a part, 'take program,' avoid offending the powers that be and so fetch something home with him to point to when asked 'What has he done?'" There will be others who will say: "We admire him for his courage. We honor him for the enemies he has made. We care less for the integrity of Fresno's territory than for the integrity of Fresno's public men. We would not have had him do otherwise." Which of these will be in ascendancy?

In measuring A. M. Drew the people of Fresno county will measure themselves. They will proclaim their legislative standards of morality, just as they did last year when they neglected, or refused, to return to the legislature another stanch and true man, Wm. F. Chandler, a man able and willing to "stand up," and sent in his place a political nonentity.

Mr. Drew's case is here cited merely as exemplifying a type of legislator without whom no good thing would ever come out of Sacramento. There were others. In the Senate there were Boynton, Birdsall, Black, Cullen, and in the Assembly Callan, Cogswell, Otis, Young—all types of legislators who stood true through good report and ill. Will their constituents be satisfied to have them come home, empty handed, it may be, but with heads erect, eyes unashamed, honest untarnished? Or would they have preferred to see them come home laden with the spoils of the "performer," but wearing the collar of subservience, tarnished with the stain and redolent of the tainted road axlegrease? These are questions which the constituencies must decide for themselves and according to their decision so will their government be.

Low standards of legislative requirement at home will result in low standards of legislative conduct at the state capital. Interests which are ever fighting for special privileges and immunities will know the capitalized value of being able to help their friends and "do up" their enemies. That is the stock in trade of the "performers" and, according to their philosophy, a legislator who does not surrender his manhood into the hands of some interest, and accept in return such gratuity as a such interest feels disposed to bestow, is a legislative fool and a dangerous man to be entrusted with legislative power.

For, be it understood, the Herrin political machine is a survival of feudalism. To the machine is given service, and to his retainer, overlord is given a share of the plunder that can be filched from the public treasury. The people of California must face the issue of legislative standards of morality and they should do it now that their legislators are coming home.

If all railroads take to Mr. Harriman's idea of running motor cars over their lines between trains, what will be the effect upon inter-urban trolleys running parallel? The part which gasoline and denatured alcohol are to play in quick, short, passenger runs can hardly be overestimated.

Significant News of the ::: Week :::

The Servian Situation.

Nothing has taken place during the week to make the future clear regarding the Balkan difficulties. Austria has been crowding strong forces to the frontier within striking distance of Belgrade and Servia is arming as best it may. It looks as though the rest of Europe felt inclined to leave Servia to its fate, the more certainly because the assassination of Alexander and his queen, some years ago, convinced Europe that Servia was unfit to be an independent state. If a spark be struck an explosion will follow and all will be over in a few weeks, with Serbia off the map and the panslavic empire a dream that did not come true.

Willie Whitley Found.

On March 18th Willie Whitley, the eight-year-old son of Attorney James P. Whitley, of Sharon, Pa., was kidnapped and carried away in a buggy. A ransom of $10,000 was demanded as the price of his life and return. The money was paid, the lad placed on a street car in Cleveland at night and returned to his father. His story and other clues led to the arrest of James Boyle, and other clues led to the arrest of Boyle's wife and a Mrs. Diemar. The money was found on the person of Boyle's wife and Mrs. Diemar committed suicide by taking morphine almost immediately after arrest. The governor of Pennsylvania offered $15,000 for the arrest and conviction of the kidnapers. This case is important because it touches the heart of every home and of wealth, or even moderate wealth, would be in danger. In every such instance every citizen should feel it his duty to be a detective and to watch for every clue. If all citizens were to feel this way publicity and public watchfulness would make it almost impossible to keep a child hidden. We are all members one of another, or should be, in every such instance.

The New Tariff Bill.

On Friday of last week the new tariff bill which the ways and means committee of the old congress had spent several months in drafting was reported and read to the committee of the whole House of Representatives. Its discussion in that body was opened by Chairman Payne on Monday. While the schedules average lower than the Dingley law the bill is highly protective. Immediately after the contents of the bill became public the big infant industries began to cry for the bottle upon which they have waxed so fat. There is no House will strive to make a show of fairness to the country and put up a bluff at redemption of Republican party pledges, but the battle will be fought in the Senate. The citadel of the "interests," where Aldrich & Co. have gone into executive session on the measure, the Wilson bill will be repeated in the history of the people and the interests, are to measure swords.

Roosevelt Embarked For Africa.

Former President Roosevelt embarked for Africa Tuesday morning, as planned many months ago. The crush at the pier was something tremendous. Strong as he is, he would have been hugged to death by the pressure of the crowd had it not been for a detachment of burly policemen who pinned their shoulders to reach the gangplank, though hatless and crumpled. No other American was ever given so hearty a bon voyage. Nothing reliable will come from him while his journey that does not come from himself. The expedition is scientific and not for the slaughter of game.

Harriman's Big Four.

It has been said, and the statement is inherently probable, that E. H. Harriman has chosen four Californians to carry the major part of his burden while he directs them how to do it. These men are William F. Herrin, Julius Kruttschnitt, J. C. Stubbs and William Hood. Each as head of his department will conduct his part of the work and the four, long that association with wonted harmony. They are big men. Mr. Hood has not so much come in contact with the public as the other three, but he is presumably not mellow. The other three are as remorseless as so many arctic blizzards. They will serve their employer's interests and no others. They will carry the public like a surgeon, except that they will not do it in the public interest. This news is important to the whole continent, not half of it.

The Liquor Issue In Wisconsin.

Wisconsin is one of the most progressive states in the union. LaFollette made it so. He stirred things up and kept them stirred with to keep the lump leavening even when LaFollette isn't there. Wisconsin has local option in cities and towns and a light is out to be accomplished at the present session of the legislature. However, the spring elections will see "wet" and "dry" contests in over 200 will go dry. More than half the counties will go dry at the first election if they had a chance where, the fight is against the saloon rather against every good movement in public affairs and has to be whipped before any forward step can be taken. This makes many who love liquor hate the saloon.

Consternation In Britain.

The British government has made the startling discovery that by 1912, Germany will have nearly as many fighting Dreadnaughts in commission as Britain. By the end of that year Germany will have completed it, the tenth, and have to be the best of the best. The significance of this will be the best of the best. The best naval opinion is that vessels of the ships of any other class as far superior to warships in any number at distances of the Dreadnaught's own choosing. If this be true they did not exist. They would be no more grizzly bear. This discovery has set upon a big for the Asquith ministry and the demand of British opinion is for more Dreadnaughts at whatever cost at the earliest date at which they can be built. If these can be had under the present ministry, well and good. If not, the ministry is likely to go by the board any day in the week. Was it because of this information that Roosevelt, as President, wanted four Dreadnaughts instead of two?

A Long Trial In Sight.

Months was made some weeks ago of the importance to the United States, Great Britain and Canada of having reached an agreement to terminate the Northeastern Fisheries dispute determined by the Hague court. The made several administration closed progress was senior counsel for the trial. The Elder of Boston, assisted by Chandler P. Anderson of New York. It is expected that the case will occupy the attention of the court for a year and a half. Judge George Gray of Delaware sits on the bench, as will Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, justice of the Supreme European commissioners also on the bench, and it will probably be up to them to decide the issues.

The Chapman-Alexander Meetings.

The best Christian thought of the past decade has been unfavorable to revival service of the Moody and Sankey type and yet Doctor Chapman and his associates have started a Boston wave of religious enthusiasm, emotion or feeling whatever the individual man to sweep across the continent from ocean to ocean. Human nature has not much changed since Moody and Sankey and a good churching up of the religious sensibilities of the American people now and again cannot be wholly unwholesome.

The Deeper Significance ::: of Living :::

Somewhere in this universe, sometime before exactly now and eternity, we shall all be judged for exactly what we are, and what we are to become will mainly depend upon the moral standards we set up for the ordering of our lives for, "As a man thinketh so is he."

A venemian on his voirdire examination in the Calhoun case is reported to have said: "He had to do it in order to get what he wanted and I would not convict him for it." Without other reference to the graft cases let us see where this standard of morality fetches us. It has the merit of being perfectly intelligible, instantly applicable and not at all uncommon.

Many hundreds, even thousands, of years ago there came into being a code of ten laws governing human conduct. No matter where they came from or how they came. It is sufficient to say that they have been accepted by the civilized world as immutable. Let us test some of these by the moral standard this venemian set up and see where it brings us to it to get what you want, but if you want property, and some one stands between you and an inheritance, then you may kill.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery," unless you find it necessary to do so in order that your desires may be sated, then you may commit adultery.

"Thou shalt not steal," or trick your neighbor out of his property or take it by force, unless you have to do it in order to get what you want, but in that case you may steal, and rob and take by force, chicane, deceit, or any other way needful for possessing the thing you want.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," unless it be needful in order to get what you want, but in that case you may commit perjury, suborn and hire others to swear falsely that you may strip your neighbor of his possessions and add them to your own and, in doing this, you may avail yourself of the cunning of attorneys who also shall do what they want—your money.

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, his wife, his servants, his property or anything that he has," unless you really want his house, his wife, his servants or his property, in which event you may covet any or all of them. You may break up his home, drive him to despair, dishonor his family, wreck your will upon him to the full—if you have to to get what you want.

"Thou shalt have no other gods before me, nor make an image in thy heart before which to bow down yourself," unless you have to in order to get what you want, in which case you are permitted, by the standard of moralists and luxury, your god and carry in your heart the image of Baecus, bowing yourself down to him, and no one shall say you may your law.

Where did this man get his concept of his unbridled wants suffering for his moral law? He is not the only one who has it. A short time since a great Napoleon of railroading, in speaking of his servants for workingmen, declared that they are entitled to all they can get, as his corporation is entitled to all it can make, which is only another way of saying that one's want—if he can get it—how he can. Many have that standard. It is being shamelessly advocated in certain quarters in San Francisco now. No religion on earth has it, nor any philosophy, a science does not teach it. Is it a moral law from the cave of the bear, the den of the wolf, the lair of the tiger? God pity the soul that seeks to square itself by that standard on Day of Judgment!

Opium has the quality of making its slaves unable to distinguish right from wrong, reduces them to moral idiocy. Is that a moral chargeable with the confusion of mind regarding the iniquity of graft?

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Unfortunate for the Indian.

Commissioner Francis E. Leupp is soon to retire from the head of the United States Indian Commission at the new request, and by reason of ill health, although President Taft has asked him to hold on for the present in order that he may find an equally good man to take his place. This will not be an easy task. Commissioner Leupp early made the discovery that the Indian is a human being, that he is capable of sustaining himself if led, not driven, to the desired good, but that he has little imitation, must feel his own way along paths made easy for him, and that he can, and must, be as responsible for his own conduct before the law as white men are held to be. The American Indian will soon have to stink or swim with the rest of us, and the sooner the better for the Indian—and the rest of us.

A Purchase Price of Peace.

A movement is on foot to establish permanent peace in the Reelfoot lake district of Tennessee, where the night-riders committed so many atrocities, by having the state buy the lake and its immediate surroundings to be kept as a fish and game preserve. The night-riders express a willingness to pay for the privilege of hunting and fishing if they must, but imprisoning, and even hanging, are powerless to keep them within the law when the duck season is on and the bass are willing to bite. Their war cry is, "hunt, fish or fight," and peace at the price may be cheap enough to warrant the expenditure.

The Cost of Tuberculosis.

Those who are able to appreciate no form of value not represented by the dollar sign will find of interest some estimates lately made by Prof. James W. Glover, of the University of Michigan. He rates every normal person between the ages of twenty and sixty as having a value to the community, over and above his own cost of keep, of $100 per year. Judged by this standard of value Chicago loses, through tuberculosis, $21,963,019 per year, the state of Illinois $49,402,704 and the entire United States $671,018,025. Backed by these figures the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute is having a precinct by precinct lecture campaign carried on in all parts of Chicago in the interest of voting an assessment of one mill on each $100 of taxable property to be used for the establishment of hospitals for the treatment of this disease. This is made possible by the Glackin law lately enacted by the legislature of Illinois empowering cities to vote such a tax for this purpose. There is money in it as well as life, health and happiness. Other states well might copy.

The Commercial Tone Good.

The New York Sun has been making a canvass of business conditions throughout the entire nation and the result is that a uniformly good tone has responded. There are industries that are going slowly until the tariff law shall have been worked out, and cities with 100,000 population that have laid out enough suburbs and additions to accommodate a population of a million are finding themselves in the excess of town lots, but sales of real estate to cover normal growth are being made at good prices and in good number. There are few debts that have not been liquidated. The banks are sound. The whole country is in good health and only waiting for Congress to fix the tariff schedule and go home in order to start all the wheels of legitimate industry humming.

A School For Mothers.

England loses 120,000 infants a year during the first year of infant life and two-thirds of these losses are caused through ignorance of simple hygiene. In Ghent seven years ago a school for mothers was established with such success in saving the lives of little people that London is taking up the work. Many schools have been established in the congested parts of that city and there is discussion now about making these schools a part of the public school system. So far mothers have paid a trifling tuition into the voluntary day care center. The most common difficulties have been bronchitis and irregular and unwholesome feeding. Some day every civilized city will be ashamed to be without such schools.

Inter-Colonial Difficulties.

No government has been more energetic, courageous or more willing to carry the burdens of railroad construction than Canada. Vast subsidies have been granted, great bond issues have been guaranteed and the Inter-colonial railroad has been taken over and is being operated by the government. An insight into the tendencies following government ownership of railroads is afforded by the predicament of this road. When the hard times came, and they came to Canada as well as the United States, other roads discharged men right and left or cut wages and increased freights. This road did nothing of the kind. It kept all its men, paid the wages it had been paying, continued to carry freight at a lower rate than any other road in Canada drew on its capital to help out the deficiencies and still comes out at the end of the year with nearly half a million dollars deficiency for the general tax-payer to make up. The total deficiencies since the road was taken up nearly reach $9,000,000 and the total investment $100,000,000. One word explains the whole difficulty: "Politics," which is not, and seemingly can not be made, business.

Local Option in Pennsylvania.

Some time ago local option was beaten in the Pennsylvania legislature by a vote of 2 to 1 after what was thought to have been a brilliant and successful Anti-Saloon League campaign. The friends of the movement have since been looking to find what it was that hit 'em. Investigation has shown that it was the result of their clerical leader trying to "do politics" a la Penrose. Of course he was beaten to a frazzle by the "organization." In Pennsylvania, as in California, every evil influence throws its weight in with the "organization" and the only hope for any decent thing is to ally itself with the element that is fighting the "organization" as the common enemy. Instead of doing this the Anti-Saloon League fought only for local option and not against Penrose, although every element in the liquor interests was fighting for Penrose and against local option. Until reformers learn that they must fight the associated villainies without either asking or giving quarter, and by making open and frank appeal to the conscience and common sense of the citizenry, they are certain to suffer the evil fortunes that local option suffered in Pennsylvania as well as in California.

A Campaign for Boys.

Beginning April 21st, and ending May 2nd, almost the entire eastern half of Massachusetts will give its attention to the problem of boy delinquency, incorrigibility and inefficiency for the duties of life. Meetings will be held in every town and hamlet, the best prepared persons obtainable will address them and a most determined effort will be made to find where the trouble is that the remedy may be applied. Lack of a sustained public interest is confessedly at the bottom of the trouble and it is hoped that a campaign for boys may remove at least this one cause for boyhood going wrong. The characters of boys are not of less importance than the souls of men.

Prearranged but Postponed.

The most significant fact in connection with Japan's conduct of the war with Russia was that every detail had been prearranged, planned far ahead. Under the Sayonji ministry elaborate plans had been made for strengthening the army and enlarging the navy but the tax-ridden public rebelled, the Sayonji ministry was turned out of office and Katsura made premier. He has cut the national budget $178,500,000, and has postponed or spread out over eleven years, the carrying out of plans prearranged by the Sayonji ministry. The cut in the army and navy budget for the current year amounts to $15,000,000. It is assumed that eleven years will be as soon as Russia will desire to renew the argument suspended at Portsmouth.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE LITERARY AND ART COLONY AT CARMEL

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

When you leave the train at Monterey, only a few feet from the water's edge, and within a stone's throw of the fishing boats at anchor in the bay, you take a stage. A few turns through the quaint twisting streets of the old mission town, and the horses settle to a steady pull up the first stretch of Seventeen-Mile Drive, past green fields and shaggy oaks. Half way up, you turn in your seat, and the blue bay of Monterey stretches magnificently below you. Another turn, and that view is its way over the ridge and down to the Pine Inn. Alighting here and walking down the village street a few blocks, behold, a marvel! An exquisite little half moon of turquoise bay, between two points of rock that reach out to the Pacific, one of them wooded with pines to the water's edge, the other rising black and sheer in sculptured beauty. At your feet a smooth stretch of beach, with Tennyson's "tender, curving lines of creamy spray." To the right, rising from the beach, the sombre pines beyond, the whist of sand dunes. To the left, massed in blue ascending peaks, the Santa Lucia range of mountains. Turn, and behind you, a forest of pines and oaks.

This is Carmel-by-the-Sea, such a spot as Keats never saw but such as thrilled his fancy when he wrote:

"Round many western islands have I been Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold."

and
"Then felt I like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes

He stared at the Pacific, and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise,

Silent, upon a peak in Darien."

Here is the wonder of the sea in rare combination with the beauties of the land—of forests and mountains—an altogether lovely and inspiring scene.

And a kindred sense of beauty has called here a group of artists, poets, and authors to find peace from the turmoil of the world in this quiet spot and to draw inspiration from its diverse, compact beauties.

"Jimmy" Hopper's Home.

"Jimmy" Hopper is one of the literary discoverers of Carmel. He calls it home, lives there as much of the time as he can, does most of his writing there, and, when he is away from it, is the apostle and evangelist of the gospel that Carmel is perfection for a literary worker. Here he and Fred R. Becholdt wrote "9009," the grim story of an convict's struggle to regain his position in the social and economic world. This story is said to be based upon the experience of a real ex-convict who lived with Hopper and Becholdt while they were writing it. Since its serial publication in "The Saturday Evening Post," "9009" has been published in book form, and the authors are preparing to write another novel in collaboration.

Hopper's work is highly regarded in New York, where he is now making a business visit. His first eastern success came quickly after his return from Manila five years ago, when he began writing a series of powerful stories, a life in the Philippines for McClure's magazine, a series which he rounded out by the publication, in 1906, of a complete novel from the same inspiration, called "Cayiban." The promise of his early powers is high; for he is only thirty-two years old. In fact, it seems scarcely any time since he was "lamed in California as 'that little whirlwind end' of the fornia as 'that little whirlwind end' of the University of California eleven. Most people do not know that he is a native of Paris, France; and that he was eleven years old before he came to America.

Mary Austin's "Wickup."

Mrs. Mary Austin, the novelist and poet, is the other most Carmelite of the colony. She, too, calls Carmel home, though just now she is touring England on her way home from Paris. She lives in a rugged little gorge in a secluded bit of the forest, and she does her writing in "the wickup," as she has named a little shelter that is built aloft in the branches of three neighboring trees. In this picturesque cote she has done much of her best work. From it and its wild surroundings is a far sweep to classic Boston where her books are published, but the fancies grown in the Farthest West must appeal to staid New England, for the same publishers (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) have brought out each of her novels as they have developed here. "The Land of Little Rain," "The Basket Woman," "Isidro," and "The Flock" have followed rapidly on one another's heels, besides short stories and verse.

Grant Wallace and Michael Williams.

Two other authors are now at Carmel who will probably become permanent residents: Grant Wallace and Michael Williams. Their workshop is a tiny house of two rooms, set in the bald sand of the beach within a hundred feet of the surf. They are working on several plans together—the most urgent at present being a study of the hardy wood varieties of the eucalyptus, which, they believe, is destined to make California the center of the hardwood industry of America and to relieve the hardwood famine which threatens to be complete within fifteen years. They have also prospects of success for a plan they have been urging to found a museum that shall contain relics of the historical, literary, and artistic associations that abound in Monterey county. Their separate vocations are as interesting.

Mr. Wallace is, besides being an author, an artist, a famous war correspondent of the Japanese-Russian war, and a naturalist. His plans include extensive experiments in the propagation of new species of plants by artificial selection, somewhat after the manner of Luther Burbank's work. A small garden for this purpose is already planted at Carmel, and will be extended. He is also writing a series of articles on the results of a year spent with the Navajo Indians in the ruins of the cliff dwellings in Arizona.

Michael Williams here wrote, with Upton Sinclair, a book dealing with modern hygienic reforms which has just been published. He has spent a good deal of time here since the fire in San Francisco, when he was city editor of The Examiner.

"The MacGowan Cooke's."

He and Hopper are mainly responsible for the addition to the Carmel colony of Mrs. Grace MacGowan Cooke and her sister, Miss Alice MacGowan. These two authors were inmates of Helicon Hall, in Englewood, N. J. Upton Sinclair's ill-fated communal settlement, and there heard from Williams an Hopper of the wonders of Carmel. When Helicon Hall burned, Mrs. Cooke and Miss MacGowan were badly injured, and after a long stay in a hospital, came to the coast to recuperate. They have found Carmel a great restorative, and have been able to complete many short stories and a novel while there. Mrs. Cooke's

"The Power and the Glory," a story of cotton mill life, will begin serial publication in the Delicater next month, and Miss MacGowan is following up the popular success of her "Judith of the Cumberland," a story of the same mountain region. "Color Line Studies," a collaborative work, named by both, will soon be published serially by Everybody's.

The Poet Sterling.

George Sterling is another loyal Carmelite. His bungalow is built at the edge of a dense oak thicket, on the brow of a hill that commands a beautiful view up the valley of the Carmel river, and nearer than any other cottage, to, though not in sight of, the famous, old Carmel Mission, founded by Father Junipero Serra in 1770 and now containing his grave. Sterling's recently published book of poems, "A Wine of Wizardry," has led many critics to place him amongst the foremost contemporary American poets.

Carmel seems everywhere ideally the resort of artists, with its wonderful variety of beauty, and many disciples of the brush have made it a home.

The Homes of Artists.

Chris Jorgensen, the famous painter of Yosemite scenes, is just completing a winter home here, to cost $14,000 when done, that is, perhaps, the most elaborate residence in Carmel. He spends the six summer months in Yosemite, and the rest of the year here, and his substantial evidence of faith in Carmel's desirability will no doubt lead other artists to follow his example.

The late Sydney J. Yard, before his tragically sudden death in January, had just completed a beautiful home and studio at Carmel, which still house many of his paintings. He was considered by many competent critics as the best western water-color artist, and one of the best in America. He left many studies of sea and dunes and groves painted from nature at Carmel that reflect with remarkable fidelity of drawing and color the beauties of the place. An exhibition of his works at Vickery, Atkins & Torrey's galleries in San Francisco a few weeks ago attracted a greatly appreciative throng.

Visiting and Resident Painters.

Miss Josephine Culbertson and Miss Ida Johnston, of New York and Philadelphia, have prolonged a visit of a few months to more than a year, and will probably stay much longer. They are doing some beautiful work in decorated ceramics. Miss Culbertson is, besides, a painter of landscape in water-color, and Miss Johnston is well known for her paintings of daily life in Sunset.

Charles Harmon, the San Jose artist, Miss de Neale Morgan, Miss Isabelle Hunter, Miss Marie Froelich, Mrs. Bergdorff, and Richard Partington all expect to paint at Carmel this summer. Mrs. John Short, of Fresno, also has a home and studio here and is rapidly gaining recognition as a water colorist. A. H. Vachel, the painter in oils, is a Carmel enthusiast.

Other people of note have found their ideal of seaside life at Carmel. Greer Harrison, former athlete and former president of the Olympic Club of San Francisco, makes his home here the year round. President David Starr Jordan, of Stanford University, has a home and studio here, and nearby Professors Vernon L. Kellogg, J. M. Stillman, Guido Mars, and George Peirce, of Stanford, and Professor Lange, of the University of California, each has a cottage.

Altogether, Carmel is a most inviting place. Besides these people, whose presence lends it distinction as a resort of the artistic and intellectual elect, it has many beautiful summer homes of people who also love it for its slight isolation from the world, for its mellow climate, its varied beauties, and its

SELF GOVERNMENT AT ALAMEDA

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

(The problem of self-government in America has got to be worked out in our municipalities. The town meetings, with the kind of Democracy that they represent, will not become our common schools of free government, because it is there that people come together in multitudes, immediately concerned for interests common to them all. We may liken state governments to high schools of democracy and national governments to the university. It is therefore the purpose of The California Weekly, from time to time, to analyze and make clear the conditions and tendencies of municipal government in California in the hope that each may learn from the other.)

"Alameda is a bedroom for San Francisco business men," is a familiar definition of that city. And in political affairs, its citizens have, appropriately enough, long been asleep. Indifference toward the problems of municipal government has been the curse of Alameda, and has permitted it to drift more and more completely into the power of "practical politicians" who do a great deal there besides sleep.

Alameda is as solidly Republican as the state of Maine. Any political divergence in Alameda politics is, therefore, a factional fight in the Republican ranks. Two years ago the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made a desperate fight to free the city from the existing political control, which is of the most consistent "organization" stripe. That fight was unsuccessful.

The politics of Alameda have for years been mainly directed by Dr. Charles L. Tisdale, coroner of Alameda county, and J. B. Lanktree, a warrant shaver whose office is across the street from the county courthouse in Oakland. Doctor Tisdale has been for many years the chairman of the Republican County Committee. His salary and fees, as county coroner and as medical examiner for various municipal, county, and state boards (estimated at one time to amount to the holding of sixteen public offices at once) are generally estimated by people on the inside to amount to $25,000 a year. He has also rich patronage to bestow in the numerous deputy coronerships at his disposal.

Doctor Tisdale came into the unfavorable regard of many of Alameda's best citizens years ago, when, as school trustee, he was publicly accused by Brainerd C. Brown of making the teachers' positions directly dependent upon their subservience to him, and of being the boss of the board. Doctor Tisdale threatened (by telephone) to thrash Mr. Brown and to sue him, if he acknowledged being author of the charges, and though Mr. Brown in return published the charges the next day, and though Doctor Tisdale is considerably the larger man, and though Doctor Tisdale was advised by the district attorney that he could sue, he neither thrashed nor sued.

J. B. Lanktree shaves a goodly share of the county warrants, writes insurance on public buildings, and is appointed appraiser of a surprisingly large proportion of the estates probated in Alameda county.

These two men, together with T. G. Daniels, of the Alameda Argus, have for years been delegates to the Republican conventions, county and state. It is not of record that the Alameda delegation to a Republican convention has ever trained with any reform movement, or displayed any aggressive desire to break away from the routine program put up by the most conservative element.

The Argus has supported machine rule consistently. It did not publish nor refer to President Roosevelt's letter commending the graft prosecution in San Francisco, when that letter was the most sensational news feature of its day. The only other Alameda paper is the Times-Star. Its editor, one McDowell, was formerly the manager of the Argus. Its policy is practically the same as that of the Argus.

Just now the big political fight in Alameda is over the election, April 12th, of a mayor and four councilmen. The candidate for mayor who has the support of the Argus and the Times-Star is W. H. Noy, for two years councilman. He is a butcher, and is not a great force in public affairs. His opponent is Joseph F. Forderer, founder of the Forderer Cornice Works in San Francisco, a director of the Alameda National Bank, and for sixteen years a city trustee, and twelve years president of the board of trustees. (Alameda adopted a new charter two years ago, creating the office of mayor. Under the old charter the president of the board of trustees was de facto mayor.) Both Noy and Forderer are Republicans. (The new charter provides for nominations by petition only.) Forderer is being fought by Doctor Tisdale and J. B. Lanktree. Forderer is supported by the Civic League, which is composed of the best type of citizens in Alameda. Noy is supported by E. R. Anthony, the president of the Alameda Republican club, who is an official of the Southern Pacific company. Forderer is supported by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

There is considerable evidence, furthermore, that the machine is using the Alameda fight as a means of breaking up the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement in Alameda county. The Oakland Tribune, the notorious "organization" paper, has come out for Noy, which brings the county-wide influence of the machine to bear on the local fight. If Alameda can be sewed up tight for the organization, the machine reduces the territory from which it mustoust the Lincoln-Rooseveltlers by that considerable amount.

The issues of the campaign that appear on the surface are trivial. The real issues are: the relative records of Noy and Forderer; the character of government to be expected from these two men, judged by the character of their supporters; and the issue of the maintenance in control of the Republican party in Alameda of Doctor Tisdale, J. B. Lanktree, and T. G. Daniels, who, in the minds of the best citizens, at least, typify the machine control of politics. Those who are supporting Forderer most vehemently believe that through him they are fighting for release from a system by which taxes have risen to an exorbitant figure and by which the state machine of the Republican party hopes to continue to be able to distribute patronage and to receive, in return, a solid vote for machine candidates for state assemblymen, state senators, and congressmen.

Hauptmann's latest drama, issued this month, is called "Griselde."

Clyde Fitch's newest, and fifty-first, play is called "Bachelors." The heroine of the piece is supposed to be the daughter of a San Francisco judge whose property was destroyed in the earthquake.

Richard Strauss, the composer, now has an income estimated at $60,000 a year. The habits of an early life of stress still show, however, as many stories of recent examples of his parsimony are being told in Europe.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Love Must Give as Love Must Take.

If love were what the poets claim, an ecstasy of kisses,
With only Cupid in the game, his only trophies
blisses;
If love were what the lassies dream, a roseleaf dipped in honey,
And served with lots of sugared cream in blissful matrimony;
If love were what our hearts suggest when to our side she nestles, Ambrosia fit for any test and mixed by heaven's pestles,
Why, then 'twould be an easy thing, and, faith,
'twould be a hies o' time,
To take your darling 'neath your wing and hold her e'er your best one.
But love must bear for sweet love's sake
And be impatient never.
And love must give as love must take,
And so it runs forever.

You courted Mary long ago, and pleasant things you told her;
You mentioned then her blushes' glow, and offered to enfold her.
You said her form, as like as not, would be a Juno's glory;
Perhaps the fact you've since forgot—but that's another story.
And you were wedded (twas a plan you thought was superhuman);
It turned out you were but a man, and she was but a woman,
And so you went your stumbling ways—What matter, and what matter?
If love attended all your days, your worries had to scatter.
For love that bears for sweet love's sake
Through trial and endeavor,
The love that gives, as it must take,
Its blessing lives forever.

But—

We would have done the thing which we knew should be done, but—
There was the unfortunate chap whom, with little difficulty, we might have helped, but—
There was the kind word which it wouldn't have cost us a cent to speak, but—There was the gladness which we might have placed in somebody's heart, but—
There were the woman and the little ones at home with whom we might have left a ray of sunshine as we departed, but—
There was the duty which insisted (though we tried not to hear it) that it needed attention, but—

There was the opportunity to look higher and climb higher, but—
Ah, friends, friends, it is a little word, three letters spell it completely, but—
What a big place it does take in our lives, and what snare and pitfall it is unto our feet!
How many of our failures are written with a
"but" preceding them, and over how many graves of our hopes does it stand as a shameful monument! We mean so well, but—
For my part I feel that it would be well absolutely to exclude the word from my dictionary, only—that is, but—

The Best of All.

It is well to stand on a mountain height,
Where the footsteps of angels fall,
Where day's first banners are spread in light
And summits to summit call;
But to stand far down in the vale below,
Where these, my brothers, walk to and fro,
To gladden a heart, or to soothe a woe—
Ah, this is the best of all.

An Evident Advantage.

"This is a time when a man who has been in the habit of watching women's feet has a decided advantage."
"How so?"
"Why, he can tell who a woman is even when she is wearing her latest-style spring hat."

The Opinions of Rufus.

If you buy a man so you kin make a hundred dollars, that's bribery. If you buy him so you kin make a million, that's bein' held up. When you git these ideers down fine,
Silas, probly you kin practice law.

It's best allers to tell the truth, but you want to be prepared to take somethin' fer that lonesome feelin'.

You can't allers tell. The man that treats you most corjully may be your best friend, an', then again, he may be a book agent.

When a woman's so extry good that her husband can't smoke a home, I've noticed that the old man genly 'bout keeps up the moral av'rage in the family.

Ef I sh'd throw my watch on the pavement an' smash it so I never could put it together again I s'pose I'd prove I had the qualification fer a great critic, but 'pears ter me the watchmaker, even ef he makes mistakes sometimes,
is in a better line o' business.

The most hopeful thing I know 'bout some children is that they don't seem to be much like their pas an' mas.

No that the new spring styles in winnens' hats has come in I understand they is hull families that is mournin' fer their butter-bowls.

You kin hunt up ancestors, but they can't hunt you up nor know what you are. That's the advantage ancestors have in connection with some people that are mighty proud of their lineage. They're dead an' probly don't realize what they've come to.

Don't Scoff as Much as I Did.

When a young man sighs, "There is only one,
One girl in the whole world round,"
I think, "You chump, come off of the dump,
For sweeter each day are found."
And I pride myself on superior wit
And wisdom of finer strain.
And I say, "That this youth would improve a bit
If he'd follow my lead is plain."

But then I recall a maiden I knew
Who added me under my lid
And made me a chump of a size for two—
And I don't scoff as much as I did.

When Willie opines that clothes make the man,
Then dresses the part of a fool,
I smile at his folly, as wisecracks can,
And wish he were taught in my school.
He turns up his trousers (in London they do)
Converses in lah-de-dah style,
And I say, "He has folly to handicap two,"
And so at that folly I smile.

But sometimes my Polly a picture exhumes,
Of me in the days that are hid,
Myself as an ass that no wisdom illumines—
And I don't scoff as much as I did.

When Tommy gets out on the roseate way,
And rises next morn with a head,
"The price of your folly is what you must pay,"
Is a thing that I often have said.
I am really superior to Tommy, I feel,
And I look on his actions with scorn,
And pity is something I do not reveal
When his head is enlarged the next morn.

But then I recall, with a shudder or so,
Some times of which mention's forbid.
I still feel the conduct of Tommy is low—
But I don't scoff as much as I did.

"The Friend of Dumb Animals."

A good man passed from this life when George T. Angell heard and responded to the inevitable summons. All through his long life of eighty-six years he helped those who, in the presence of man, are all but helpless—the dumb brutes of the animal creation. Often seeing these lower servants and friends of man abused and maltreated, the great heart and soul of George T. Angell uttered its protest in behalf of those who could not protest for themselves. And he made that protest felt.

Everywhere societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals were organized, everywhere their work is in kindly evidence, and everywhere and every day some dumb sufferer finds an interpreter through them. All this was largely the result of the work of this one man.
Now "he has fought the fight, he has finished the faith," and if a crown is not laid up for him, it will be because the lower animals can not vote and there is no pitying one to heed them in heaven—which is unbelievable. A good man has gone home, and the world is better because he has lived.

By Such a Slender Thread.

We hold our loves by such a slender thread!
To-day one greets us on our homeward way;
To-morrow men shall whisper, "She is dead."
We find her not, wherever we may stray,
And o'er us hangs the pall that all men dread—
We hold our loves by such a slender thread!

Sometimes my love itself I can but fear.

I hold mine own, with tender murmurs low,
Fearful what time the summons I may hear.
"Nay, God," I cry, "I cannot let her go!
Oh, spectral Death, to stand our dear ones near—

Sometimes my love itself I can but fear.

'Tis hard to trust, and yet 'tis all I know.
'Blinded and dazed, astray 'mid shadows chill,
Yet let me cry, as stumbling on I go—
'Yea, though He slay me, I will trust Him still."
Oh, love of mine, the lurking shadows grow—
'Tis hard to trust, and yet 'tis all I know.

Scientific Legislation.

"This scientific legislation that the Senate and Assembly have been givin' us lately," said one man who had visited the legislature.
"There was Cullen's bill to prohibit corrupt lobbying. The Assembly defeated it. 'Pass such a bill?' says the noble legislators. 'Never!
Not on your life! Suppose that we passed it, how would we be reached?' How would we succeed in layin' away a gratifyin' nest-egg for our delughtful and beloved little families? Shut the corrupt lobbyists out? Well, scarcely!
How would we manage to be present when the dividend was declared if we did? Would we cut our own throats to please the holy? Not that anybody has noticed!" says they. So with a whoop and hurrah they voted to keep the corrupt lobbyists. 'Twas scientific legislation, I tell you.

"Was the Senate to be left behind when it came to that sort of a speed contest? It didn't feel that it would be right. Grove L. Johnson's bill for change of venue came up. 'Tis a neat bill, simply providing that if a criminal doesn't like a judge, fearing that he will deal out justice to him, he may have another. A fine bill, and there is not a criminal in the land who will not rise up and call Mr. Johnson blessed for it. 'Shall we pass it?' says the senators.
'We will,' says they, 'for we can't tell how soon we may need it. So the bill was passed, and a new hope springs to life in the breasts of criminals throughout the state."

"I am somewhat mortified," said the man,
"to admit that some of the legislators were not scientific and neither joined the Legislative Self-Protective Society nor voted with the protectors on these propositions, but they were the minority. Our statesmen still are scientific, and they don't propose to throw away any chances that work their way. So let's unite in shouting, Hoorary!"

But I couldn't seem to do it.

Nor Would It Work With You.

I said, "From my companions I'll Cut fools of every shape."
I tried it, but it didn't work—
Myself I couldn't 'scape.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Another week has passed, and nothing tangible has been gained in the effort to secure a jury for the trial of Patrick Calhoun. To be sure, one more man, Theodore Binner, an ornamental plasterer and decorator, has been selected subject to peremptory challenge, but in the end, this may, or may not, prove to be a gain. Three such possible jurors have thus far been chosen.

The record of veniremen drawn now exceeds that of the Ruef case, the number in the latter case having been about 1,500, while more than 1,600 already have been drawn in the Calhoun case, and "still there's more to follow." It is a safe speculation that more than 2,000 veniremen will be examined before a jury is secured, and of course the moral is that not more than, say, one man in 175 in San Francisco is mentally and morally adapted to decide on the evidence whether or not Patrick Calhoun is guilty of bribery, as charged in the indictment.

As indicating that, although justice forever is justice and law is law while it stands, there are trials and other trials, it may be profitable briefly to compare the progress of the second trial of Adolph S. Newburgh, charged with offering a bribe to a prospective juror in the Ruef case, with the record in the Calhoun case. It now has been about two and one-half months since the trial of Patrick Calhoun began, and, after mighty legal labors, six men have been sworn to try him. So much for that record.

The re-trial of Adolph S. Newburgh, who is not notably a higher-up, began last Monday, and by Wednesday evening nine jurors had been sworn to try the case. That is to say, in the Newburgh case 50 per cent. more was accomplished in three days than was accomplished in about sixty working days in the Calhoun case. The proportionate progress in the former case was thirty times as rapid as in the latter. The facts convey their own moral, and it is unnecessary to dwell on them.

In the trial of former supervisors of San Mateo county in Redwood City, before Judge Dooling, the week has been devoted to pre-sentation of the evidence, and it is probable that the decision of it will be turned over to the jury to-day.

REGARDING THE RECENT MUNICIPAL ELECTION IN OAKLAND. ITS SIGNIFICANCE.

The late municipal campaign in this city, which involved in a large degree the high principles of justice and righteousness, was fought out on the very low plane of expediency and material interest.

The question which has occupied the attention of Oakland's citizens for years is: "How shall we release from the grasp of the Southern Pacific Railroad the land on the waterfront belonging to us, which that corporation fraudulently took from us years ago and has since unjustly held by corrupting officials when that was possible, intimidating them when bribery failed, and, as a last resort, employing the machinery of the courts, and the law's delay, to perpetuate its hold on what it had unjustly appropriated of the city's property?"

To increase the sense of wrong inflicted upon the city by the railroad, it is generally believed that outside influences have induced our courts to favor this road to the prejudice of the city's claim.

Both parties in the election turned upon the above question as the main issue, the administration party asking for an amendment to the city's charter giving the council greater power to make further concessions to the railroad and the Citizens' League opposing the amendment and the policy they were intending to carry out.

The pregnant and educational fact is, that both parties treated the question involved from a purely material standpoint, regardless of right or wrong entirely. In effect the administration party said: "Give us the power to settle this matter and give the road what it wants and have peace and prosperity" and the city was loudly echoed throughout the city. The merchants took it up in the councils of trade and commerce. "Get these things out of the way," said they, "and trade will be better and profits increased." "Yes," said the landlords, "there will be a greater demand for stores, offices, and dwellings and rents will be higher, if not higher." "Whoop 'er up!" shouted the real estate men, both owners and brokers, "once those disturbing factors are eliminated factory sites will be in demand and lots will go off with a rush."

It was business, business, from top to bottom and the almighty dollar to be pocketed as the result of increased business and neither party presented any higher standard under which the contest was to be waged.

For pecuniary gain the wrongs inflicted upon the city by an arrogant, unscrupulous corporation were to be condoned, the corrupting influences it had exerted, and the noxious element it had introduced into the moral atmosphere which has nearly stifled in the minds of the community the normal sense of righteousness, were all to be ignored, and valuable franchises granted to it if it would perform a simple act of justice and relinquish to the city what it had wrongfully taken in the first place and for so many years retained by fraud and force.

Peace and prosperity at such a price are not for a moment worth the consideration of any man who realizes the dignity of American citizenship and the value of the rights and privileges it confers.

That was the shibboleth of the New England Tories when the war of the Revolution was likely to interfere with their trade in molasses and rum with the West Indies. It found a mouthpiece in the copperhead press and party in the war of the Rebellion, but found no echo in the hearts and lips of the men who pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor to the opposition of injustice when pressed upon them by a despotic king, no more ruthless and tyrannical in his acts or unscrupulous in his methods than is that corporation which, with almost ruthless power, dominated the executive, legislative, judicial and municipal officials of California.

Our nation was founded by men who, at the sacrifice of all material interests, refused submission to governmental injustice; its existence was perpetuated at an enormous cost of life and suffering in an active protest against the injustice of man to his fellow man by holding him in slavery, and if it is to realize the hope of the best there is in humanity our citizens must wake up to the idea that the right should be contended for because it is right, and wrong as strenuously opposed because it is wrong, and the putting of this principle into practice is the great need of the nation to-day.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

A Good Start, A Bad End The legislature which began so promisingly, and over which we all rejoiced as affording about the only proof we had had in recent years that we could have a good legislature once more, impaired its record in the last days of the session. It passed a number of very bad bills, of which the change of venue bill is one of the most notorious. It always happens that objectionable measures, which have been held back through lack of favor, find their best opportunity in the confusion and recklessness of the last two weeks of session, but it seems as if this time the number of such measures which went through is exceptional.

General Legislation For Private Snaps A second illustration of this sort of legislation was the bill subjecting the decisions of the San Francisco Police Commission and similar bodies to judicial review. In addition to these well-known examples, there were many others, less conspicuous but no less vicious in principle. Changes have been made in the general laws of the state to fit particular cases, and generally the interest behind the change has been a purely selfish one. A shining illustration of this kind of selfishness is the case of the superior judge who left his bench and went to Sacramento to lobby through a bill changing the law of adoption because thereby he secured an inheritance for his own wife.

The Governor Can Think It Over For the first time a governor is going to have thirty days, instead of ten, in which to sign bills after the legislature adjourns, and the people will have an opportunity to decide whether they did wisely in adopting this amendment to the constitution. The argument for it seemed strong, but there is a chance that in one way it may work badly. Every governor after signing up the bills which appear to him to be meritorious has on his hands a miscellaneous lot of legislative junk about which he is doubtful, and which being doubtful, ought to go into the scrap heap. Formerly there was a tremendous crush during the last days to get the Governor to approve worthless bills, but at the end of ten days it was over, and the governor who could hold out against pressure that long prevented much mischief by not signing bad bills. But now there is to be thirty days during which the pressure can be put on, and it will be a rare sort of governor who does not sign some bills against his better judgment because of the sheer persistence of legislative promoters and their ingenuity in working up schemes to bring pressure to bear.

A Boon To Miners A very emphatic eight-hour bill was passed by the legislature in the form of a measure to benefit miners and underground workers. It is a square prohibition of more than eight hours' work in this kind of employment except in cases of emergency to protect life or property.

Only the Truth Can Be Advertised A bill which, if approved by the governor, will raise any number of questions is one making it a misdemeanor knowingly to make through an advertisement "any statement or assertion of facts" with regard to the quality or value of goods offered for sale, "or the manner or source of purchase of such merchandise, or the possession of awards, prizes or distinctions, or the motive or purpose of a sale, intended to have the appearance of an advantageous offer, which is in fact untrue or calculated to mislead." To live up to the letter of this would call for about the most rigorous censorship ever placed on business advertising.

More Holidays Less Work Not satisfied with making a new holiday in the month of October, when the discovery of this country will be celebrated, the legislature has declared February 12th, Lincoln's birthday, also a legal holiday. A few more, and holidays in California will be as numerous as saints' days in southern Europe.

Just a Drop In the Bucket The idea that agriculture ought to be studied in the grammar and high schools, as formerly known (now, by virtue of constitutional amendment, elementary and secondary schools) has found expression in the passage of an act putting into the hands of the university two thousand dollars for this purpose. No part of the money is to be expended for salaries, and it is something of a curiosity to know just how the money is to be spent to produce results.

A Good Idea With Good Men Senator Walker's county board of forestry bill passed before the legislature adjourned. This bill puts in the power of any county board of supervisors to appoint a board of forestry to consist of five persons, and such board may employ a county forester; he is to receive a salary of not more than $150 per month, but the members of the board are to serve without pay. The board is given exclusive power in regard to the planting of trees, hedges and flowers along public highways, and also in regard to cutting and pruning trees.

What Will They Do With That Money? Hereafter the State Board of Prison Directors will have a fund to be used for feeding discharged prisoners. Eight thousand dollars has been appropriated for the purpose, and under the terms of the law the prison directors are not required to file vouchers or tell what they do with the money.

O Vanity! How Funny In former times the legislature waited until a governor went out of office before ordering his picture painted, but now the legislature has decided to change all that at the late session. An appropriation was made to paint the portrait of Governor Gillett; but that is not half of the story. The portrait of Lieutenant-Governor Porter, the performer, was also ordered, this being the first time an appropriation to honor a lieutenant-governor has been made. Nor did the honoring stop there, for portraits were ordered of Speaker Stanton and ex-Speaker Beardslee, and the appropriation was made perpetual, so that the portraits of all future speakers can be painted. At this rate, the capitol will presently be too small to hold the pictures of all the great men, and it will be necessary to build a state art gallery.

Some Jobs For Parsons Thoughtful of the spiritual needs of the inmates of the state hospitals, the legislature put through a bill to allow each hospital, and also the Home for Feeble-minded, to spend $100 per month in compensating clergymen for preaching to and visiting the patients.

Emballment Plumpers Two new branches of the government of the state, and we trust ornaments thereto, will soon be added if Governor Gillett approves the work of the legislature. One will be the State Board of Embalmers, whose duty will be to see that all persons who practice embalming are able to pass examinations in anatomy and kindred sciences. This is a modest sort of board, but the State Plumbing Board is to be a most comprehensive and far-reaching organization. It is not merely to examine and license plumbers; it is to boss the whole plumbing business in a really extraordinary way. It is to appoint a State Inspector of Plumbing, and few things are to escape the eagle eye of this official. He is to be the agent of the board in regulating the plumbing and sewerage of all state buildings, and he is to see that all cities and towns show proper respect for the State Plumbing Board by sending to it for approval all plumbing and sewerage regulations. To supplement the work of the State Board, the larger cities are all required to start branch plumbing boards, and all plumbing and sewerage plans for both public and private buildings are to be drawn in accordance with the decisions of such boards. In short, the government will be under will be largely government by and for the plumbers.

Organization Prestige Lost In Primary Fight The primary bill passed before the legislature adjourned.

Journal, as everyone foresaw it would, because everybody being pledged to this issue, nobody could afford to adjourn with it undisposed of. And it is a satisfactory bill, in the main. The long fight over the section relating to vote on United States Senator ended in a so-called compromise by which a State Senator or Assemblyman can choose whether he will be bound by the plurality vote in his district or by the decision reached in a majority of the districts if he chooses to be bound at all. The essential thing is that hereafter there is to be some expression of opinion by the voters on the subject of United States Senatorship, whereas there has been none before that counted for anything. The stubborn contest which was waged over it was essentially a fight for mastery between the old "organization" and the independents. In this fight the "organization," although it won a nominal victory, was in reality badly shaken up, and its prestige is gone.

State May Now Free Itself If now the people manifest the wisdom to use their new powers with discretion, the political emancipation of California can be completed in the next state campaign.

The choice of a United States Senator will be only a part of their duties; the larger task will be to nominate and elect a governor and other state officers, especially railroad commissioners and members of the board of equalization, who do not owe allegiance to a railroad machine, as well as to choose free congressmen, state senators and assemblymen. This great work should be commenced at once and carried on continuously for fifteen months.

The Incubus of Grove L. Johnson Among the reform measures which died before the legislature adjourned, were the bill to print the names of judicial candidates in a column by themselves on the ballot and the bill to abolish the party circle. The regular machine, assisted by that veteran and able guerrilla, Grove L. Johnson, accomplished their defeat. There was considerable talk during the session that Johnson was losing his influence, but he was uncommonly successful in antagonizing meritorious legislation and in promoting bad. The long continuance in the legislature of this adroit and malevolent man is one of the heaviest burdens carried by the state of California to-day.

SAN FRANCISCO

HETCH-HETCHY FOR THE WEALTH PRODUCER

By JAMES D. PHELAN.

San Francisco and the bay cities have made their case for the Hetch-Hetchy water supply and have been awarded the verdict; and now there is a vain appeal.

Has there not been enough of fine writing and inexact information? Your correspondent, Mr. Bade, answers that "one great opposition movement" is in process of incubation in this state. To what end?

It seems that the old California fatality is upon us, of fighting the good fight only to find the enemy in our own camp. For eight years we have pursued this project, nor did we begin until Mendell, Manson and Grunsky, from knowledge gained in the field, had thrown the weight of their professional prestige into the city's application for the use of Hetch-Hetchy. It was then an unknown mountain reservoir and so designated by the Geological Survey; or, as a congressman more correctly observed, "Designated by Almighty God for the highest use of man." That is the touchstone—"the highest use."

Hetch-Hetchy the Best Source.

All other available sources were investigated and eliminated. Hetch-Hetchy is confessedly the best. The President said, "You have my support." The Secretary of the Interior, invested with full power, has granted the permit for its use. The Secretary of Agriculture has concurred. The people of San Francisco, by a vote of 35,000 to 5,000 have approved. The legislature of the state, the cities of Oakland, Alameda, and Berkeley have spoken with one voice in favor of the grant, and the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, after a patent hearing, has reported favorably the exchange of lands. "Flood the valley," say the people, "Flood the magazines," say the doctrinaires.

When all is ready for the pipe line to bring water to our doors, we are warned by the pipes of Patric. Would not the million men on the shores of San Francisco bay could spend their waking hours with the Sylvan God in Arcadian simplicity, and not feel the necessity of ever putting him under tribute! That is, alas, impracticable. Pan will have to yield his sovereignty over parts of his territory from time to time—it is so ordained by the decree of civilization.

Make Way for the Toiling Millions.

To paraphrase a classification, that is classic, modern society may be divided into three classes—wealth-producers, stock-jobbers, and fox-hunters. The wealth-producers—the toiling millions—create prosperity by the utilization of natural resources, and the other two classes—predatory and parasitic—consciously or unconsciously obstruct the wheels of progress. Let this be the motto.

Unobstructed prosperity confers happiness, and the greatest good to the greatest number should dictate the uses of wealth. The stock-jobbers and the fox-hunters have joined in an attempt to thwart the plan of San Francisco to utilize the water from waters of the High Sierra—the one to enhance the prices of stocks, and the other to preserve the mountain tops for pleasure purposes.

The attorney for the Spring Valley Water company, before the Senate Committee, was forced to admit that he opposed any water supply for San Francisco, and the reason is apparent, for the city, although willing to buy the company's property for its legitimate capital investment, will not pay a forced price when it possesses a superior supply of its own. Hence the stock-jobbers oppose Hetch-Hetchy. But not even the chief engineer of the company has had anything to say against the excellence of the source, for Hetch-Hetchy is easily the best of the mountain supplies, and we want it because it is the best.

Esthetic Enjoyment an Inferior Use.

But the fox-hunter, who is willing that the city should have a new water-supply elsewhere, wants to know why the city should trespass on his preserves—his, because not utilized as yet for beneficial or productive purposes. He would drive the people farther afield; we would drive Pan. In England, vast areas were, and still are, to a diminished extent, preserved for the pleasurable relaxation of deer-stalking and fox-hunting, and the squires resist the progress of the plow; and, even over the cultivated fields, they assert a superior right to hunt. Granted the chase is a noble, manly and healthful sport, still, to admit, subordinate to the natural, proper and beneficial uses of the soil, which must first maintain the population. (And lest the esthetic weep, it may be said, parenthetically, that a growing crop or orchard has a beauty of its own.) If we must persist in fox-hunting, the hunters must fall back on unbroken or unusable lands, until, like the Indian under pressure of civilization, he is forced beyond the horizon. Fox-hunting can endure as long as there are unused fields, and mountain climbing can survive as long as there are needlessly peaks. We are now extending the frontier. If the region in the neighborhood of Hetch-Hetchy is occupied for a superior purpose, then Shasta and Mount Whitney, and the Kings river canyon offer inviting prospects. Why should we shall have fifty million people, then the fascination of ascending the Alaskan slopes—the highest on the continent—will possess the daring, and before whom, perhaps, the North Pole will capitulate? The hunter is the forerunner of the pioneer; but we cannot maintain the conditions of the wilderness when the pioneer wants to build a home.

There are some things better than others, and we must not lose our sense of proportion—even if we have to lose, occasionally, a distinguished visitor. Roosevelt knew better than to come to California when he could visit distant Africa.

When the zealous chief engineer—with his eye on one spring vainly to the defense of his Spring Valley in the Senate Committee and defended its purchases of lands on the Alameda side of San Francisco bay, and which for thirty years have remained unused for any purpose, he naively declared—"quoting the exact words of Hermann Schuster"—"Now this company has got to buy property" (mark you, in the nearby and fertile counties of Alameda and Santa Clara) "ahead of time in order to prevent it being settled up by farms, and especially by game ranches and towns. If we did not go in time and buy up an entire valley, and an entire water-shed, if possible, we can never get it." (Senate Record, p. 118.)

Wilderness Must Yield to Civilization.

Of course, how logical and alert are we when serving special interests, and how quickly we lose sight of our community duties. We must suppress forsooth the very growth of population! This is an example of speeding progress by taking the ground from under its feet!

What more powerful argument could be made for a mountain source? The water-shed of Hetch-Hetchy is, save for four months, uninhabitable.

We have assumed the contention of the nature lover that by this process his frontier is being extended; but he need not be pushed out of the Hetch-Hetchy water-shed. There is a modus vivendi. For example, is the Crystal Springs lake in San Mateo county less attractive as a glimpse of nature because there is a roadway around it? Is not the sheet of water more slightly than a mere depression between hills? And because the traffic of two counties cross it by wagon-road and thousand or longer on its margin, is it seriously exposed to typhoid? Then what may he say of the more remote water-shed of the Hetch-Hetchy region?

No Danger of Pollution.

But Mr. Bade sees danger. Solicitous for the purity of the supply and the integrity of the camp, he sees no middle ground and condemns the camp in order to destroy the supply. The Tuolumne Meadows are more than twenty miles from the dam, separated by a turbulent stream, and yet he speaks of the menace of even one case of "walking typhoid." Cannot that be said of any supply? But how improbable here of all places—where the use is infrequent and necessarily limited.

Among the other protests to Congress against our project was the "Saturday Walking Club of Chicago," a city which drinks from Lake Michigan and drains into the Mississippi above St. Louis, which drinks in turn. I venture to enquire which of these cities support the walking typhoid club? We should have the facts and then bar the members out!

And now Mr. Bade in his article quotes Mr. Grunsky, very ingeniously and without giving dates, as having said of the Spring Valley, "It ranks first in reliability of service." That, alas, was prior to April 18, 1906. It can hardly be said, however, that Lake Merced, right in the city limits, accessible to the very dogs, as it were, and from which we take three million gallons daily out of mere necessity, ranks first in purity. Purity, abundance, and reliability, should be the tests of a water supply, and in all of these Spring Valley is found wanting. That is why we have taken up the quest for water.

Now, having taken up the quest, would we not fail of our duty if we stopped short of its fullest fulfillment? What is that? That is the question.

Mr. Grunsky, in his testimony, has wisely said if San Francisco were driven to it, "She would have to distill water from the ocean" and that "the matter of water supply is relative." But are we going to the ocean, or the Calaveras "cow pasture," where the Spring Valley conceals a hundred million gallons from the farmers, the court of mere necessity, good people of Oakland, or to the tail-race of a power company, as the Stanislaus, or the confluence of the Cosumnes and the graft, or anywhere but the inviolate and inviolable wastes of the High Sierra? Then again, how any water-shed as good, any reservoir as safe, any source as free from contamination or the dangers of contamination, whether privately owned or publicly held, as the Hetch-Hetchy, and the great bay populations, the wealth-producers, must confess judgment, and the fox-hunters, "The brush is yours—for another season," but to the stock-jobbers, even then, there can be no response but, "Your day has come!"

The majority report made to the House of Representatives giving San Francisco the decision contains the following:

"About a dozen sources of water supply have been examined for San Francisco by the most eminent water engineers in the West and there is practically unanimity in their reports that the Tuolumne river furnishes the best opportunity to secure a large, pure and perennial supply. It would not be correct to say that this is the only adequate supply to be found in those mountains (Sierra Nevada), but the expert authorities are well agreed that as the most desirable one from the standpoint of freedom from contamination from human and stock sources, stock raising, mining, etc., and it also has the advantage of containing quality suitable in a marked degree for reservoir uses."

The Million's Right Against the Hundred's.

On San Francisco bay dwell nearly one million people, and in a few short years that population will be doubled, so it is the part of wisdom for both city authorities and the federal government to provide for the best supply for the maintenance in health of this vast population.

Granted that we could take one of "The dozen supplies," they are now not only in beneficial use, meeting the need of great wealth producing industries such as mining, irrigation and the development of power, but, as we have seen, they are all, with the exception of the Hetch-Hetchy subject to increasing contamination from human activities. The Tuolumne water shed is a vast region scrubbed and snow-covered, uninhabitable for nearly nine months of the year, and the Hetch-Hetchy is one of the very few available reservoirs.

The majority report continues:

"After a very full examination of the whole question it was the judgment of the committee that the only source of water for San Francisco that is free from the pollution of the Park and the interference with the pleasures of those who wish to visit it, and which offers the greatest advantages according to the nation's principal water supply experts, is that now valleys or meadows, as they are called, will become lakes; and if this be a detraction from the beauty of the Park a point about which there is much difference of opinion. The inevitable benefit will result to one of the principal cities of the nation and to the countless thousands, even millions, who will reside there in generations to come.

The report points out that fifty years ago New York's, and only twenty years ago Chicago's, population was more than that now on San Francisco bay, and that fifty years hence this nation will have two hundred millions of population, with a growing proportion of them in California, and hence the importance of securing at this time an ample, stable and pure water supply. Could anything be more important, Mr. Fox-hunter?

It is therefore not "cheapness" but abundance and purity and reliability that move the people of the bay of San Francisco to provide for themselves and their posterity in time; but if it were partly a question of reasonable cost, I think that the people of the country would consider it no small element in the petition of a city that has just been destroyed by fire, due to a lack of water, and which is now using her last available penny, under the limitations of taxation, to re-create a municipal plant, and to worthily serve the nation at its western gate. She should not be falsely condemned for her lack of esthetic appreciation of the beauties of nature, nor reproached for thrift. San Francisco can afford to pay, however, for what she needs, if the government exacts a price, and she is endeavoring to demonstrate the need she has for this particular water supply because of its abundance and purity.

There are many people who repeat without knowledge that there are numerous sources other than Hetch-Hetchy, and just as good and available. As a matter of fact, they are all distinctly inferior, and are all in beneficial use. The House majority report says:

"Having in mind the fact that rain and snow fall in California only during the winter months, and that for approximately half the year there is no precipitation at all, the imperative necessity of impounding water during the wet season becomes apparent. The absence of available reservoirs in some of the Sierra streams puts those streams out of consideration in examining this problem."

Other Sources Impracticable.

Mr. Bader quotes Congressman Englebright in part only to show the resources of the middle fork of the Yuba, a property controlled by the Spring Valley company, and he leaves out the critical testimony which showed that the water, if fully developed, is subject to contamination, and that a pipe line from it would have to be carried over the Carquinez Straits, and the perilous Sacramento.

Here is the testimony. (House Report, page 375):

Question: Would you not have to cross the Carquinez Straits?

Mr. Englebright: Yes, or else cross the Sacramento river higher up.

Question: And the Sacramento river is exposed to these fishets throughout the winter? In other words, it would be a dangerous and uncertain pipe line, would it not?

Answer: It would depend on how you built it, and how much money you were willing to put into it.

Question: You indicated that if the point of diversion was low down, it would yield in that event only a small quantity of water.

Answer. Mr. Englebright: I think that Mr. McCutcheon's figures are a little low. One hundred gallons a day would be a little low. The point of diversion was so low that the water would be subject to contamination?

Answer: Yes, but there would be no trouble for him to gather one hundred million gallons a day.

And so these pretensions were exploded one by one by the company's own witness.

The same in the Senate Committee, when the water from the Stanislaus trail race was under discussion. The Stanislaus is frequently urged on the city as an alternative scheme by those who do not want Hetch-Hetchy and who do not understand the conditions. The Stanislaus Electric Power company owns the rights on that river.

The following is from the Senate Record (page 107):

Question: I should like to know if we can go into the tailrace of the Stanislaus dam and appropriate the water to the company at a price of millions of dollars in the impounding of it?

Mr. McCutcheon: After it gets back into the stream, every drop of it.

Senator Smoot: Is it possible to have below the tail race of the Stanislaus dam a reservoir sufficient to reservoir the water for the city of San Francisco?

Mr. Mansont: No, there would be no trouble for those who do not want Hetch-Hetchy and who do not understand the conditions. The Stanislaus Electric Power company owns the rights on that river.

Cheapness a Worthy Consideration.

It also appeared that San Francisco should have hydro-power to pump water over Altamont, and for other municipal purposes, but not for sale, now included in the Hetch-Hetchy grant—a privilege which Mr. Bader sought to urge against the grant itself. We should not select a source, argues he, that is capable of saving the city $300,000 a year in street-lighting alone, which the Hetch-Hetchy will do, but confine ourselves strictly to domestic supply. Why? Is there no one to speak for the public? Why not consider the rights of the millions in the city as well as the hundreds in the sky?

And so before the committees of Congress every other source was discussed and its deficiencies shown. Tahoe, the Feather, the American, the Sacramento and San Joaquin, Mokelumne, Clear Lake and Coyote. (Where are the sources that can be substituted for the Hetch-Hetchy? Let them be named.) The House Committee on this showing, after a three days' hearing, decided for the city—and yet the debate goes on. But happily, while the inept and impracticable go on with the debate, the city has decided to go on with the work. The House majority report put the final question on the recalcitrant: "It is important to observe in this connection that San Francisco can proceed without the Congressional grant of land, if she chooses to do so. So it is not in its last analysis a question as to whether she shall occupy certain portions of Yosemite Park but whether Congress will aid a city to carry out its purposes in the most business-like way."

President Roosevelt in Favor of Project.

But I desire to raise a question in this connection which was suggested to me by President Roosevelt himself. In consultation with other sagacious statesmen, he is disposed to believe that his friends who love nature so ardently have lost the sense of proportion. That will explain the nature lovers and answer them. They do not clearly see that the policy of the conservation of our natural resources to which the President, Secretary Garfield, and Theodore Pinchot are devoted, was established for the largest possible benefit of the people of this and future generations, and not merely to gratify idealists and esthetic persons who are conserved to protect not only the timber, but the water, and the water is conserved to accommodate the highest uses of man; and of all the uses—navigation, power-development, mining and agriculture—the very highest is the domestic use. It is the sine qua non of existence; and furthermore the comparative purity of water is the measure of public health.

Is there not a danger of a revulsion of public sentiment, thought the President, against conservation if the people suspect that the natural resources are to be tied up for picturesque and aesthetic purposes against demands for reasonable beneficial use? When no substantial violence is done to a forest reserve or a national park by serving vast populations with the water, must the government be turned from its purpose as in this case, because such a policy would interfere with "the rights of campers"? Is it not true, therefore, that some good people in their zeal for the beautiful have lost their sense of proportion and do not sufficiently weigh the rights of the teeming millions who weigh the rights of the mountains for their holidays, but who are simply content if they be allowed to live in health in the great industrial centers of population where the work of the world is done?

Let us do a little mental climbing and take the larger view from the peaks of humanity. Let us be men first and fox-hunters afterwards.

Disraeli was a past master of the art of flattery, but his audacity carried him out of danger. Soon after his elevation to the House of Lords he was asked by a brother peer how he felt in his new surroundings. "Oh, don't ask me," he growled, "I feel dead and buried." Then remember that that his questioner was of the company which he was contemning, he added, "and in the realms of the blest!"—Westminster Gazette.

IT happened about two years ago," the mate began. "We had a cargo for Calcutta, orders being to stop at most o' the ports on the way out to pick up more. An hour before we sailed, the agent comes aboard, an' grinnin' like a chimpanzee. 'There's a couple o' passengers this trip,' he says, 'a missionary an' his servant. They're goin' all the way, so—he winks at the second mate—you ought to have a lively passage.'

"It was half-past eleven—we was due out at midnight—when a Chinymen puts in an appearance with a couple of trunk. He said that he was the Reverend James Shilbird's servant, and that he would be much obliged if one of the deck hands would pilot him to the reserved cabin. The missionary, he added, was on his way to the ship, an' the captain hadn't to worry—which was very nice an' considerate.

"When you're shovin' cargo right up to the moment o' sailin', you don't, as a rule, go round to pay your respects to the passengers. Consequently, it was not until the ship was clearing the Medway that the captain thought to ask if Mister Shilbird came aboard. The quartermaster slipped along to the cabin an' kicked it gently. The Chinymen pushed his head out.

"'What wanted?' he says.
'Is your gun'vor aboard, Ching?' says the quartermaster.

"'Alles rightee,' Ching says, 'Him come when sailormen very busy. Muchee noise velly no good for head. Him go sleppy. Nightee!' And the door was shut with a click.

"The next day the missionary came to breakfast; but we didn't see the Ching, who, we presumed, had the luggage to unpack. The quartermaster slipped along to the cabin an' rolled his eyes which put ten year on to his face, an' his complexion was a cross between tallow an' tow. He hadn't much to say to us at breakfast, an' nobody seemed particularly anxious to force the conversation. There was a danger of religion being read to a sermon, an' none of us felt inclined. Something about the man that struck us more than anything else was the quantity of jewelry he supported. He had two diamond rings on his right hand that must have cost a pile o' money, an' emeralds an' sapphires fair to be had on to a sermon, an' didn't he know how to flash 'em? At every turn that he made with his hand at breakfast the diamonds seemed to catch the sunlight, an' afore he went on the bridge the second mate had made up his mind to advertise for a missionary job as soon as he was laid off.

"During the next three days we didn't see Mister Shilbird. Ching came on deck, an' mixed pretty freely with the hands that weren't on duty. 'Massa,' he said, was 'velly muchee sick o' sea,' an' didn't want to see anybody but Ching, who had been with him for years an' years. That night Ching played cards with two of the quartermasters and the serang. He lost pretty heavily, but paid up like a man. The fellow seemed to have no end o' notes, an', like his master, he carried enough jewelry to start a pawnshop in his own an' his.

"The next night the Chinymen played again—the quartermasters saw to that—but before he had been playing an hour he said that the bank was busted, an' it wouldn't do to go to the cabin for more, as his master was asleep.

"Take this card to the quartermaster, pulling a scarfin out of his pocket; 'plenty more.' An' he winked his wicked eyes like clockwork.

"That began to make the others think, an' the next morning one of the quartermasters comes to my cabin an' respectfully begs an interview. I took the scarfin, and him an' his went off in a hurry. Then I goes to the captain an' lays the matter afore him.

"'Well, Mister Sherlock,' he says, 'wot business of yours is it to poke a nose into a passenger's jewel-box? They've paid their passage to Calcutta, an' as we've got to do is to land 'em there, sound in wind an' limb.'

"'But it do seem strange, sir,' I says. 'Missionaries an' Chinymen don't do much in the diamond line, as a rule.'

"'Well, we can't help it, Sherlock,' he says. 'Let it be a lesson to you when you're ashore an' you're inclined to let your generosity run away with you because a pretty gal jingles a collectin'-box under your nose.'

THE RAJAH'S TREASURE

(From Black and White.)

By ANDREW SOUTAR

"That being the way the captain looked at the matter, I didn't see that it was necessary for me to get ill about it. All I had to complain about during the next three days was the rows forward! Every man on the ship was bent on teaching the Chinymen how to play poker.

"Something was bound to happen before long. And it did. The captain an' I were examin' the chart one day, when up comes one of the deck hands an' asks if it would be convenient for the captain to advance him eight pounds of his wages.

"The captain thought the man mad, and reached for a monkey wrench that was lying handy. The man edged away an' saluted again.

"'What do you want eight pounds for?' the captain roars.

"'I want to invest it, sir,' says the deck hand. 'An' wot are you goin' to invest it in?' asks the captain, sarcastically. 'Diamond mines, eh?'

"The deck hand started as if he'd been hit with the wrench, an', coming a bit nearer, 'Wot,' he says, 'are you avin' a bit on as well, sir?'

"'Wot the devil do you mean?' says the captain. 'Layin' a bit on wot?'

"'Why, on the treasure hunt!' the deck hand replies.

"The treasure hunt! the captain repeats. 'Wot the—who the—who—Ere, Mr. Sherlock, take this dam fool to the steward an' get him a double dose o' draught! See that he takes it, too!'

"I was leadin' the deck hand away, when up comes a quartermaster, and behind him, like a lot o' sheep, wot fifteen or sixteen of the crew.

"'Wot's this, Johnson—a mutiny?' I asks. 'No, sir,' he replies. 'I—we, that is, would like a word with the captain.'

"The captain came out of his cabin with a revolver in each hand. He had heard the word 'mutiny' an' was ready for emergencies. Then up spoke the quartermaster. On behalf of the crew an' himself, he asks if the captain would be kind enough to advance their wages for the voyage. They swore by all that they loved that they would finish the trip like men if the captain would accede to their wishes.

"'Wot do you want the money for?' asks the captain suspiciously.

"'To invest, sir,' replied Johnson.

"I could see a dangerous light comin' into the old man's eyes, so I got out o' range of the revolvers by getting behind the quartermaster.

"'Look 'ere,' he roars, like a bull, 'is this a ship, or is it a damned stock exchange, or have I got a crew o' lunatics on board? Who's been putting this tommyrot into your heads?'

"'Beggan' your pardon, sir,' said the quartermaster, 'but will you let me explain?'

"'Go on,' says the captain quietly, taking out his watch an' playing tenderly with the nose of his gun. 'I'll give you two minutes,' he says.

"'You see,' began the quartermaster, 'it's this way. Mister Shilbird is—well, he ain't a missionary at all.'

"'Wot?' yells the captain, dropping his watch on the deck.

"'No, sir,' says the quartermaster, nervously, 'he ain't a missionary. He's goin' to Calcutta on a mission, but it's a treasure mission. Him an' Ching—beg pardon, sir—him an' his servant 'ave got valuable information.'

"'Have they,' the captain interrupts cynically.

"'Yes, sir,' the quartermaster goes on,

'Mister Shilbird knows where the treasure of an Indian Rajah is buried. There's heaps o' diamonds, an' heaps o' rubies, an' the Lord knows how many millions o' money!'

"'Well,' sneers the captain, 'why doesn't he get 'em himself instead o' blabbin' to a lot o' lazy wagabonds who ought to be doin' time for card-sharpin?'

"That was a nasty reference to the Chinymen's losses an' the quartermaster colored up in a hurry.

"'You see, sir,' he stammered, 'he can't do it very well by himself. The treasure is buried in a lake six fathoms deep, an' a little capital is needed to commence the workin'.'

"'That's where you come in, eh?' grins the captain.

"'Yes, sir,' the quartermaster replies. 'Mister Shilbird, who has proved hisself a kind-hearted gent to every member of the crew, has decided to share his information. He ain't a strong man—the quartermaster's voice sank to a whisper—an' he knows he ain't got a long berth down here. He's goin' to turn this 'ere little job into a syndicate—an' we're the syndicate.'

"He looked around at the rest of the crew, who stood with their caps in their hands and their heads respectfully lowered. Now I come to think of it, they looked an enterprisin' syndicate, takin' 'em as a whole, mind you.

"The captain sent me to summon Mr. Shilbird to the saloon deck. The cabin door was locked.

"'Who knockee?' shouted Ching, in his thin, piping voice.

"'Will you tell Mr. Shilbird that the captain would like to see him at once?' I said.

"In five minutes, came the voice of Mr. Shilbird.

"And in five minutes the treasure hunting missionary was on deck.

"'Wot's all this about the Rajah's jewels?' says the captain, lowering his eyebrows.

"The missionary crossed his hands over his spectacles, and said, 'I have a word to say to you.'

"'Ah, captain,' he says, 'if you only understood my position! In a year, a month, a week, I may be sleeping beneath the sod. Consumption, sir—ah, that terrible plague! But I am not afraid to die, sir—no, by no means. Once I have become reconciled even to the presence of death. When a man in my position realizes that he has not long to live, it is only natural that he should prepare himself for the grave. And, captain—there was a pathetic little catch in his voice—he behoves a man to look around from the edge of the grave and ask himself what he can do to benefit his fellow-men before he leaves them. Shall he bestow his wealth upon those who have frowned upon him? Ah, no! Shall he enrich those who have loved him not? We are only human, captain, even when we are playing with the shroud. No, sir. The dying man looks around for those whose countenances reflect their minds. When I came aboard this ship and saw the faces of the crew, I knew that my quest was ended. They shall be rich men, I say to you, my servant, and then you shall prepare my winding-sheet and I will submit to the will of God.'

"He stopped to wipe the corners of his eyes with a yaller handkerchief, an' in the silence that followed I heard the quartermaster musing. His father had been a new-opener at Ealing, and the missionary's narrative had touched him.

"'Well, sir,' Mr. Shilbird goes on, 'some years ago I rendered a service to a dying Lascar, and to show his gratitude he gave me the precious documents relating to the hidden treasure of a Rajah. I doubt not that you have learned something about it from your estimable quartermaster. The plans, with the aid of which the treasure can be recovered, are in my mind. Naturally, I guard them closely. You will have remarked that I or my servant remain with them in the cabin. When it is necessary that I should seek the fresh air, the noble Wong Lung keeps watch. At this very moment he is sitting there ready to die while protecting the plans.'

"'An' wot do you propose?'

"The captain's voice showed the interest he had taken in the story.

"'Two hundred pounds is the capital re-

President Taft's automobile is a White steamer.

Signboards have been erected by the Automobile Club of California in many parts of the state and the club is receiving praise from other motoring organizations throughout the state. Already signs have been erected in Contra Costa county and part of San Joaquin, Stanislaus and Fresno counties. The westerly part of San Joaquin county and both sides of the San Joaquin river as far as Fresno have been posted. The crews are working in the direction of Sacramento and will next take up the road to Lake Tahoe. After this they will commence work in Lake county. The club has posted 1,200 miles of road within a radius of 250 miles from San Francisco.

Telegraphic dispatches from the Studebaker "scout car," to the local Studebaker branch, announced its arrival in Marshalltown, Ia. The car is reported to be still running fine and that there seems to be no end of bad snow drifts. The car is now en route to Belle Blaine.

Five carloads of Studebaker-Garford cars, including several cars of the suburban type and a carload of Studebaker E. M. F. "30," cars were received last week by the Studebaker Bros., company of California. Included in the E. M. F. lot were several cars of the roadster type. These, as well as the new Garfords, are attracting considerable attention.

quired," says Mr. Slibird. "That will purchase all the diving apparatus necessary. With four members of the crew I shall be able to finish the work in three days."

"Let me look at the plans," says the captain, and Mr. Slibird went to his cabin and returned with a bundle of yellow parchment.

"The captain led the way to his cabin, and I and Mr. Slibird followed. The door was unlocked at the request of the missionary, and then the precious papers were unfolded. They appeared to be genuine, and I could tell by the way he moderated his language when he addressed him that the captain was very favorably impressed by Mr. Slibird. At the end of half an hour he had made up his mind to enter into the speculation.

The old skipper had a good heart beneath his bluster, and, in order that the crew might participate in the fortune that was coming, he advanced them a portion of their wages, planked down twenty-five pounds himself, and advised me to speculate to the extent of twenty pounds. I took his advice. Mr. Slibird collected the money and took it to his cabin, returning with a lot of forms which were duly signed by him and each man who had paid for a share. Then he retired to his cabin, and we didn't see any more of him until we sighted Colombo. He came on deck looking pale and haggard. He said his chest was troubling him, and he had run out of the medicine that was made for him from a special prescription. The whole crew got anxious about that chest, and the medicine locker was turned inside out for remedies; but Mr. Slibird shook his head sadly, and feared that he would have to wait until we got to Colombo. He would send Wong Lung ashore, he said, if anyone knew of a chemist in

Maudie Adams is to appear in the character of "Joan of Arc" in the Harvard stadium next June.

Congressman A. W. Rucker, of Denver, was recently a guest at a banquet of "seventy-niners," in a dining-room improvised out of a large chamber 1,000 feet underground in a mine near Leadville.

* Robert Mantell seems to have emerged prominently from the obscurity of a "one-night-stand" tragedian. He is now appearing in his third New York season in Shakespearean plays, this time in "King John."

Judge J. B. Carrington, a pioneer of Solano county and now a resident of Carmel-by-the-Sea, was a schoolmate of the late President Harrison in Wilmington, Indiana, and thrashed the future president for cheating him in a game of marbles played for "keeps."

King Edward has achieved a new dignity as sovereign. The British laws provide six years of grace in which to use up postage stamps bearing the likeness of the preceding ruler. That period has now passed, and stamps showing Victoria instead of Edward are no longer legal payment of postage.

Three brilliant novelists have proved to be disappointing playwrights. Henry James's "The High Bid," Robert Hichens's "The Real Woman," and Turgeneff's "The Bread of Others," have all disappointed London audiences. The fault of all was too much conversation and too little drama.

In point of service, the oldest grand chaplain in the Masonic order in the world is Rev. J. R. N. Bell, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Corvallis, Ore., having been grand chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Oregon for thirty-five consecutive years. He is a native of Virginia and fought in thirty-two battles in Early's corps of the Confederate army.

John Arbuckle, the head of the great coffee firm of Arbuckle Brothers, is the plainest dressed man in his big business organization. He is a friend of working girls, and a few years ago rented rooms in an old sailing vessel anchored at a dock in New York for a merely nominal sum to provide comfortable summer quarters for shop girls.

Sir Thomas George Shaghnessy, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, is an Irishman, born in Milwaukee, an American citizen populated mainly by Germans, and received his title of knighthood from the Queen of England, whose ancestors were principally Dutch, and he lives in Quebec, which is largely peopled by Frenchmen.

It is rather an odd coincidence that the name of the "Cattle King of Texas" is Slaughter. Christopher C. Slaughter is said to be the first male child born of a marriage contracted under the Republic of Texas. He owns more than half a million acres of land and claims to have raised and marketed the largest number of cattle of any individual in America.

Mark Twain's description, in "Roughing It," of Ollendorf's leading him and Ballou round and round in a circle during a snowstorm was cited in a probate case in Macon, Mo., to prove that a similar performance by the testator did not indicate a sound mind. The jury considered the story good enough evidence to sustain the will, and an appeal will be taken by the complainants on the ground that Mark Twain was romancing.

John Burroughs, the naturalist and lover of birds, has lately seen the Grand Canyon of the Colorado for the first time. John Muir showed him the way, and then introduced him to many of the wonders of California. The two were companions on the Harriman Alaska expedition several years ago, where they were called by their companions "The Two Johnnies." Mr. Burroughs is trying life in a bungalow in Pasadena after years of rusticity in "Slabsides," his home on the Hudson.

the town. The quartermaster, who had had his head split open in the native quarters one night, remembered the address of a chemist who had braced him up, and Mr. Sibird carefully noted the address. He said that he felt faint and would retire to his cabin. I offered to help him there, but he declined with thanks. I stood watching him fumble at the locked door, and, looking back, he saw me.

"Wong Lung, open!" he called out; an' I heard the Chinymen answer, 'Velly good, velly good!' He went inside.

"We got to our berth in the breakwater, but found that there was very little cargo to come aboard. Every man went about his work whistling and singing, as if work was a Sunday-school treat and a Lord Mayor's dinner rolled into one. When they did talk, there was only one subject. The Rajah's treasure had been carefully laid out by every man. Two quartermasters had gone into the hotel business, four of the deck hands had arranged a Monte Carlo syndicate, and the cabinboy had bought a brand-new motor-car. Can't say what the captain had thought of, but he was continually talking of the profits that accrued from breweries. I had bought a little estate in Surrey.

"An hour before we cast off, the Chinymen came on deck with a little black bag. The ship's boat was lowered for him, an' as he went down the ladder he shook his head an' groaned. 'Him velly bad,' he said. 'Sleepy now; no wake-up in the mornin' three hour.'

"Hurry up with the medicine," whispered the quartermaster, and Wong Lung signified his readiness to do so.

"We watched for the return of the Chinymen, but he didn't come. We could see the boat moored to the jetty, an' in the deck hand who'd rowed the Chinymen ashore. We waited for three hours, an' then the captain decided that he could wait no longer. Mr. Sibird could get another servant, he said, an' the steward would have to do what he could for the patients until we got to Calcutta.

"The missionary slept all that night and part of the next day. We knocked gently at the door several times, but there was no answer, and the steward said we'd better let him sleep, as it was the best remedy. At noon the captain ordered the carpenter to force the lock, and half a dozen of us stood around while he did it. The door opened at the persuasion of the chisel, and then—we fell back with a gasp.

"The cabin was empty!

"Pinned on one of the bunks was a card, with the words written in pencil:

"Blessed is he that expecteth nothing, for he shall not get let in."

"On the other side, in printed characters, we read:

"James Doolan, Esq., Ventriloquist and Quick Change Artist. Concerts Attended."

Mistress: Here, Bridget, are a pair of trousers for you. Scrubwoman: Thank ye, kindly, mum. Do ye happen to have a pair of corsets for me husband?—Life.

"How many ribs have you, Johnny?" asked the teacher of physiology. "I don't know, mam," giggled Johnny, squirming all around on one foot. "I'm so awful ticklish I never could count 'em."—Philadelphia Record.

"Marie," said a girl to a friend the other day, "Walter has just sent me the dearest little alligator from Florida!" "Dear me!" rejoined Marie, with affected enthusiasm. "And how shall you keep him?" "I'm not quite certain," was the reply, "but I've put him in Florida water till I can hear further from Walter."—Harper's Weekly.

General J. W. F. Hughes of the Kansas National Guard takes six spoons of granulated white sugar to every cup of coffee. Once when the general was traveling he jumped off a train in a hurry to swallow down his lunch so as not to be conspicuous with a full stomach. The dining-room girl took up the sugar bowl. "How many spoonfuls in your coffee, please?" she asked sweetly. "Six or seven," answered the general, quickly. She slammed down the sugar bowl and snorted: "Shovel the d—n stuff in yourself!" and switched out of the dining-room.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, bringing to attention members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement.

Having three cities, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Arms, Soldiers, Searches, Warrants.

The second amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that, "A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of a people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed"—by the general government, of course. The states can do as they have a mind to about it. It should be noted, too, that the right to bear arms is dependent upon "a well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state." It is only as a militiaman that a citizen has an unfringable right to bear arms. There is no right inherent in constitution or laws to go about stuck full of pistols.

Fear of a standing army was one of the obsessions of the minds of our forefathers. They saw in every soldier, not a defender of his country and the liberties of the people, so much as a possible instrument in the hands of men ambitious for power whereby the common people might be deprived of their liberties and oppressed with burdens. They were themselves no strangers to that exercise of governmental authority.

Therefore the third amendment to the Constitution declares that, "No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

This dread of the soldier seems far off from us, but it is not so far but that the same causes which justified it once may justify it again. The putting down of the Pullman car strike by President Cleveland, with the use of the regular soldiers, and under cover of forwarding the United States mails, gave the captains of industry an object lesson that was not lost on them whether it was lost upon the common laity or not. That strike was so wanton that the whole nation was glad to see it terminated. Not only how, but the regular soldier then proved his efficiency against a mob as no militiaman or guardsman ever has.

The California Weekly has no desire to resurrect from its century-old grave the Jeffersonian dread of the regular soldier, but that dread was not wholly foolish. Social order in this country must be preserved either through the equal enforcement of just laws by our courts and civil officers or it will be preserved by a military despotism supported by a standing army, for human nature abhors disorder as mother nature abhors a vacuum. We do not now have an equal enforcement of just laws. The two extremes of society, the predatory millionaire and the mob, flout the law at their pleasure. The commonality is practically defenseless against both, but when the predatory millionaire and the mob come to try conclusions with each other then the common citizen will be likely to learn the value of the second, third and fourth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The militiaman has been looked upon as the buffer to the soldier, and for the reason that his numbers are overwhelming. The militia consists of every able-bodied man between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, but this host is without arms, save as each person may own pistols, shotguns or rifles, and it is altogether without discipline. The place of the militia has been taken by the National Guard, a volunteer force sustained by the states but equipped by the United States. It is virtually a reserve force of the United States rather than of any state and certainly is not a protection for a state against the United States, as originally contemplated.

The fourth amendment to the Constitution protects the individual citizen against unreasonable searches and seizures in his home—makes each man's home his castle unless there are such grounds for believing the citizen guilty of offense against the general government as shall warrant a magistrate or court, upon the oath or affirmation of a complaining witness, to make a search of the premises of a suspected person.

The United States army is a small affair compared with the standing armies of Europe, comprising a maximum of only 100,000 enlisted men in time of peace, with less than 9,000 officers, though the force normally comprises only about 62,000 enlisted men. These soldiers are being quartered within easy reach of our populous cities where disturbances are most likely to occur, and, in the event of widespread turbulence, the regular army would be found effective for restoring order. A better safeguard against a military despotism than reliance upon the militia or the constitutional right to bear arms would be such legislation regarding labor disputes as will provide civil means for adjusting differences between capital and labor, speedily and fairly as between men of equal standing. In this we have been derelict. We have permitted industrial wars without number and such wars cannot always be waged without sometime bringing upon the scene soldiers trained to obey orders and to shoot.

OLD MONTEREY.

By Ray C. B. Brown.

There sits a city 'neath the western sun,
Where golden sands sweep down to purple sea.

Whose constant heart has one recurrent plea,
There by the forest when the day is done,
Age has but veiled her beauty, and as one
Who, smiling, brushes eyes from tear-mist free,

Ever she hopes at shell-pink eve to see
The faery twilight turn to dawn begun.
Constant she pleads with Time to let her drift
On some forgotten backward-flowing stream
To days when beauty ruled without a rift
O'er forest aisles and sapphire seas agleam.
Ever she sues and aye beholds the gift
Vanish in opal day-dusk as a dream.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

The President Right.

It is like President Taft, and yet almost too good to be true, that he has served notice upon Honorable Senators that places upon the federal bench are not to be classed as part of their private political patronage. Presidents generally have been forced to lean upon senators for advice and suggestions in such cases, but President Taft is himself peculiarly fitted for discharging the duty of making selection. He knows what is required to constitute a good judge and knows a good piece of judicial timber when it is sorted out of the pile. Heretofore the political "interests" have elected the United States senators and the senators have selected the judges, by and with the advice and consent of the aforesaid "interests," to the great injury of the judicial arm of government. If President Taft will assert his power of initiative in this particular he will find public sentiment with him. It will trust his judgment implicitly. If senators provoke a row over the issue the American public will see to them.

That Advice and Consent.

The Constitution of the United States declares that appointment to office shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not of senators. There is a difference which only senatorial courtesy fails to see. What was intended by the constitution makers to be a formal proceeding upon the part of the Senate, sitting as a body, with the initiative clearly in the hands of the President, has, under senatorial courtesy, become a special proceeding wholly antagonistic to the spirit and purpose of the constitution. When, a short time since, it was given out that President Taft would turn the whole patronage issue over to the senators the statement was inherently doubtful. His reported declaration of independence regarding judicial proceedings strengthens that doubt. If President Roosevelt had a serious short-coming it was that he did not give the Senate a drubbing on this issue while he was about it. The federal brigade in California contained few members who were not in spirit and truth hostile to the President and his policies, a fact that proclaims the need for that drubbing.

Those Corking Calkines.

It is good news to the public, though bad to school teachers from Oregon to San Diego, that the Calkins Syndicate is in financial trouble. Let the Calkines pretend what they may, the Sacramento Union, the choicest of their properties, is in the hands of Calkins' creditors. This is good news to the public for the reason that it can never be to the public interest that their kind of journalism should succeed. If that kind were to be successful all good journalism must fail. And the quality of the journalism which these people stood for should have been notice to small investors to stand clear. Those who invested in their enterprises knowing what they stood for became parties to their policy and are entitled to little commiseration if they parted from their money in toto. Those who knew not are entitled to such measure of sympathy as may properly go out to one who leaps before he looks. It is unlikely that either the Calkines or their chief creditors are much hurt, but investing lambs may congratulate themselves that winter is not at hand.

The Yellow Plague.

The death of Banker Palmanster of Oakland, sad as it was, may have a compensating advantage to humanity. Many good persons in California have made indignant protest against compulsory vaccination and with so much effect that twice lately bills have passed both houses repealing vaccination laws. Governor Pardee refused to sign such a bill and another measure to the same effect is now in the hands of Governor Gillett. If this tragedy shall tip the balance in favor of the law as it is, humanity will be the gainer. For, if medical science knows anything worthy the name of science, it is that vaccination has pulled the teeth and claws from this scourge of our grandfathers until it is little feared. But now and again occurs a case, like that of the lamented Oakland banker, which proves that in fallow soil, the old, yellow plague of the ages can be as virulent as ever. The Governor should pocket that bill.

Compulsory Voting.

Though stirred as profoundly as a local issue can stir a community less than three-fifths of the qualified voters of Los Angeles voted at the recent recall election. There are two ways of looking at it: One is that those who do vote are free to give those who do not any sort of government that it is to their own interest to give, and those who do not vote have no equities that those who do vote are bound to respect. The other view is that citizenship is a duty owing by the voter to the state, just as he owes jury duty, military duty or the duty of joining a posse comitatus to catch a murderer or suppress an insurrection. If this view be taken then neglect or refusal to perform such duty becomes a punishable offense. This is the better view and if it prevail there will come compulsory voting with neglect of that duty at the voter's peril rather than at the peril of the state. It is a subject that deserves thinking over and talking up.

Would Make Them All One.

Mr. Harriman is reported to have said that if all the railroads in the United States could be consolidated under one management the result would redound to the advantage of government, people, shippers and stockholders. Mr. Harriman's placing the welfare of the stockholders at the end of the list is naive. Unless his railroad hist... lies his heart's desire the order of his preference has been: stock manipulators, stockholders, shippers, government and people. But the good that Mr. Harriman anticipates from all-embracing consolidation would not result. The moment that competition was eliminated mortification would set in. The one is life, the other death. Consolidation would do for transportation what the bureaucracy has done for Russia, keep it marking time while the world moves forward. Mr. Harriman, like the Hoosier land-owner, merely wants "all that jimes him."

Be A Citizen of the World.

Ambassador Bryce's admonition to the students of the University of California to be not content with merely giving heed to affairs of our own government, but to make themselves citizens of the world, was eminently sound. A species of precinct patriotism has clung to our national life like a ball and chain to the ankle of a malefactor. It was that which made the erection of colonies into commonwealths so difficult, and commonwealths into a national union the work of a century. The most pregnant fact of our time is that politics now has to do with the family of nations, and whoso is not conversant with the affairs of each member of that family is not fit for state-manship in any member of that family.

Who Cared For Portland?

President Louis W. Hill, of the Great Northern, professes an inability to understand how it came that his conference with Mr. Harriman, in relation to co-operative use of certain terminal facilities at Portland, could have been so enlarged as to cover an offensive and defensive treaty between the two great railway systems marking the boundaries of their respective spheres of influence. Mr. Hill is relatively a young man and evidently unacquainted with up-to-date journalism. Who cared for Portland and its terminals? And who does not care for the larger interests mentioned? The sort of story the newspaper men got from Harriman and Hill, not being the sort they wanted, they merely drew upon their imaginations and made a "story" that was read with much interest. Mr. Hill should give the boys a good story if he does not want a bad one.

Greene Estate Corporation.

C. W. Greene, the big speculator of the Southwest, seeing the probable end of his career approaching, and not being able to contemplate with equanimity the tearing down of the great fortune he has scraped up, is forming a $40,000,000 corporation to manage his estate as a whole. This is against sound public policy and should not be permitted.

THE RAPE OF THE LOOT.

On Saturday and Sunday extraordinary proceedings took place in relation to the case of the People vs. Patrick Calhoun. These incidents have been fully exploited in the daily press, and are succinctly reviewed elsewhere in this paper. This article mainly has to do with the legitimacy and moral value of the proceeding. Efforts will be made to confuse the essential issues in the public mind to the public hurt. Let us therefore approach the subject in calmness of temper and openness of mind that we may preserve ourselves from misjudgment and the use of our influence from upholding wrong rather than right.

One who, in the employment of another so far betrays the trust of his employer as to furnish his competitor or adversary with original or duplicate copies of secret papers belonging to such employer has committed a breach of trust, and a moral wrong and, whatever the law may say in relation to such conduct, such person so offending deserves punishment. No one will deny the truth of this statement.

One who, by bribery, intimidation or persuasion, induces an employee to betray his employer as above described is, in morals, whatever the law may say, a fellow conspirator, accessory before the fact and therefore a principal in whatever crime or moral delinquency the party of the first part is adjudged to be guilty of. No person of sound mind will deny the correctness of this contention.

One step further: Anyone who receives, retains in his possession, pays for and makes use of such secret papers so obtained, knowing how they were obtained, is likewise accessory to the commission of the original offense, a principal thereto and participes criminis therein, if not in law at any rate in morality. The ground under our inquiring feet is still firm and our moral attitude unassailable.

One who discovers such loss of secret documents has a natural right to recover his property wherever he may find it and that he may find it he has a right to apply to a magistrate for, and secure a warrant of search. Armed with such warrant he has a right to use such reasonable force as may be necessary to make the search effective. The making of such a search inflicts no more indignity upon the person searched than would the arrest of the person himself, and arrest is one of the risks of citizenship against which no person can be insured. The right or wrong of it depends upon the denouement.

If now the documents, or other property, procured as above set forth be found on the searched premises, and in the possession of the person in control thereof, the burden of proof is upon him to show that he came by such property innocently. His face, unless as brazen as that of a cigar store Indian, cannot give his mouth leave to speak of any indiginity inflicted or right invaded. Unless he can purge himself of all guilty knowledge of the whereabouts of such property or the manner of its procurement he must stand morally convicted of as serious an offense as the one who first betrayed the trust of his employer. The Calhoun crowd were caught with the goods on them.

The issues in which the public are interested are moral. The issues in which the courts may interest themselves are legal. They may be as far apart as the poles of this earth. The legalities are artificial, conventional, refinements of logical deductions and so intricate that no lawyer and no judge is wise enough to know the law. The moralities are so simple and plain that a half-grown child need not err therein.

There are many legal points involved, more curious than essential and, under our highly artificial judicial system, it may require months to thresh them all out and when they are threshed out the yield will not pay the threshing bill. Here are some of the issues: whether the search warrant described the premises searched with sufficient particularity; whether the search was unreasonable and therefore unconstitutional; whether the district attorney, being an officer of government, had the same right of search that a citizen would have had; whether Judge Murasky's restraining order was or was not properly made out and properly served and whether those who did not obey it were or were not in contempt of court; whether the papers stolen were or were not property and, if they were property, whether or not they were of such value as to make their being stolen grand larceny or petit; whether or not there was larceny or only a betrayal of trust, or a conspiracy against the people of the state. These are only some of the legalities involved. They are relatively non-essential and do not touch the moralities involved, and it is with the moralities that the public mind chiefly has to do.

The significant fact made evident by the history of the graft cases from the beginning is that the administration of justice is no longer an inquiry conducted by a court for the purpose of ascertaining the guilt or innocence of an accused person, it is war. It is waging of battle in which the chief function of government is to provide an umpire. In the waging of this battle the combatants are, by modern custom, privileged to strive with teeth and claws as well as with wits and legal engineering. This marks a profound decadence of the judicial arm of government. Civilization must get back to simpler forms and procedures or it will not long be able to stand off anarchy. This problem should hold first place in the public mind until it is solved and solved right.

STATE CONTROL OF PRIVATE FORESTS.

Those who read briefly that they may be amused will find little to their liking in the special article, elsewhere in this paper, read before the Commonwealth Club by Mr. William Thomas, upon the subject above stated; but if there be those concerned for the future of this state and nation, and for the welfare of generations unborn, they will find the article thought-inspiring. The doctrine that a man may not do what he will with his own timber land will astound exaggerated individualists who have recognized no law but their own wills, but it would seem that even such as these, if capable of impersonal reflection, must perceive the justice and necessity for the restrictions proposed.

There are optimists of much intelligence who would plunge ahead, heedless of the future, serene in the belief that, if one resource be used up, human ingenuity, science and search will discover a substitute that will leave nothing to be desired. Are we exhausting the soil? Nitrogen will be mechanically extracted from the air to make up the deficiency, or we shall manufacture foods as chemical companies manufacture perfumes and flavors, without flowers or fruits, and we shall make vegetables and grains instead of growing them. In place of woods we shall resort to combinations of inexhaustible limestone and clay. In fine, posterity shall live in as much comfort and opulence on Mojave desert as in the valley of Santa Clara, in a ruined world as in one that has been conserved and handed down to them richer and greener and more abundantly fertile than we found it. They would oppose the construction of roads in the belief that mankind will soon fly and not need them.

If such as these are not living in a fool's paradise they are at least planning one for posterity to live in. It may well be that we should be not anxious as to what we shall eat or drink or wherewithal we shall be clothed, but there is no inhibition upon our being anxious for our children, and who are our children if not posterity? Mr. Thomas has sounded the call for a forward step. California should not be slow in taking it.

A LAW UNTO THEMSELVES.

Mr. C. Norman Fay, at one time head of the Chicago gas trust, in an article in the New York Outlook, reviewed the results of trust-busting effort and reached the following conclusions: that man cannot be forced to compete in trade; nothing can be gained for the public by making good financing difficult; rich, bold, brainy men will dominate and cannot be dominated; financiers are as responsive to public opinion as politicians; the nation is immensely indebted to its captains of industry; the crimes with which they are charged were parts of the commercial evolution of the day and only recently taboos; that the disturbing factors of size, tendency to monopoly and "magnateism" cannot outweigh the resulting power to serve the public cheaply and well; securing these benefits is more a matter of standard of management than of law, and that we are now having the same moral uplift within the trusts as in the government of cities; that personal integrity, unselfishness and fair dealing are characterizing great trust managers and that it is better to accept these professions in sincerity than to "lay the throttling hand of law upon the shrinking throat of trade."

Of the eleven conclusions reached by Mr. Fay at least ten are debatable, but space can here be found for considering only two. There is no man so strong that a united people may not dispute his supremacy. There is no moral uplift in nation, state, city or corporation that is not forced by power of public sentiment and that sentiment is generally crystallized into law. The law should not be "laid upon the shrinking throat of trade" unless that throat needs throttling, in which case the sooner the remedy is applied the better. There is no fact in human history subject to fewer exceptions than that power unrestrained will be used to extort and to oppress, and where a moral uplift has been experienced it was because the grip of law was first felt about the windpipe.

It seems probable that the size of corporations will be limited solely by the capacity of men successfully to manage them, but the power to serve cheaply and well affords no guaranty that the public will not be served dearly and ill. Eternal vigilance must be the price of good service and cheap, if not in all cases, then so generally as to make the exception prove the rule.

Significant News of the : : Week : : :

Disbursements of Dividends.

The quarterly payments of dividends and interest charges in New York afford a good indication of the financial health of the country. On April first this year the payments are reported to have totaled $155,000,000 against $140,780,000 on the same date last year. This growth is good, but more important than that is the statement that twenty-one corporations have put their stock on a dividend-paying basis for the first time and that eleven others that suspended dividend payments during panicky times have recommenced them. The financial patient is surely convalescing and needs only to have the tariff issue gotten out of the way to resume activity.

Uneasy Rests the Crowned Head.

Kaiser Wilhelm recently spoke in a strain of sadness of having to govern 40,000,000 persons who have 70,000,000 different ideas of how he ought to do it. The Fatherland is far from being in a pacific mood and Chancellor von Buelow is much ruffled. The press of army and navy is making new taxes necessary in Germany as well as in England and America, and there is a good deal of squirming under them. The Socialists are making themselves troublesome and the Chancellor has had to warn them that disorderly agitations will not be permitted and, if attempted, will be followed by more drastic legislation for their suppression. An inheritance tax is proposed and additional tariff taxes will be imposed upon both luxuries and necessities, if not alike on both. The world's burdens of taxation are becoming so unbearable as, it would seem, to force the nations to an agreed limitation upon armament.

The Fate of Serbia.

The powers of Europe have forced Serbia to abandon all opposition to the advance policy of Austria-Hungary, disband its volunteers, return the reservists to their homes and prevent the formation of guerrilla bands. Austria is to keep what it has got in peace, but it is not to take any more territory unless Serbia misbehaves, in which event Serbia is like enough to disappear from the map of Europe. It is not a well behaved country at best and its partition might not be an unmixed evil.

Lord Charles Beresford.

This Achilles has been sulking in his tent. He aspired to the command of the consolidated North Sea fleet but it was given to another, and he has been at outs with the British secretary in charge of naval affairs. The issue is the old one of the subordination of a first-class naval commander to an official whom General Sherman once denominated a clerk although by courtesy called a cabinet minister. Lord Beresford has taken full advantage of the German Dreadnaught scare and appears to have both public and parliamentary opinion to support him. A resignation of the present British ministry in the near future would not be a surprising event.

Oklahoma Indian Troubles.

The truth in relation to the difficulties between the authorities and the Indians in Oklahoma is not now in public possession and may never be. By the time tranquility is restored those who know the Indians' side of the issue are likely to be dead. The overt act which precipitated the trouble is reported to have been the firing by Indians upon some deputy sheriffs sent to arrest some negro and half-breed cattle thieves. That does not wear the look of a sufficient cause for Crazy Snake and his band going upon the war path. Indian Commissioner Leupp, in Washington, has said that the fault lay with white lobbyists at Washington who have deceived the Indians as to the probable policy of the government in relation to the Indians and their lands. When Commissioner Leupp shall have been heard from more fully the public will be in a better position to judge righteously. Some lives have been lost on both sides and much bad blood has been stirred up.

Tariff Progress.

There is no other one event upon which the nation is more solicitously hanging than that of tariff legislation. One prediction that comes to us is that the bill will be enacted and signed within six weeks. Another that Congress will still be in session August first. One is that the bill will be reported substantially as it was submitted by the Ways and Means Committee. Another that four men, two in the House and two in the Senate, are secretly making a new tariff bill that will be very different from the one before the House. One report is that the maximum and minimum idea will be carried through the whole bill and passed with it. Another is that the feature has proven wholly unworkable and is virtually dead already. The significance of this particular item of news of the week is that there isn't any reliable news on the subject, and none but the closest-in statesmen can foretell what the final result will be and they are not telling. If we could get next to Canavan and Payne, Aldrich and Hale, we should know all about it.

Deadlock In Illinois.

Illinois has been trying to elect a United States senator for nearly three months without avail. Senator Hopkins received, at the polls, a plurality of Republican votes cast in an advisory capacity, but the plurality was small and lacked so much of being a majority that the legislature declined to abide by the popular vote. However, Senator Hopkins has maintained the lead until lately. Hopkins has been classed as an "interests" man, and yet Theodore Roosevelt seems to have favored his candidacy. The man whom the people of Illinois want is Governor Deneen, but he will not allow his name to be used. The latest report is that the politicians have gotten together in favor of Roy O. West, chairman of the Republican State Committee. Unless he proves to be the winning horse of dark complexion the likelihood is that the legislature will adjourn without electing a senator. President Taft recalled public officials from lobbying for Hopkins at Springfield to attendance upon the duties of their respective offices.

Nebraska Follows Oklahoma's Lead.

The legislature of Nebraska has enacted a state guarantee of bank deposits law. It is Democratic in its origin and is modeled after the Oklahoma law, although less extreme in its provisions. It taxes the banks for the benefit of the guarantee fund only one-fourth of 1 per cent. on their average daily deposits each six months for two years. It goes into effect July first and the banking board entrusted with its management consists of the Governor, Attorney-General and State Auditor. Mr. Bryan was of counsel in preparing the measure.

A PERTINENT SUGGESTION.

If the reader would like to see The California Weekly prosper and become a permanent factor in California life and affairs there is a simple way in which he can lend a hand to that end. He can sit right down while he thinks of it and write out a list of names, with postoffice addresses, of persons whom he thinks might, upon closer acquaintance, become interested in the paper and a patron of it. We'll do the rest, and particularly we want the names of those who have growing sons, with that fact noted.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We have been advised to discontinue our "Deeper Significance of Living." What does the reader think about it? We have been advised that a journal devoted primarily to public affairs should have nothing to do with the deeper problems of life, the things that concern the souls of men, the relations of the seen to the unseen, of the finite to the infinite; that if people care for such things they should subscribe for a paper devoted to ethics or religion, that ethics and religion have no place in a paper that deals with politics and that the politics has no place in a paper that deals with the spiritual concerns of life. This department is believed by those who object to it to be out of place, incongruous, and some have looked upon it as an affront. Again, what does the reader think about it?

The department was established with the thought that it did not take up much space, that it would appeal to those who care for such things and that the rest would pass it by without stumbling over it; that one column out of forty-eight might profitably be devoted to thoughts and things a bit apart from the turmoil of life, apart from the concerns that to-day are and tomorrow are cast into the furnace and consumed. But if the consensus of opinion be that the space is wasted, that the stuff is not read, that it offends all and pleases none, it will be discontinued. The writer of it has no desire to sound his breath whistling down the wind. What does the reader think of it?

But let it be said that no man will avoid the eternal verities by ignoring them. They will not ignore him. Either there are or are not relations subsisting betwixt the individual soul and the power that orders the ways of the universe. If there are they are not to be escaped. If there are not, what is blackness anyhow and time spent in looking for the light will not be more miserably misspent than in blindly looking into that darkness.

The writer well remembers one beautiful star-lit night when he passed the door of a miserable old skunk the licentiousness of whose life had distorted every feature of his visage, but there he stood with head out under the heavens gazing up at the twinkling orbs as might a child. "I wonder," he said, "what those stars are thinking of me. I can hardly bear those thousands of eyes looking at me so, and yet I suppose that God looks down upon them as they do upon me." The writer has felt since then that there is, perhaps, no soul into which the deeper significance of life might not sometime come.

There is not an economist in America who will hold out the hope that our political life can ever be better than our commercial. There is not an ethical writer in America who will hold out the hope that our commercial life can ever be better than our religious. Our religious life has to do with the relations of the individual soul to the power that orders the universe. In its final analysis that relationship constitutes the "Deeper Significance of Living."

The basic fault with our political life is that it is pagan. To be sure our legislative sessions are opened with prayer, our witnesses in court and our inaugurations in office are consummated with an oath calling upon the Most High, but these solemnities have degenerated into formalities and few attach any holiness of sanction to them. They would be so had it the quality of paganism were the best, but the standards by which political activities are commonly judged are not only pagan but pagan of questionable quality. They measure character by results, not by the methods by which those results were obtained. In view of these facts does it seem incongruous, absurd, an affront, to invite any citizen to step aside for five minutes once a week that he may give a thought to the "Deeper Significance of Living?"

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Temperance In England.

The drunkenness of Great Britain has come to command the most serious attention of the best minds in Great Britain, without regard to the religious or moral issues involved, but solely with relation to the well-being of the nation. The condition of the British fighting man at the time of the Boer war brought the subject to the fore with a patriotic insistence. Accordingly the Asquith ministry brought forward a measure for restricting the number of licensed liquor-selling places in Britain. It was a moderate measure and gave those holding licenses to be cancelled full remuneration for their capitalized value. The measure passed the House of Commons by a decisive majority and, in the House of Lords, all the bishops present, with one exception, voted for it, yet the reform was voted down by the Lords. The explanation for the vote is that the banking interests, which have advanced so much money to breweries and distilleries, opposed the measure because it would tend to weaken the value of their securities, and for the further reason that the public revenue would be considerably curtailed. This action of the House of Lords has accentuated public impatience with that body, and the action of the banking interests has aroused indignation that considerations of neither morality nor patriotism can outweigh financial greed.

Not Opposed to Army or Navy.

There is a movement on foot throughout the country to resist the tendency to further enlarge the American navy. This movement lately secured the adoption, by the Massachusetts Senate, of a series of resolutions memorializing the President and Congress to this effect. It so happened that only seventeen out of forty members voted for the resolution. Senator Lodge and Governor Draper took alarm and brought such pressure upon the Senate as to cause it to reconsider and reverse its former action. Inasmuch as Massachusetts' opinion is a factor in national affairs this incident becomes important.

Financial Results In Des Moines.

Under the old form of city government Des Moines faced a deficit of $30,000 or more as each fiscal year drew to an end, and the year before the plan of government by commission was introduced, that city was confronted by unpaid bills amounting to $180,000 with no money in the treasury to pay them. The city government had been doing politics. The treasurer now reports $20,000 in the treasury and all bills paid. The city has been governed as a business by business men instead of as politics by political odd-jobs men.

The Jews In Finland.

The Finns have held the sympathy of the civilized world in their struggles for home rule in their own country and for that personal freedom of which the Russian elsewhere knows so little, but it seems that the Finns' love of liberty is for himself, not for others. The Finnish legislature has just enacted a code of laws governing the status of Jews in Finland. It is more liberal, to be sure, than usual elsewhere in Russia, but it makes the Jews a special, proscribed people not to be treated as other citizens. Until Finland wipes off its statute books all special legislation relating to the Jews it will have small claim for sympathy if Russia legislates specially for the Finns.

Punishment for Kidnaping.

Appropos of the Willie Whitla kidnaping several state legislatures have under discussion more stringent laws for punishing kidnaping. Following the Cudahy case several years ago Illinois and Nebraska made kidnaping a capital crime. Michigan is prevented making the offense capital because capital punishment has been prohibited in that state, but its legislature seems likely to make the offense punishable with life imprisonment at hard labor Chicago women have started a movement memorializing all legislatures still in session to strengthen their laws regarding this offense against the home. Unfortunately the crime is not to be legislated out of existence. It is catching them at it that counts. If every citizen were hurt for every lost child as though it were his own, that will prove a full remedy.

The Commerce of New Orleans.

As a commercial city New Orleans is not a Chicago, and yet it is at the mouth of a great river that drains the heart of the continent and at the point where the product of that great interior empire naturally should reach the sea. Some packet lines have been established between New Orleans and Mexico and between New Orleans and both the east and west coasts of South America, transshipping for the latter, of course, at the isthmus. The significant fact relating to the commerce of this city is that of exports valued at $158,455,219 only $3,784,868 were carried in American ships, and the river commerce carried on the bosom of the Mississippi is less now than it has been in half a century. For a number of years not a single steamer of the first class has been built for the up-river trade. American pride finds little gratulation in these facts. Instead of further improving the "Father of Waters," at great cost, it might be better to turn it over to the reclamation service to be cut up into irrigation ditches and scattered through the semi-arid West.

City Gardens For Slum Folk.

Among the many wise charities of Chicago perhaps none gives greater promise than that of opening truck patches for slum dwellers near the city. The McCormick Harvester company is furnishing 120 acres of land free and, this year, twenty acres of it will be cut up into 150 small gardens for the use of selected persons who need help. An experienced gardener will be placed in charge to show them how. The rental will be nominal. It will be good for their healths, their tables and their independence.

"Wet" and "Dry" Contests.

State wide prohibition was rejected last week by the legislatures of Massachusetts and Minnesota, but both states seem likely to strengthen local option laws. Of ninety-two counties in Indiana fifty-seven have voted themselves "dry," thirty-five by county option elections and twenty-two by remonstrances against granting licenses. Raleigh, North Carolina, is having a bad time in financing its schools as a result of state prohibition voted a year ago. Raleigh virtually had the Gottenburg system and a portion of the profit of the liquor business went to the schools. The citizens of Raleigh refused to vote a special school tax to take the place of the dispensary fund and, the school fund being exhausted, the public schools were closed the first of March and seem likely to remain closed until the beginning of the fall term. Mobile was in a similar fix but voted a special tax to get out of it.

Canadian Railway Financing.

The development of British Columbia is of more than passing interest to our own Pacific Coast. It will render possible extension of trade relations with California and, in view of the fact that tens of thousands of Americans are pouring into the Canadian Northwest, the development of that region may become big with national possibilities. The policy of Canada toward its railroads has been one of liberal subsidies and extensions of government credit. It gave vast grants of land to the Canadian Pacific and lent it outright many millions of money which, however, has been repaid, principal and interest. Canada subsidized the Grand Trunk Pacific far to the north of the Canadian Pacific and so helped it across and far into the prairie section. It is now stalled there unable to reach the mountains. London capital is not investing in bonds to cover further extensions and the Canadian government is asked to pledge its faith for an advance of $13,000 per mile across the remainder of the prairie section and is preparing to put its bonds on the market at 4 per cent. Then will come the coast mountain division. It is expected that Canadian credit will be extended to the final sum of $50,000,000, being three-fourths of the anticipated cost. Construction is of the best and grades of the lowest.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE PRICE THEY PAY

HOW SOME AUTHORS AND ARTISTS HAVE LEARNED THEIR TRADES.

Literature and the fine arts are regarded by many people as lazy vocations. The purpose of this article is not to prove that they are strenuous callings that require the hardest kind of application—sheer drudgery, most of it—flat to point out what these vocations cost their devotees before they can truly practice the—cost in years of struggle, hardship, and, often, of bitter mental anguish, for it is true that many men write their best works out of the cruelest of their own experiences. Before a man can write, he must have something to say; and before a man can have much to say about life he has to live either a good many years of life or live ninety to the minute for a shorter time. Some men crowd the emotions and experiences of a lifetime into a decade, and are thus prepared young with a message to the world and with an insight into life and character that belongs naturally to older men.

The Author of "Fagan."

A few contemporary examples of the precocious cost of these callings come to mind. When Collier's Weekly offered $5,000 for the best short story sometime ago, an absolutely unknown young fellow, about twenty-four years old, emerged from oblivion with "Fagan." Rowland Thomas was the writer's name, and his story won on its merits of wonderful fidelity in the portrayal of negro character, its local color of the Philippines, its dramatic action, and its technical excellences of unity and style. A great deal of wonder was expressed at the time that so young a writer could win against a field of mature experts with high reputations.

Much of this wonder disappeared when one met Thomas. His age was twenty-four, in years, but he looked thirty-five, and had lived it. He graduated from Harvard when he was twenty-one, and went directly to the Philippines in the educational service. Later he was made judge of a provincial court and was assigned to a circuit in a remote district of the islands. He stopped for a time in a little native village, sixty miles from another white man, and with no attendant but a Chinese servant. The hot sun of the tropics quickly took the pink New England color from his face, and a good deal of the New England vigor from his frame.

Sick 6,000 Miles From Home.

One day he decided to move on to the next village, and moped his mule to go. A hundred yards up the road he tumbled off in a faint, and came to a while later in his cabin, where the Chinaman had carried him. The amaebic dysentery had caught him, one of the most dangerous and most debilitating of the tropical diseases. For two months he lay in the cabin, attended by the Chinaman, two hundred miles by sea from Manila, the nearest place where a doctor could have been found, nearly a hundred miles from any white man, six thousand miles from home. A man lives a good deal in a short time under such circumstances.

At last he could walk a little, and with the help of the Chinaman got aboard a little native sailing canoe, in which he lay during two weeks' sail to Manila. When he got to the hospital the doctor said, "Young man, if you have lived through what you say you have there's no hope of my being able to kill you." Months passed before he could leave the hospital—months spent with convalecents who had their own tales to tell. Out of experiences like this, branded thus vividly into the fibre of the mind, came the knowledge that made "Fagan" possible.

A Recipe For Good Writing.

And the technical excellences may be explained by Thomas's answer to one who asked him how he learned to write. "I learned by sweating my life's blood out trying to make something good and sincere and human, and then having Barrett Wendell (the professor of English at Harvard) write across it in blue letters a foot long, ROT."

People wondered again when Upton Sinclair, frail, youthful, effeminate, burst into fame with "The Jungle." Whatever one may think of Sinclair personally, or of his book, one cannot deny the grip of its horrible realism nor the instant effect it had upon public sentiment and national legislation for pure food.

How Upton Sinclair Starved.

But his success was not the chance luck of a night. It was born of the grimmest kind of a struggle, not merely for fame, but for the barest necessities of life and of his starved heart. With a passion for fame and a belief in his starved admitted of no defeat, he fought for an education and fought for success, year in and year out, upon an annual income of about $400, which means that for years he hovered upon the stark edge of starvation. And "The Jungle" was not his first book. That was published when he was twenty-eight years old, but he had written five books before that: "Springtime and Harvest," "King Midas," "The Journal of Arthur Stimpson," "Frisco Hagen," and "Manassas." He had matured his style, but he had also matured his personality. "The Jungle" was hardly grimmer than the experiences he went through as a laborer in the stock yards at Chicago, from which he wrote it. He paid the price of his success many times over.

The Painter Van Perrine.

High up on the Palisades, overlooking the Hudson river and New York city, an artist named Van Perrine has a little studio, where he paints impressionistic pictures that a school of critics declare to be works of genius. Three or four years ago he got his pictures hung at the New Gallery in New York, and he has "arrived." He had paid the price, however. As a boy in Kansas he had crimped and denied himself every pleasure to buy the implements of his craft and to get the time to practice it. He beat his way to New York in a stock car, worked his way to Europe at hard labor on a ship, and studied his body in France to feed his mind on the masterpieces of painting. He came back to America as poor in pocket as when he started, but with a renewed zeal to achieve success. Success came slowly. Besides the rigors of life on starvation income, he had to endure adverse criticism, or, worse, neglect. Recognition brought money and fame, but the price he paid for the ability to practice was the price of a wrenching trial of character in fortitude and patience.

The Price of Being Black.

A book of essays and sketches of genuine literary merit, containing passages of great beauty and eloquence and pathos, appeared some years ago and went through five editions. It was called "The Souls of Black Folk," and its author was W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. Its preface contains a few sentences that explain the book and the author:

"Herein lie buried many things which if read with patience will show the strange meaning of being black here at the dawning of the twentieth century. . . . I have sought here to sketch, in vague, uncertain outline, the spiritual world in which ten thousand thousands of Americans live and strive. Leaving then the white world I have stepped within the Veil, raising it that you may view faintly its deeper recesses—the meaning of its religion, the passion of its human sorrow, and the struggle of its greater souls. . . . And, finally, need I add that I who speak here am born of the bone and flesh of the flesh of them that live within the Veil?"

This was written by a negro, a graduate of Harvard University and an honor man at that, a man of brilliant intellect, a man by every instinct a gentleman and with all the consciousness of a refined and cultivated nature, who, for being black, lives a life pitifully remote from people of his own intelligence and tastes. And this is a refinement of ironic tragedy, the tragedy of being a black man in America with a white man's capacities and culture. This, too, is an example of the price they pay, for his book is a melancholy reflection of the sadness of his life.

Ricalton's Adventures in the East.

Fortunately, most who pay the price pay it not in tragedy but merely in hard, oftentimes perilous, work. One man who has contributed a vast deal to the instruction of America is Ricalton, the photographer. For many years he has ranged up and down the Far East, from Ceylon to Manchuria, and his pictures, appearing in the magazines and books of travel, have done more than almost any other one thing to make these lands and their peoples familiar to the rest of the world. Ricalton has risked Indian pestilences, crossed Himalayan cataclysms on crazy rope bridges, narrowly escaped death at the jaws of crocodiles, has explored the jungles, has traveled for months on end through unknown remotenesses of China and India with none but native companions, and, during the Russo-Japanese war, repeatedly carried his camera into positions on the field of battle to which the Japanese officers refused to allow their men to venture. And Ricalton performed one obscure, though important, service to modern progress, for he is the man whom Edison commissioned to gather specimens of all eastern varieties of bamboo to be used in his experiments, one of the species sent by Ricalton furnishing the fibre from which were made the carbon filaments that demonstrated the possibility of commercial success of the incandescent electric light.

The task, then, of the man who successfully amuses the public, informs it, touches its emotions, or ennobles its life with a new example of esthetic beauty, whether in words or in the visual arts, is no mere light leap of inspiration seized at ease, but is a task whose achievement is born of intelligent use of materials forged of the harsher experiences of life—often of its tragedies—and always the result of hard, laborious effort for everything that we call beautiful, somebody has paid the price.

THE SACK OF THE GODS.

By Rudyard Kipling.

Strangers—drawn from the ends of the earth,
Jeweled and plumed were we,
I was the Lord of the Inca race, and she was the Queen of the Sea,
Under the stars beyond our stars, where the
reinsless meteors glow,
Hotly we stormed Valhalla, a million years ago.

Dust of the stars was under our feet, glitter of stars above,
Wrecks of our wrath dropped reeling down as we fought and we spurned and we strove:
Worlds upon worlds we tossed aside and scattered them to and fro,
The night that we stormed Valhalla, a million years ago.

She with the star I had marked for my own,
I with my set desire—
Lost in the gloom of the night of nights—withered by worlds afire—
Met in a war twist love and hate where the
reinsless meteors glow,
Hewing our way to Valhalla, a million years
ago.

SELF GOVERNMENT AT SAN DIEGO

ANOTHER EXPERIMENT IN "GOVERNMENT BY COMMISSION."

Machine control of politics in San Diego county has for years been personified by Charles Hardy, a wholesale and retail butcher, a man of clean private life and lovable personality. But politically he has consistently traded with the Herrin machine. Locally, the county officials that he put up have been, in the main, very satisfactory. This is because he uses local politics only as a means to play the larger game of state politics. In the wider field he is recognized as one of the shrewdest, subtlest, and most far-sighted of political manipulators. His advice is said to be much sought by Herrin, and many of Herrin's plans altered by it.

In 1906, a group of public-spirited men organized the Roosevelt Republican club in San Diego. (In passing it should be said that San Diego county is overwhelmingly Republican, and that any reform must come from independent Republicans.) George W. Marston, the principal merchant of San Diego, Judge Luce, and Judge Sloane were principals in the club. They sought to overthrow Hardy's control, and nearly succeeded that year in capturing the county Republican convention, being barely beaten by Hardy's skilful manipulation of the country delegations. Later these same men organized the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, and with it missed overturning Hardy by only about eighty votes.

Reform of City Charter.

These same men were also behind the movement that lately affected a radical reform of the charter of the city of San Diego. A series of charter amendments, amounting in effect to the making of a new charter, were submitted to the citizens at an election held January 12th last, and were carried by a heavy majority.

These amendments change the form of city government to, essentially a copy of the Galveston "commission" plan, and, as the legislature approved the amendments on January 26th, a few days before it approved the new charter of Berkeley, San Diego has the distinction of being the first city in California to adopt this advanced plan of government.

Ward System Abolished.

The amendments abolish the ward system of election of councilmen, substituting both nomination and election at large. One immediate practical result is the complete elimination from local politics of Councilman McNeil, who for more than ten years has represented the fifth ward where the saloon vote has held the power of election.

All past designations on the ballot are abolished, both at primary and general elections. The candidates' names are printed alphabetically, forcing a choice on the voter's knowledge of the men.

Government by Commission.

The number of councilmen is reduced to five. The Board of Public Works, the Fire Commission, and the Police Commission are all abolished, and their duties are vested in the council. The municipal business is divided into five departments: (1) Department of Finance, Ways, and Means; (2) Department of Police, Health and Morals; (3) Department of Public Streets and Buildings; (4) Department of Fire and Sewers; (5) Department of Water. Each member of the Common Council is made Superintendent of a Department. If the Council is unable to agree upon the assignments, the Mayor has authority to make such assignment. The Council elects the City Attorney, City Clerk, City Engineer, Chief of Fire Department, and such other officers and assistants as provided for by ordinance, and the Council has the right to remove them by a two-thirds vote. The purpose is to give the Council plenary control of city business and fix upon it corresponding responsibility.

Each councilman receives a salary of $2,000 a year, so that able men may be attracted to give their time to the work.

The only other officer who is elected (besides a Board of Education of five members, elected at large—reduced from eighteen, elected from wards—who serve without pay) is the city treasurer, whose salary is fixed at $2,000.

The amendments also provide money to insure the carrying out of the provisions for the recall, the initiative, and the referendum, that already exist in the charter.

The entire vote cast at the special election at which these amendments were carried was about 3,450, which is 50 per cent of the registration. In view of the stormy day and the small funds available for getting out the reform vote, this is considered a heavy vote.

Three Tickets at Primary.

The first primary election under the amended charter was held on March 23rd, and the result was a great encouragement to the reformers. Three tickets were in the field: the regulars, the independents (reformers), and the Socialists. The candidates for nomination for mayor were John F. Forward, regular, who received about 2,300 votes; Grant Conrad, reform, who received only 86 less votes than Forward; and W. J. Kirkwood, Socialist, who received only 1,100 votes. Forward and Conrad's names will appear on the ballot.

Forty-three candidates for councilmen were in the field. With one exception, no man not recognized as being on one of the informal tickets named above received more than a few hundred votes. The three receiving the highest number of votes (more than 2,000 apiece) were Claude Woolman, J. L. Sehon, and A. E. Dodson, all reformers. The two next highest were Theodore Barnes, and A. E. Graham, regulars. The next was Percival E. Woods, who was not on the reformers' ticket, but was known to be in sympathy with it. These six, and the four next highest, will be named on the ballot, five councilmen to be chosen from them.

Four candidates ran for the treasurer's nomination. The two highest, who will appear on the ballot as opponents, are F. F. Woodford, reform, who got more than 2,000 votes, and Don M. Stewart, regular, who got only 1,000.

The election will be held next Tuesday (April 6th). The deciding vote will be that of the labor element, which probably massed on the Socialist ticket in the primary but will now

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Over the Hill.

Over the hill, and a long way over;
Back to the land of the dew-kissed clover;
Back to the meadows that stretched so far
That they still looked up to the farthestmost star;
Back where the oriole built a nest
That rocked and rocked on the poplar's crest,
My heart is a straying, a riotous rover—
Over the hill, and a long way over.

Over the hill is a dim path straying
Unto the land where I went a-Maying,
Maying with little wee laddies and lassies—
Over the hill where the dim path passes.
Hey, but the morning was golden and airy!
Hey, but the world was the realm of a fairy!
Hey, but the meadow-lark sang in the clover!
Over the hill, and a long way over.

Over the hill the world was so cheery
Never a bairn of us murmured, "I'm weary."
Nay, but we played till the lengthening shadows
Beckoned us homeward from woodland or meadows,
Then, with the laughter that every care
smothers,
Nesting, we turned to the arms of our mothers.
Let us go back, oh, world-weary rover,
Over the hill, and a long way over.

Never a Man Can Tell.

"Would you publish a little outburst of poetry for me?" the melancholy man inquired.
"It's like this," he continued, as he observed that I hesitated, "Here some time ago you went and lifted a little lifeful lilt to our statesmen—that is, to our legislators, for I realize that some contend it is not the same thing.
In the course of that lilt you sang of the legislators that they 'average fairly white,' and said other and similar things which ought to put you at the head of the bovine class. That is the trouble with you poets: You are too suddenly loaded, and explode before the trigger is pulled. You couldn't wait for the legislature to adjourn before you tossed your bouquet. No, you had to chirp your chirp and lay your law without waiting to see whether the statesmen-legislators kicked over the traces and mired themselves in their own mud, which they did. Your sweet-voiced carol had hardly died away before they passed Grove
Johnson's change-of-venue bill and other acts which, as I blush readily, I refuse to name. So I have writ a second instalment of the lilt you published, to bring it up to date, and here it is.
Will you publish it?"

After some consideration, I have decided that the melancholy man's second instalment is justified by circumstances, and it follows:
Oh, I say again, as I said before, of the legislative crew,
That they "average fairly white," at least, 'tis fair to suppose they do,
Though some folks claim that they average black, while others maintain they're pink.
And others remark, with a long-drawn sigh,
"I do not know what to think."
They may be red, or they may be green, or dappled may be their style;
They may be spotted, with stripes between—a notion that makes me smile—
But whether they're that or whether they're this, it's useless on guesses to dwell,
For since they've covered themselves with mud, there's never a man can tell.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Did you ever pause to reflect how beautifully patient mankind is in enduring the sufferings of others?
We go to theaters an' shed bushels of tears over imaginary woes, but we brush against reel woe on any corner, an' all we do is to shy off from it.

When I blow in a dollar for my own pleasure an' then give a nickel to a hungry man, I hope the Lord notices—but not all the time.
True heroism ain't so much in the man that recks his life as 'tis in the lovin' woman that has to set around, wait an' be patient while he does it.

They said that Mrs. De Faste had no nat'ral affection, but she proved that 'twant so by namin' her cute little baby after her bull pup.
Trouble with most men that try to do right is that they're so apt to git to thinkin' that their way's the only way, an' yit I can't help bl'iev'in' they's sev'ral paths of rightness leadin' through this wilderness.

The longes' way round may be the shortess' way him, but they's mighty few men kin make their wives bl'ieve it at 3 o'clock in the mornin'.
The good book says to honor your father an' mother, but I know some children that would have to shut their eyes an' hold their noses to do it.

After she's rejected you, Reuben, you kin console yourself by reflectin' that they's jest as good fish in the sea as ever were caught, but 'tain't high so satisfyin' to notice that middlin' often they stay there.

The diff'rence 'twen men an' wimmen is this: If a man's self-made he boasts 'bout it;
if a woman's self-made the less that's said
'bout it the better she feels.

Concernin' of the Simple Life.

Concernin' of this Simple Life what poet fellers praises,
An' city scientists maintains our high emotions raises,
I wish to say I've tried the same out here at Skokholm Corner.

For further more than twenty years, an' every year forlornier
Than all the ones that went before. The things the poets praises—
The mooin' cows, the gamblin' lambs, the little dinky daisies
Is all right here, an' "nacher sings." (Them words a poet's quote is.)

At least, I reckon that it does; I don't have time to notice.

It is, "Whon there, Back!
Git up that, dern the luck!
That mule has tuck to buckin', an' the plow is in a chuck!"
An' the poets all may warble of retirin' from the strife,
But 'B' cause that I'm a victim of the reely Simple Life.

I read a book, "The Simple Life;" 'twas full of fetchin' kinks
Concernin' of the peaceful things what rooral parties thinks.

Let man retire upon a farm, it says, he needn't fear,
For while the days is glidin' by he'll git his heaven here.
Well, I'm retired upon a farm, a most retirin' cuss.

An' when the cows ain't got a cramp the mules has suthin' wuss.
The song of nacher, poets claims, here falls
in the way of the plow.

But what's the use of any song you ain't got time to hear?
Fer it's, "Whoa, thar! WHOA!
Golden rule! Won't you go!
I wish I had them poets here to learn a thing or so!"

The Simple Life the poets loves with some may make a hit,
But it ain't wootin' of me much—I'm too blame close to it.

Knew Her By the Description.

The good clergyman was laboring with an unsatisfactory member of his flock.
"There is One," he said, "who watches over you, guides you, directs you to the path in which you should walk, chides you for wrongdoing—Oh, my brother, you know to whom I refer."

"Yes, I do," said the meek little man whom he addressed "but—" he hesitated.

"Honestly, I don't think that you ought to drag my wife into a discussion of this kind."
With a weary sigh, the clergyman departed.

Advice to Ebenezer.

Above all, son, if you wish to avoid trouble, and you do, it will be well for you carefully to select the path through life that your pa didn't take. You need not mention it to your mother, but I have a little chart of your paternal pro-genitor's past career, and it looks like a map of the combined Himalaya mountains and Mediterranean sea, as drawn by the baby.
There are all sorts of side lines and little, iridescent paths leading to places that are nowhere in particular, but are labeled with red letters. Sometimes, on an evening, your pa takes a little time off in order to tell your ma what a remarkable man he is, but have you never noticed that he always forgets to mention these side trips? Yes, he does; his memory is so treacherous.

As you say, Ebenezer, your pa is a man of large experience, but you should not hold it against him, for he earnestly tries to forget it.
And, whatever his experience may be, it will not help you. No, for experience is a flame wherein everyone must burn his own finger or he will not believe it is there. My father, too, was a man of wide experience, but I think that I have enlarged the field of it considerably, and, heavens and earth, son, how it has pained at times!

So I say again, if you wish to avoid trouble select the path your pa did not. But you will not, and perhaps it is just as well, for it is in burning our fingers that we learn where the flame is located and how to pass safely by on the other side.

A Mistaken Impression.

At first I thought, I really did,
The Direct Primary bill
Was passed by legislators, who
First warped it at their will;
But since I've read a morning sheet
I've learned that readers all
'Twas not the "statesmen" passed the bill;
It was the Morning Call.

Harriman at the Gate.

"There's a man named Harriman at the gate," said the First Assistant, "and I don't know what to do with him."
"What's his record?" Saint Peter inquired.
"Well, he did up the Chicago and Alton railroad, and the yells of the stockholders have interfered with the music up here ever since that time."

"That's bad."
And he maintained a political bureau that was a permanent crime against civilization, his country and God."

"That's bad, too."
"And when he wanted to pocket more money he put up the rates, without consideration of the right and justice of it, and the widow, the orphan and the rest of the proletariat had to pay them."

"That was very bad."
"And he—"
"You needn't hurt my feelings by telling me more. Notify him that it is the subway for him."

"But—"
"Well?"
"But he objected to seeing a polo game on Sunday."

"Dear, dear!" sighed Peter. "Now such cases did use to puzzle me. But how I have adopted a regular plan in dealing with them."
"What is it?"

"Send him to the cellar, but inform him that he can come up and look through the gate once a week."
So it was arranged in that way.

These, or Naught.

So Palmanter is dead. Then let
The good he died, the aid he gave
To weary brothers whom he met.
The hand he reached the lost to save.
The peace he brought to eyes tear-dim.
Love's largesse for the great and small—
Let these things sing the praise of him.
Or there may be no song at all.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Peter Anthes, Sr., retired miner, 763 San Jose avenue.
 Theodore Binner, plasterer and decorator, 648 Ashbury street.
 Charles K. Blender, real estate dealer, 714 Castro street.
 James R. Cashman, clerk, 1210 Waller street.
 Joseph Dixon, clerk, 2000 Steiner street.
 George G. Gillespie, building contractor, 2204 1/2 Devisadero street.
 James Granville, retired machinist, 4227 Eighth street.
 Michael Maguire, retired hay and grain merchant, 281 Page street.
 Charles H. Suydam, wholesale grocer, 2201 California street.
 Robert B. Symington, civil engineer, 228 Liberty street.

Above are the names, occupations and residences of ten men who have been sworn as jurors to hear and pass upon the evidence against Patrick Calhoun. In addition to these ten who will serve as jurors, Otto T. Hildebrecht, a retired designer, of 170 Belvedere street, has been passed subject to peremptory challenge. So it will be seen that the case has made noteworthy gains during the past week, and, although the prosecution still may exercise one peremptory challenge, and the defense six, it now appears hopeful that the opening statement to the jury may be made in little, if any, more than three months after the labor of securing a jury began.

Recent interest in the Calhoun case, however, has been centered, not upon the notorious work of securing a jury, but upon what may be denominated a side issue. Detective Burns, becoming convinced that papers and reports were being stolen from the prosecution, secured the issuance of a search warrant to enable him to find them. Acting under this process, he found the stolen property—in the possession of William M. Abbott, attorney for the United Railroads, and Luther Brown, chief of the United Railroads' detective agency. In the keeping of these two men were discovered 1,693 documents purchased by and belonging to the prosecution. The greater number of these were verbatim copies of reports concerning veniemen made to the prosecution, but more than a hundred were the original documents.

This thievery had continued since last October, and the method of its operation was simple. In consideration of a weekly payment of $50, and a promise of $5,000, Rex N. Hamlin, Mr. Burns' private secretary, turned traitor to his employer, stole the documents and turned them over to Albert McKinley, a United Railroads' employee, by whom they were passed on to Jerry Van Wormer, another United Railroads' employee, whence they went to their higher-up destination. McKinley and Van Wormer also received a weekly payment of $50 each for their services, and it transpires that Van Wormer was receiving an additional payment from Abe Ruef, but Hamlin was not aware of the fact.

Later developments implicated Frank J. Murphy, Ruef's former attorney, as also a receiver of some of this stolen property. It also was discovered that E. A. Platt, formerly in Burns' employ, had sold duplicate copies of his reports to John Helms, at one time head of Calhoun's detective bureau, and J. H. Handlon, claims' agent for the United Railroads, and William McBrin, an employee, who were implicated. The nine men now are under arrest upon charges of grand larceny or receiving stolen goods, and are, with the exception of Hamlin, out on bail. All of the cat-paws in the matter, except Van Wormer, have confessed, and the case looks clear.

A side issue of the main side issue was developed when, after Judge Murasky had issued an order to restrain the officers from further search, they went ahead with the opening of Calhoun's and Abbott's safes, claiming that proper service of the restraining order had not been made upon them as the complaint was not read to them. This has resulted in contempt proceedings which still are in progress before Judge Murasky.

During the week William D. Harrington, a saloon-keeper, was sentenced to five days in jail for contempt in asking juror Charles K. Blender if he was going to hang Calhoun. Harrington now is serving his sentence.

Eleven men have been sworn to serve as jurors in the case of Adolph S. Newburgh, charged with attempting to bribe a juror to vote for the acquittal of Abe Ruef.

MORE NAPOLEON STORIES.

"Bonaparte is never more than a quarter of an hour at table," says Roederer, "when he has a few guests. He is never more than half an hour at the most elaborate dinners. Only one course is served, which includes entrees, roast, and entremet; then comes the dessert."

Soon after he was made Consul Napoleon was told that his dinners were too brief; he lengthened them by some minutes. I remarked to him: "General, you have become less hurried at table." "Power is already corrupting me," he rejoined.

After Napoleon became Emperor Roederer continued to serve him and to enjoy his confidence. On one occasion, while bitterly censuring his brother Joseph's conduct as King of Spain, and especially Joseph's belief that he possessed military ability, Napoleon gave vent to this outburst:

"Kings and Princes ought never to command their armies. If I command mine it is because it is my special fate. When the King commands the soldier does not feel that he is being commanded. The army feels what he does, just as it would feel the Emperor. When one is not a General and is a King it is necessary to give Generals a free hand. Alexander of Russia is a General, though he knows more about it than the King of Spain; he knows manoeuvring thoroughly and commanding to a marvelous degree. And yet he never inconvenienced his Generals. Benito begged him ten times to leave the army. Generals do not take upon themselves the responsibility of orders in which they have no confidence; such orders are badly executed."

A local reporter in describing a wedding says: "Among the presents were many beautiful articles of cut glass, including a magnificent diamond ring, the gift of the bridegroom to the bride."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Where Is Gillet Going to Get Off? The thirty days succeeding the adjournment of the legislature may not determine what Governor Gillet's political future is going to be, but it may easily determine whether or not he is to have any political future at all. Under the plan to maintain the thrall of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau it may be possible for the head of that bureau to make further use of the present governor of California, unless he makes such use impossible by signing a lot of bad bills, notably the change of venue and the Wheelan bills. It is not beyond the subtleties of politics that the change of venue bill was put through the legislature for the express purpose of giving the governor a chance to save the state from disgrace. Be that as it may the signing of that bill and the Wheelan bills, together with Wright's bill transferring the franchise graft from cities to the state legislature (where pickings have been lean of late) will make such an end of James N. Gillet that he will no longer be serviceable to the "organization" or anyone else.

Eighteen Millions For Automobiles The piece de resistance of the Gillet administration is the submission to the people of a proposal to issue $18,000,000 of state bonds for the construction of "speedways for automobiles. That is what the road building will amount to and it will have in its favor every owner, manufacturer and seller of automobiles. The automobile has come to stay. It is a good thing. It is entitled to have good roads to trundle over but, the world over, it has reduced the problem of road-making to chaos. There is no sort of road that human ingenuity has yet contrived that will withstand the ravages of that machine. Such a road must be found. Had the governor proposed the issuance of $500,000 in state bonds to be expended in experiment and research for the purpose of learning how to build roads the automobile cannot run on, all men would have praised him, but to venture eighteen millions on constructing a system when no man knows, or pretends to know, how to build permanent roads is as wildcatish a proposal as was ever submitted to a sane people.

The Cost Of It Not the Worst The state engineer is to have sole power to locate the roads beyond the very general stipulation that they are to run up and down the interior valley and up and down the coast. This is a considerable power to put in the hands of one man. He also has the power to establish plants for the manufacture of road material as well as to construct the roads. The counties pay the interest the state must maintain the road ever after. To do this the engineering department will have in its hands a political machine second in size only to that of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. Practically every mile of road will have a political heeler maintained by the state. Those cognizant of the power that road-making has given to county supervisors in the dispensing of political patronage will only have to multiply that power by five, eight, the number of counties in the state, and then again by five, the number of supervisors on a board, in order to determine how much more political power the head of the state engineering department will have than has the supervisor of his district. And that power of patronage will be added to that of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company unless the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League succeeds in shaking that bureau loose from the throat of the state.

Reformatory or Penitentiary In point of intelligence and productive influence outside of political affairs the Commonwealth Club is probably the strongest body of citizens in this state. Its purpose is to further the highest interests of California. It got behind such a revision of the penal code as would make the establishment of justice possible. Only one of these measures became a law, and that without its companion measure, which made things worse than they were, of which more anon. Mindful of the disgraceful condition of California's penal institutions the Commonwealth Club proposed the establishment of a State Reformatory. The bill expressly provided that the State Board of Political Performers, to whose dereliction the bad condition of our penal institutions is chiefly due, should have nothing to do with it. However the performers flouted the Commonwealth Club and procured the enactment of a law referring the whole matter to the State Board of Prison Directors with instructions to report thereon two years hence. Who, except the State Board of Prison Directors, and the legislature of California, is so ignorant as not to know that a reformatory is indispensable to a penal system?

A Good Joke On the Commonwealth Club One of the Commonwealth Club's wares for facilitating the enforcement of law in this state was a bill prohibiting the farcical, time-killing and treasury-bankrupting proceeding of trying the grand jurors for possible bias against the defendant rather than the defendant for the offense with which he is charged. As a compensatory measure, for taking from the defendant this tactical advantage, the Commonwealth Club offered a bill authorizing the presence in the grand jury room of a sworn stenographer to take down the testimony and furnish the defendant a copy of it at the cost of the county. This measure, being in the interest of the defendant, passed both houses. The other, being in the interests of the People of California, was voted down. About the only way to secure legislation in the interests of establishing justice will be to make district attorneys ex-officio members of the legislature that they may stand off their brethren of the bar who make their livings by saving prison such of their fellow citizens as should be in prison.

Brakebeam, Bad Wagon A new section was added to the penal code, a very good one, too, which provides that, "Every person who climbs upon, holds, or attaches himself to any engine tender, freight or passenger car shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." If only the legislature had gone further and included the railroad political bad-wagon it would have caught as choice a lot of hobos as were ever snaked from brakebeams. Why this injurious discrimination?

Are They Caught On Their Own Hook? Section 587c of the penal code reads thus: "Every person who fraudulently evades, or attempts to evade the payment of his fare, while traveling upon any railroad, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Query, does this apply to legislators who, being prohibited from riding on passes, habitually ride on slow train tickets supplied free by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company? Every such legislator "fraudulently evades the payment of his fare" without a doubt. If it is included the measure is not too drastic. Otherwise it is, though the offense is one that needs some punishment.

National Guard Emergency Fund Heretofore, when the National Guard was called into service, it had less money than ammunition at its command and had to march on credit. The late session of the legislature gave the national guard whatever it wanted, including the appropriation of three times as much money for its headquarters office building in San Francisco for the accommodation of state officers and commissions, a very dubious proceeding. It also appropriated $100,000 to be set aside in the state treasury as an emergency fund. "When, in the opinion of the governor, an emergency arises," in case of, "insurrection, invasion, tumult, riot or imminent danger thereof." While this amount of cash will not go far it will at least serve to get the boys together and move them to the scene of action.

Easier For Cities To Condemn Property One of the good things the late legislature did was to so amend Section 1251 of the Code of Civil Procedure as to permit municipalities to have six months from the date of entering judgment of condemnation in which to vote bonds, sell them and pay the adjudged value of the private property sought to be taken for public use. This provision was almost indispensable to the acquisition of such property.

Something For The Farmer The tribulations which farmers sometimes have with cut-throat commission houses were sought to be mitigated by a law requiring that, upon the written demand of the consignee, the commission dealer shall return a true statement of the persons to whom the produce was sold, and the price received in each instance, provided that the statement shall not be required where the cash sales were less than fifty dollars. It is to be doubted if this law will furnish the relief desired. A thieving commission merchant will so cook his statement as to deceive the very elect and an honest one will be just as honest without the law as with it. The only safe way is to consign nothing to any house whose reputation is not above questioning.

Cold-Storage Products Must Be Confessed If any fear was felt that this legislature would weaken, by amendment, the pure food legislation enacted two years ago, it was a baseless fear, because the only thing done has been to strengthen that legislation. One of the new regulations is that eggs and chickens which have been in cold storage must be marked to indicate that fact. Another amendment requires articles of food to conform to the standards of purity established by the United States government.

A New Door To The State Treasury A precedent for the direct appropriation of money from the state treasury to construct harbor improvements was set after the fire and earthquake in San Francisco. Up to that time all improvements had been made at the expense of the revenues of the harbor. Now the legislature has appropriated $100,000 to be spent in building a section of seawall at San Diego, and a new door into the state treasury has been fairly opened.

UP AND DOWN : THE STATE : :

E. B. Willis, who has been in the newspaper business these many years, has sold the Placer County (Auburn) Republican to Andrew E. Falch, of Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin. Probably Mr. Willis now dreams of a vacation, rest, a ranch of his own, etc., for such is the form that a newspaper toller's dream usually takes, but it is dollars and nickels that he will be back in the old harness again.

In San Joaquin county they are working captured hoboes and minor criminals on the public roads, and report has it that the plan works so well that tramps avoid the county as they would if it were pestilence-infested. Similar reports come from Bakersfield, and Hanford has decided to try the plan.

Luther Burbank, of whom it was announced some time ago that he had been incorporated, comes out with a statement that he is not a corporation. Such a plan was under serious consideration, but there were obstacles which it was found difficult to overcome, and so we still may look upon the brain of Luther Burbank as being the property of a man, and not of a corporation.

Some California towns are arranging to celebrate Arbor Day by planting trees and otherwise beautifying themselves. Doubtless this is the best way of celebrating Arbor Day, and if all of our towns should follow the lead of these certain ones, it would be the better for everybody concerned.

The Southern Pacific company now has 3,000 men, scattered from Newcastle to Colfax, engaged in tunneling for the new route through the Sierra, and it is understood that about $10,000,000 will be expended before the enterprise is completed.

If eucalyptus does what is claimed for it in furnishing a hard-wood supply, it is evident that California intends to do its full share in that direction. Scarcely a paper comes in from the central valleys that does not tell of eucalyptus-growing projects. One of the latest of these is involved in the purchase of 2,800 acres of land on Grizzly Island from J. W. Dutton, F. N. Chaplain being the purchaser. Mr. Chaplain intends to plant at least 500,000 seeds of this land to eucalyptus within the next few months.

The Stockton-Modesto electric road has secured rights of way for an extension of its line to Riverbank and Oakdale.

Sutter county this year is making the best record in its history in the matter of planting fruit trees and vines. It is estimated that no less than 1,200 acres will be set out. Of these about 500 acres will be planted to grapes, 400 to Tuscan cling peaches, and about fifty to apples.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Some years ago I was appointed library trustee. Being a busy woman and living at a distance from the library, my low attendance over the years was a running way. I said one day: "Well, I suppose I'll have to pay my fine. I don't see why you should send the librarian to my gate you spend enough time and enquire in the service of the library to make up for the rest you give the city. That would be reasonable to me and I returned over due books several times without paying a fine. The day, in thinking over the San Francisco graft case, I struck me that I was indulging in the practice of graft, myself. Not only was I doing something dishonest, but I was causing some one else, who was in a way at my mercy, to commit any wrong doing, for library trustees, according to law, receive no remuneration. Thereafter I paid my fines.

E. F.

National City, March 24, 1909.

The "Beginnings of Graft" are certainly elemental. As the same "something for nothing" mania, which prompts newsmen to "shoot crabs with penknives, accuse the speculators in Wall street, so the pocketing of petty perquisites by legislators and other officials is a manifestation of the same mania for special privileges and immunities that has made American municipal government a humiliation to civilization and governments of states and nation a reproach to American statesmanship. The grafts, of themselves, would be beneath notice if they did not tend to so blind the moral vision as to prevent our distinguishing right from wrong in the larger relations of public life. For instance, the writer of this found that the raiding of the state treasury by the legislative body, the greater two years ago, cost his cottage home only sixteen cents in excess of reasonable legislative needs, but it was right to fight that petty graft because its existence obscured the moral vision of legislators in larger grafts. Yet there is a risk of weakening influence by being over exacting. The writer's horror of alcohol was not accentuated by the statement of his Sunday school teacher that drinking apple juice, taken directly from the cider mill, was sinful because fermentation had already begun.

Editors California Weekly:

After reading your remarks under "Right to Work Convention," I decided to withhold comment upon your paper until I ascertain your views on that issue more clearly. The problem, of course, reaches to the foundation of the Republic. Able though The California Weekly is it cannot give space for a full discussion of this subject, but it may be possible to give a brief outline of its attitude.

Respectfully,

J. A. MOORE,

Waller street, San Francisco.

"Why stand ye here all the day idle?" was asked many hundreds of years ago and the answer given then was a full explanation of the reason why. "Because no man hath hired us."

Only one person in sixteen born into the world possesses enough of executive ability to make him his own employer. For the other fifteen out of each sixteen work must be cut out, wages provided, the product disposed of and the wages fund renewed. This makes us our own employer. The keeper of the executive function has found its inspiration in that love of power which wealth gives, the exhilaration which rejoices a strong man in winning a race. It is a God-given impulse—the ten talents given to be profitably employed. It rests upon individuality and voluntariness associated with Society as a whole has it not. That element in industry cannot be democratized. It requires a free field and unhampered opportunity. The only restraint that can be put upon it safely is that it shall not be predatory, that it shall obey just laws, that it shall not reap where it has not sown and that it shall not hedge its accumulations about by such barriers as shall prevent the free flow of capacity from poverty to wealth and of incapacity from wealth to poverty. The basis of it all is that property, honestly acquired, shall be protected, without which initiative has no inspiration and the world stands stagnant, idle and hungry. Does this make it clear to our correspondent where we stand?

To The California Weekly:

What I want, and what I think the people in general want, in a newspaper, is The Truth, reliable reports on general matters so that I can act understandingly and when the people are thus informed they generally act right. So far as they have been able to judge The California Weekly meets that demand.

Yours truly,

STEPHEN BARKER.

Gilroy, California.

In our judgment Mr. Barker has struck the keynote of the journalistic need of our time. Thoughtful persons have been surfeited with the sensationalism of the spectacular. The newspaper's scream has gotten on their nerves. They do not care for the paper that "eats 'em alive." They do want the truth plainly told and the events of the week sanely explained. It was to supply this need that The California Weekly was established. In the execution of the idea the hope has been that we shall be able to make a paper that will be sane without being dull, informative without being heavy. How well we are succeeding is for our patrons to judge.

Hichborn's History.

Something of a sensation has been created throughout the state, but more especially among the politicians who have just ended their labors in Sacramento. By the announcement that Franklin Hichborn will bring out, probably, some time in May or June, a history of the legislative session just ended. Under ordinary circumstances such an announcement would not profoundly stir the hearts of the men chosen to be the subjects of a literary work of this character; but the circumstances are not ordinary and the writer of the book is not an ordinary man.

Franklin Hichborn is one of the best-informed, most fearless—if the adjectives be susceptible of comparison—and least prejudiced writers in California. He carries his lance high in the air, and he has the eye of an eagle and the instincts of a sleuth. He has chosen a cracking big subject, full of tremendous possibilities. Situations that arose during the session just ended—many of them—were pregnant with portent; results—ah! who can say?

The Hichborn history will be one of the most dramatic stories ever related on the Pacific Coast; and being history, not fiction, and of intense and immediate interest to thousands upon thousands of men who are wondering just what actually did happen at Sacramento, after all, there is not the slightest doubt whatever that it will be eagerly read. Truth always was, and still is, stranger than fiction; and truth, dressed in attractive habiliments is generally a welcome visitor, except to the homes and hearts of men who know not this virtuous maiden. Nobody who has ever paid any attention to the writings of Franklin Hichborn needs to be told that the truth he is preparing to tell about the doings of the statesmen and others at Sacramento during the first ten weeks of this year 1909 will be bewitchingly attired.—Pacific Outlook.

In the Outing Magazine for April the following list of the recreations of actors and actresses is given: William Gillette, to overcome his chronic nervousness, walks five miles every afternoon. Miss Frances Starr and Miss Blanche Bates take daily horseback rides. John Drew plays "squash." James K. Hackett, who possessed considerable lacrosse prowess while at college, pulls weights in a gymnasium; Robert Edeson, known in the profession as the "muscle mad" actor, drives an automobile at least twenty miles a day. E. H. Sothern spends an hour with the mails.

Frank McIntyre spends an hour and a half daily in the Y. M. C. A. gymnasium; H. B. Warner boxes at the New York Athletic club and follows it up with a swim in the tank; and Robert Montgomery "settles-up exercises" out of doors for half an hour.

have to choose between the regulars and the reform Republicans.

One thing appears clearly from the experience not only of San Diego but of Berkeley as well: whatever the form of primary or of ballot, votes must be massed on prearranged tickets to be effective. The problem of reform is still the problem of concentrating public sentiment on sound men and fighting their election through. Reformed characters do not automatically produce reformed administrations. They only provide simpler machinery for giving the public a chance, when aroused, to get rid of bad men and put in good men.

By WILLIAM THOMAS.

Section 1 of Article I of our state constitution provides that, "all men are by nature free and independent," without making any distinction between married and unmarried men, and it also provides that they have certain unalienable rights, among which are the rights of "acquiring, possessing and protecting property." This property right includes all constitutions. It is properly called a "declaration of rights." It stated no new principle, nor did it mean in stating the principle in such terse terms that the right was an absolute one; that it could be enjoyed without regard to the rights of one's neighbors or of the public.

Long before the enactment of our constitution, or any constitution, the right of a legislative body to restrain the use of private property so that such use would not injure the public was clearly defined by the courts as a necessary and proper exercise of what it called the "police power." This police power was founded upon the old common law maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly refused to give a comprehensive definition of the term "police power," preferring to act upon the facts of each case as it might come before them. But even if not applicable to all cases, the following definition gathered from the language used by a number of courts will give a good idea of the possible extent and application of the rule recognizing the existence of such a power.

"Police Power" Defined.

It is the "general power of the government to preserve and promote the public welfare by prohibiting all things hurtful to the comfort, safety and welfare of society, and establishing such rules and regulations for the conduct of all persons, and the use and management of all property as may be conducive to the public interest."

The exercise of this power has grown to tremendous proportions and each year marks a new infringement of what we are pleased to call our inherent and constitutional rights, and to-day there has swept over the United States a wave of pure police, prohibition and anti-trust laws, and our so-called inherent right to eat what we like, to drink what we like, or to make such contracts as we choose to make is infringed and restrained by laws designed for the protection of the public and supported under the doctrine of police power.

This power must, of course, be exercised reasonably. No one can exactly define what is a reasonable use of this power until the particular acts sought to be limited or restrained are laid before him, and after all the question as to whether or not the restriction is reasonable or not will depend materially upon the mind of the individual judge, or the minds of the individual judges who ultimately pass upon the question of reasonableness. The supreme court of one state might say that certain legislation restricting the cutting of trees upon private property was a reasonable exercise of the police power, and the statute in the same form might be deemed by another supreme court to be an unwarranted interference with the rights of private ownership.

Legal Limits of Legislation.

In seeking what legislation can be passed which will prevent the ultimate entire destruction of the forest lands held in private ownership, we may feel our way gradually, adding restriction after restriction until we reach the point where we cannot persuade a court of last resort that the restriction is a reasonable one, and in all attempts to legislate along this line experts in forestry must be able to point out one reason for a reasonable proposition, and that is that the denudation of the forests of this country will in time render such country arid, incapable of producing profitable agricultural crops, or that such denudation will destroy other valuable interests which the public are entitled to enjoy, such as the water power, which forms one of the valuable assets of this state. For the proof on this point we would have to depend upon experts in forestry, but I am informed that their testimony would be conclusive so far as any expert testimony can be called conclusive.

Commercial Importance of Forestry

Many years ago in a discussion among forestry experts it was practically admitted that Spain had fallen to the rank of a fifth class nation, solely on account of the fact that the destruction of its forests had destroyed its agriculture.

I have also been told that the admirable forestry system of the Empire of Germany has resulted in a marked improvement in the producing capacity of its agricultural lands.

I mention these simply as historical facts tending to support the testimony of any experts who might be called to prove the existence of a premise which I consider absolutely essential to the validity of any restrictive laws. In what body or bodies must we look for legislation restricting the use of forest lands held in private ownership? The right of the Federal Congress to interfere under the clause of the Federal Constitution which empowers it to regulate commerce is doubtful.

In the sugar trust case the Supreme Court of the United States in 1895 declared that manufacture and commerce must be distinguished; that manufacture preceded commerce, but did not form a part of it. This construction would probably cut out all federal control of forest lands held in private ownership, even if the trees growing thereon were cut for the purpose of manufacturing lumber to be sold and transported into other states, territories or foreign countries. Those favoring restrictive legislation must look to the legislative bodies of the various states for relief.

Through the medium of the governors' convention, in which the chief of the forest service took such a prominent part, a system of legislation could be readily devised as uniform as the slightly different needs and rights of the various states would permit. The best preliminary advice as to what would be reasonable and what would be unreasonable legislation could be obtained from such chief of the forest service. He would know best what restrictions would so absolutely restrict the private owner the value of his forest lands as to make the legislation obnoxious to the Fifth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, and the provisions similar thereto which now appear in nearly all the state constitutions. He would know best what legislative restriction would be valuable for the preservation of forests, and yet only restrict the use, defer some of the anticipated profits, or even cause the owner some actual loss of profit.

Legislation which causes delay, but not deprivation, is valid under the police power of the state. It may restrict the use, it may defer anticipated profits, it may even cause some loss of profit, but if it leaves to the owner his lands free, their product and increase untouched and without diminution of title, estate or quantity, the legislation is valid.

The Maine Supreme Court Decision.

Under the constitution of Maine the legislature may require from the members of the supreme court "their opinion upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions." Such an opinion was asked for and given in the spring of 1907 on the following questions, which I condense:

In order to promote the common welfare by preventing droughts and freshets, by protecting the natural water supply, by preventing injurious erosion, may the legislature—
First, regulate or restrict the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild or uncultivated land?

Second, prohibit, restrict or regulate the wanton, wasteful or unnecessary cutting or destruction of small trees growing on wild lands in case such small trees are of equal or greater actual value standing and remaining for their future growth than for immediate cutting, and such trees are not intended or sought to be cut for the purpose of clearing and improving such land for use or occupation in agriculture, mining, quarrying, manufacturing or business or for pleasure purposes or for a building site?

The answer to these questions was in favor of such legislation, and although such answer is not a decision in the strict sense of the word, it is the only opinion touching directly upon the validity of legislation restricting the use of forest lands.

In the opinion, the supreme court likened the proposed legislation to that which limits the heights of buildings, which prohibits the erection of wooden buildings within specified limits, which authorizes the destruction of buildings without compensation to prevent the spread of fire, which prohibits the erection of "spite" fences, the wasteful burning of natural gas by the owner, which prohibits one from allowing weeds to grow on his own land, which restricts the owners of private oyster beds from taking oysters from them, and which prohibits the flow of water from a private artesian well except for certain specified beneficial purposes, such as irrigation or domestic use.

Examples of Public Control.

The validity of the statute which limits the right to all of the waters flowing from a private artesian well was decided in our state by the district court of appeals for the second division on August 17, 1907. The opinion of Justice Allen restricts the use of water along the same lines in which some of us hope to see the use of forest lands restricted.

The Hudson River Water Company, a New Jersey corporation, laid mains for the purpose of carrying water from certain New Jersey streams in New Jersey to Staten island, in the state of New York. The state of New Jersey on May 11, 1905, after reciting the need of preserving the fresh water of the state for the health and prosperity of its citizens, provided that it should be unlawful for any person to carry the same into any other state for use therein. The state of New Jersey enjoined the water company from carrying out its plan, and in discussing the case Mr. Justice Holmes of the Supreme Court of the United States in April, 1908, said:

Supreme Court on Such Control.

"It sometimes is difficult to fix boundary stones between the private right of property and the police power when, as in the case at bar, we know of few decisions that are very much in point. But it is recognized that the state as quasi-sovereign and representative of the interests of the public has standing in court to protect the atmosphere, the water and the forests within its territory, irrespective of the assent or dissent of the private owners of the lands most immediately concerned. . . .

"The constitutional power of the state to insist that its natural advantages shall remain unimpaired by its citizens is not dependent upon any nice estimate of the extent of present use or speculation as to future needs. The legal conception of the necessary is apt to be confined to somewhat rudimentary wants, and there are benefits from a greater river that might escape a lawyer's view. But the state is not required to submit even to an aesthetic analysis. Any analysis may be inadequate. It finds itself in possession of what all admit to be a great public good, and what it has, it may keep and give no one a reason for its will."

This opinion, together with that given by the Supreme Court of Maine to the Senate of that state, are the only ones I can find on the question before us, and the reference to forests in the latter opinion is a mere digression.

Neither state any new principle, as can be seen by reference to the legislation restricting

CLOSING SOME HETCH-HETCHY ARGUMENTS.

Berkeley, March 23, 1909.

The California Weekly:

Doctor Bade's article, and your editorial on a nature lover's view of Hetch-Hetchy are both valuable contributions to the discussion of an important question. The three queries in your editorial prompt the expression of an opinion.

First of either the public or the bay cities must make great sacrifice, it should surely not be the public. In fact it is a question, perhaps, whether the bay cities would be sacrificing anything by giving up the Hetch-Hetchy plan, as one can scarcely be said to sacrifice what one does not own. The only sacrifice involved would be the sacrifice of a prospect of profit at public expense, and we are being taught nowadays that such is not sacrifice, but a civic duty—to yield the smaller interest to the larger.

The main value of the Hetch-Hetchy to the bay cities lies in the fact that by an act of the national government a few years ago this region is national property—and therefore cheaper to obtain than it otherwise would be. If national property, reserved for national use, can be given away with property to cities for their use and enjoyment, it can with equal propriety be given to corporations. If it were the Southern Pacific company which wanted Hetch-Hetchy, for whatever laudable purpose, there would be no question raised of whether the public or the company should make a "sacrifice."

The public in yielding this property to the bay cities sacrifice not only a principle, but a trust. It is maddening to hear this talk of wasting this playground of the people upon "a few tourists." What right have we to deprive future centuries of the opportunity to enjoy something that we are now too preoccupied to appreciate? Is California always to be as scantily populated as it relatively is today? Where hundreds go now will there not be thousands who will travel through our Sierras? Was not Yosemite itself once almost inaccessible, except to "a few tourists?"

And will not roads be sometime built back and forth across our mountains, as they have been among the Alps, so that their beauties will be accessible to all? We have no right to deprive those who shall follow us of one item of this magnificent pleasure ground. Imagine some Alpine valleys turned into "beautiful mountain lakes" to provide a water supply for—Rome, let us say.

Are there other adequate outing grounds without the Tuolumne watershed? Let one travel among our Sierras from Whitney to Shasta, and then go to the Tuolumne. He will probably say that saving Yosemite alone (which is a part of the Tuolumne region and one of its gateways, though in another drainage basin) there is no feature of the Sierra which could not more easily be spared. The surpassing beauty of the long Tuolumne meadows with its many bays, its ease of access and the accessibility from it of the noble mountains Dana, Lyell, Gibbs, McClure, and of innumerable other points of interest, make it unique. Even after sixty miles of staging, the Kern Canyon can be reached only by trail, with its animals. Even with the new road into the Kings Canyon it will be a long, hard journey there. But a good wagon grade already crosses the Tuolumne watershed—the old Tioga mining road—to the very eastern crest of the Sierra. When this road has been remade and continued down into Mono county it will help to spread all over this magnificent country the annual thousands who now are making Yosemite crowded. Tuolumne meadows is logically the first region of the high Sierras that will be opened up for general use, the most favored, the best of our outing grounds. One could in time become reconciled to a dam in Kern Canyon—I am speaking for myself—but not to any use of the Tuolumne watershed which would prevent its unrestricted enjoyment by all who can get there.

I know of the great Tuolumne Canyon only from hearsay and photographs. I am quite prepared to believe that it is second only to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. But I have heard. But I have seen Hetch-Hetchy and am prepared to say that it is one of the most lovely spots that one can hope to see. If Yosemite were not so near, Hetch-Hetchy would be famous. John Muir has described it, and perhaps it is the only man who can. This valley completes the perfection of the whole Tuolumne region. To lose any part of the whole would be a calamity but to lose the whole would be a national disaster.

One thing only can justify the use of the Tuolumne watershed for San Francisco's water supply—the absolute impossibility of securing a supply elsewhere. As other supplies are available it is the patriotic duty of the bay cities to make the "sacrifice" of their claims to these regions that belong to the whole nation and to undertake the admittedly somewhat more difficult task of getting their water elsewhere.

Yours very truly,

ALBERT H. ALLEN.

In all such discussions there comes a point where judgment must take the issue under advisement, the debate be closed and decision rendered satisfactory to the individual mind. Let us try to dispose of a few issues raised by our correspondent and ourselves finally so far as the further discussion of Hetch-Hetchy is concerned:

1. The issue is not between public and private use, but between public and public, between millions of persons who are to live in the bay cities for all time and millions of pleasure seekers with duration equally extended. In our judgment the domestic use transcends the other and the bay cities should not make the sacrifice.

2. Emphasis is placed upon the bay cities getting something for nothing from the government that would otherwise have to be paid for. The waters of all our rivers have been appropriated, the great power companies have obtained their reservoir sites, the public domain has been given—all practically for nothing, why should our cities—the homes of the people—be asked to pay, or why should the bay cities be looked at askance for seeking, free of cost, what has been freely given from the origin of our government until now? In our judgment the objection of "free gift" is without validity.

3. "Are there other adequate outing grounds without the Tuolumne watershed?" The most that is claimed for it is that it is second to the Yosemite and second to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. It will not be denied, on the other hand, that Kings river or Kern, or the Mount Whitney region, are good seconds in interest to Tuolumne, or that the mountains of California, Coast and Sierra, from San Diego to Shasta, from Tehachapi to Klamath, can be made to supply outing grounds for the entire nation even if the Tuolumne watershed were to be sealed against the tourist. Then there are the Rocky mountains and the wonders of Alaska, destined to become more and more accessible and frequented. In view of this embarrassment of riches of wilderness, the idea that the nation would suffer a substantial deprivation in the loss of the Tuolumne is indeed "maddening." However, the issue is one for judgment to determine and ours is that it "never would be missed," seriously.

4. If the Tuolumne source of supply cannot be kept free from infection with reasonable use neither can any other and filtration will become inevitable in any event, except that of exclusive use of the Tuolumne watershed. This affords added argument for, and not against, the claim of the bay cities upon the bounty of the government, a bounty these cities will share in common with every private enterprise that has had need for any part of the public domain.

5. It is true to say that the "absolute impossibility" of securing a water supply elsewhere is the only justification for acquiring the Tuolumne source? We think the issue relative and not absolute. It is enough to know that it is the best and the cheapest, the most likely to be adequate, the only one the government has left that it can give—Editor

IN a dark corner of the New Amsterdam roof garden, Lawrence Van Rensselaer sat with "Laola," the premiere danseuse of the "Parisian Follies" comic opera company. Up here it was cool after the close air of the theatre downstairs, and comparatively quiet. Down below were the miles of twinkling lights of the great city, and only the ruddy glow of the illuminated signs shone up from the hot streets. Down there the life of the city beat fast to its quick-step tune, and the din of its traffic deafened all minor sounds. Up here, the roar of it came only as an undertone, like the roar of the surf. Overhead was the cool black sky and the quiet stars.

The garden was on the roof, twelve stories above ground, and dimly lit with incandescent globes festooned amongst the potted trees that separated the little marble tables. Women in evening gowns and men in black and white chattered over their ices or sipped cool drinks in silence, trying to while away the hot night in some degree of comfort.

This had been an evening of triumph for Laola. The frothy musical comedy that she starred in was the one thing in town that stirred the languid interest of the wilted and summer-worn New York. Her singing and her dancing and her beauty had hit the fancy of the hour. To-night she had done her best. It was the last night of the play. To-morrow the company would disband, its members to scatter along the Great White Way in other troupes that would rehearse the new plays for the fall revival. Laola's future was secure. As she had run laughing from the stage at the end of her "great act" the applause that called her back a dozen times assured her that her star was fixed in the Broadway constellation.

The girls of the chorus had crowded round her as the curtain ran down and the orchestra played "Home, Sweet Home." One had touched her bare arm and cried, "It's New York that's home for you now, La." Laola laughed, with her eyes shining. "Wrong as ever, Mac. I'm going home for keeps, a home of my own, this time."

Her maid threw a kimono over her shoulders that hid her ballet skirt and the pink tights.

"Who is he?" the girls cried, crowding closer.

"Oh, I know," chattered one. "That Van Rensselaer man. Millionaire, swell. What a lucky one you are! Why didn't you tell us, Lo?"

Laola ran to her dressing room without answering, and reappeared a few minutes later in a travelling dress and hat. Her maid followed her, crying softly.

"Girls," said Laola. "It's goodbye, for keeps. I'm going home. I can't tell you about it now. I'll write. But don't forget me. Marie will give you each something I've left to be remembered by. Madge gets my lucky charm and the queen of the rosettes she always wears. I couldn't but tell you all before." She hurried to the stage entrance and turned back. "I've got to tell a friend goodbye before I go, or I wouldn't hurry so." She smiled radiantly and threw a kiss to the girls.

Sometimes she cried, and was gone. Outside Van Rensselaer was waiting for her. He lifted his hat, and the handsome face showed, youthful and clean cut, in the light that streamed through the door. She took his hand and smiled.

"Well, it's all over, and I'm free," she said. "At last!" he exclaimed. "Let's try the roof, what do you say? It's cool up there, and we can be to ourselves. It's my time to talk, remember."

The elevator lifted them to the top, and they found their table waiting for them at the farthest corner toward the west, where they could see out to the Hudson and the dim Palisades beyond. The waiter hovered near attentively.

"Champagne?" inquired Van Rensselaer. "Not to-night. I'd rather not. Just something cool. Any sort of ice."

The things came and the waiter disappeared. "Smoke," commanded Laola, and Van Rensselaer lit a cigarette.

"Yes, you're free now," he began, throwing the match away and inhaling a deep puff. "You've made a hit, girl, a hit. Broadway is at your feet. I suppose you could sign with Bernstein for a thousand a week, if you liked."

"He offered me more," corrected the girl. "Twelve hundred."

"That's big money, isn't it? But you are famous now, and worth it. And there is the fame of it, and the admiration, and the applause. They're harder to resist. I suppose you'll take it."

"No, I'm free, I said. I told Bernstein to-night."

"The dence you did! Who offered you more? I know he was mad. I can hear him rage."

"He swore," said the girl quietly. "What did he say?"

"Wanted to know if Behmer had offered me more."

"Had he?"

"Yes, but that has nothing to do with it. And then—no, I won't—"

"Go ahead."

"I told him so, and then he wanted to know if I was going to marry that fool of a young Van Rensselaer."

"That's all right—I don't care what he thought of me—but what did you say? That's what I want to know. That's what I brought you here to ask. You know that I want you, that I have loved you ever since I saw you at Mouquin's that night last year, that I will give you all that a man can give you—his honest heart."

"I've got more than some fellows—social position, money, and that sort of stuff. That don't count. It's man for man in this sort of thing, and I want you as a man wants the woman he loves. You promised to tell me to-night. Don't say no. Let's talk it over, let's be fair to one another, let's clear the nonsense that my people talk out of the matter first, and then tell me squarely—yes or no. Unless—unless you can say yes right now—dear"

He leaned eagerly across the table, his eyes glowing, his breath hot on her cheek. His cigarette lay on the cement floor where it had fallen, a red dot in the darkness. The girl sat motionless, her eyes meeting his for a moment and then averted, looking past him out toward the black Hudson and the dark Palisades beyond. In the silence the roar of the city rose throbbing to their ears, the glow from the lighted streets tinged their faces, and the unheeded music of the orchestra at the far end of the garden galloped gaily through a waltz. The girl shook her head and Van Rensselaer dropped back in his chair. Laola kept her eyes on the river as she spoke.

"I'm going home," she said. "Bernstein says I'm free, I said. Maybe he's right. Quieten save? Solo Dicos, as they say out there. I've got out of all us girls have prayed for, I've caught on Broadway. That's why we put up with the night hours and the bad hotels and the long train rides—it's all on the road to New York. It's a heart-breaking road, but I've got out of it easy: hundreds of them die without a ghost of a chance to win, and I won in a night, and I'm only twenty-two. I told you I was free. I don't think you understood me. I'm not looking for a better contract. I'm through with the stage—retired. I'm going home, I say."

Her voice sunk to hot intensity.

"This means home to you. It means home to all those girls who think New York is heaven. I don't. Look yonder," her hand swept toward the Hudson, "look over the Palisades, a thousand miles, two thousand miles, twenty-five hundred—there, out on the desert, Nevada, where I came from—that's home. You'll laugh to think anybody could love it. Caliente, a Greaser town with ten saloons and one store, and two hundred miles to an ice factory—that's home. Greenwood and sagebrush, sand and heat—that's home."

"You have been kind to me. You have paid me a great compliment—you ask me to be your wife. You have money and social position, and I think you are sincere. I should have luxury and the life of the town. But it doesn't appeal to me. I have been stifled ever since I came here. You can't realize how I was raised. You had your dancing classes and your tutors as a boy, you went to college and came back to a city where the clubs and the theatres and the restaurants and formal calls are the game. I was raised in the brush. I could ride a bronco when I was six, and I could shoot with the men at ten. It was thirty miles to the postoffice and no road, when I was a boy, and I rode it twice a week, alone. I've ridden fifty miles to a dance."

"And I was free. Here you think I'm a trifle fast because I will dine with you without a chaperone. Chaperone! What does a girl on a ranch who can shoot and ride want with a chaperone? I took care of myself, wasn't I afraid? The men respected me there, too. I saw to it that they did. Ah, they are men."

"Forgive me, but I can't help drawing comparisons. Look at that." She took a letter from her bosom and handed it to him. It was soiled and crumpled. "The writing was labored and awkward. 'Smell it' she commanded. 'You think it stinks. That's tar-weed, perfume to me. It's the breath of the desert that rises in the sun when you're horseback and miles from home, with nothing but heaven above you and the desert around you. That letter came from Jim, my pal. We've hunted and ridden together a thousand times. He can shoot your cigarette out of your fingers at a hundred yards. I can throw a spear at the length of his rope—every time. He's poor, he's rough, he swears in a way that would make Bernstein's hair curl, but he swears like a man and not like a Haymarket tout."

"What do you know of my kind of life? Could you sell a cowboy how to live if you heard it? Could you cinch a saddle on Old Buck and ride him after you got it on? Can you find a trail in the dark, or find your way home in the desert by starlight? Jim couldn't order a drink here without making a break, and you could make a menu for Demonicos as good as a chef. But I don't want that sort of life. I want to get out where there's room on every side, where the horizon is a hundred miles away, where there's cattle and no fences, where a man's a man and stands on his own feet, where there's no society, no streets, no theatres, nothing but the great wide world with the sunlight and the chaparral and the tarweed and the sand, and it's miles to water and the shade."

"Then you say Jim needs me. His mother is dead, and he's baching it fifty miles from nowhere, and he's lonesome, and he needs a cook. That's a prosaic proposal, isn't it? Oh, but you don't know Jim. You know me, and you could make that mother of his, the gentlest man I ever saw. You haven't seen him fight a dozen roughs in Caliente for insulting a woman on the street. You haven't seen him boss an outfit, the bravest man of a dozen brave men."

"He's waiting for me at Caliente. I wired him at four o'clock to meet me with the pinto and the saddle he used to lend me. I'm going home."

Van Rensselaer helped her into a hansom down in the hot street, his face white but his manner gamely light.

"May I see you in the morning before you go?" he pleaded. "Let me see you fairly started anyway."

"I'll be going now," she answered. "You may come if you like."

He stepped in and thrust up the lid with his cane.

"Where to?" he asked.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

The 5:20 afternoon boat carries the largest crowd that crosses the bay, and the one of last week Thursday was more than ordinarily loaded with its human freight. Every seat was taken and hundreds of people were compelled to stand. These pushed to the front of the cabins and stood packed like sardines in a box.

To the rear of this mass of assorted human flesh came three persons who began to plow their way through the crowd. They pushed, shouldered and shoved, and the victims of their jolts first looked at them and then reluctantly did what they could to make way for them. So they jammed their way through, with neither an "excuse me" nor "your pardon," until they reached the very front seat in the cabin, where, with an infinitude of jabber and cackle, they ended a rush which might have made some football teams ashamed of themselves. They had attained their end.

Were those three people who rammed, jammed and slammed their way through that patient crowd, without as much as a "by your leave"—were they gentlemen or women, admitting that they were neither gentlemen nor ladies? Judging by your observation of human nature, which of the sexes was the more likely to have representatives possessed of the "gall" requisite to such a proceeding?

Walking in a portion of our city not unknown to notoriety, I was approached at various times by three men. God save the mark, for they were not men; they were disheveled, rag-fluttering wrecks of humanity, the flotsam of our race, filthy and forlorn, who, reeking of vilest whiff, beg the wayfarer for a stray dime or nickel.

I looked at these fellows, and then I said to myself: "God of us all, look down in infinite pity upon thy handiwork, for four, indeed, that mass of nothings for which some of us trade our birthright of manhood."

Such must be the instinctive prayer of all who have hearts to feel, for—think of it—there is not one of them so intemperably low in some broken and shattered form, there still exists in him the remnant of that from which he might have developed manhood. And he has bartered that splendid possibility for this! This bruised thing in which is only unhappiness, torment and the shadow of recognition of what "might have been." Oh, these Dead Sea apples of humanity! How fair was their exterior while they still were of those of whom One said, "Of such is the kingdom," and how bitter, how more than bitter, are these ashes that lie at the heart of them!

Sometimes it seems to me that if I were a good parson I need not go far to find texts, and texts, and more texts, for my homilies.

"I suppose," said the first fair commuter, "that you are intending to attend church on Easter Sunday?"

"No," the second fair commuter responded, with a sigh, "I shan't be able to get my new spring hat until after that."

Which shows, oh, men and brethren, under what cruel and buffeting circumstances the beautiful religious element in the natures of our gentle sisters sometimes has to pull along.

("Laola's Farewell Appearance"—Concluded.)

"Grand Central Station," she called up to the driver.

The station was nearly empty, as she bade him goodbye at the gates to the waiting train. "It's good of you to make my farewell less lonely," she said.

"Goodbye. And happy days," he answered. "And give my congratulations to Jim."

He stood at the gates, watching, until the green lamps at the rear of the train disappeared in the darkness of the tunnel, and then turned grimly into Forty-second street and strode up the Avenue to his bachelor quarters. By the time he reached them, Laola was lifting the curtain of her darkened stateroom to catch her last glimpse of the Hudson, and clasping tightly in her hand the soiled and crumpled letter that sent out the sweet, rank smell of tarweed and called her to Jim and home.

Automobile Notes.

The inauguration of an automobile line to convey the Senators through the subterranean passage leading from the Capitol in Washington to the new Senate office building, is most interesting in view of all the publicity the automobile has received of late at the hands of United States Senators and Congressmen. The cars will run from any elevator in the basement to the Capitol or office building that may be designated by the passengers. Each machine accommodates ten persons. The cars, which are built long and low, with seats ranged along the side, are of a tan color, and the seats are handsomely upholstered in leather. Because of the narrowness of the subway no provision has been made to turn them around, the mechanism being so arranged that the chauffeur can quickly change his driver's seat and reverse on return trips.

Ranchers and vineyardists in San Joaquin valley are causing automobile dealers considerable worry by reason of the severe tests to which they are demanding that automobiles be put before accepting delivery of the cars. R. Drumm of the Studebaker Bros. company of California who recently returned from Fresno and the surrounding cities says that the ranchers are not only compelling all dealers to give the machine a thorough tryout on all kinds of hills and roads, sandy and otherwise, but demand emphatically that automobiles be able to negotiate plowed ground. Several Studebaker E. M. F. "30" cars, which have been sold to ranchers in and around Fresno, have all been put through this test according to Drumm and in most instances after the test was completed the field was covered with a net work of lines drawn by the hood enclosing the differentials on the rear axle. According to Drumm, the Studebaker E. M. F. "30" car is one of the few makes to which this test has been put that has as yet never failed to "make good."

the use of other private property along the same lines.

Very little has yet been done in regard to restrictive legislation, the matter being confined so far to restrictions in regard to fires. In March, 1905, our state legislature prohibited during the dry season, that is to say between May 15th and the first soaking rains of autumn, the burning of brush, stumps, logs, or grass, and prohibited blasting or the use of fireworks on any forest land without written permission from a state fire warden.

In February, 1907, Oregon enacted a statute similar to ours.

In June, 1907, the legislature of Pennsylvania prohibited fires during certain seasons on lands containing oil or gas wells, and on such lands required the removal of all brush, etc., at least once a year to points at least one hundred feet from any such lands, or from the right of way of any railroad.

Above all other states, California needs restrictive legislation. It should be the pioneer in this movement.

I do not believe that we will meet with serious opposition from the owners of large tracts. These owners have long since appreciated the fact that the wanton destruction of trees is prejudicial to their private interests. The changes in the lumbering business are very like those which have taken place in mining. Both industries are now conducted with an eye to the future and not solely with the idea of realizing all possible profit within a short period. Consultation between the state forester, the federal forest service, and some of the principal owners of forest lands would undoubtedly result in an agreement on some form of restrictive legislation, which would greatly benefit the public and inure to the ultimate benefit of individual owners. When agreed upon it could be made the basis of similar legislation in other states through the governors' convention, of which I have spoken. A campaign of education should be at once inaugurated.

The American agent of the Rothschild's is James Speyer, the New York capitalist.

President David Starr Jordan of Stanford University has publicly expressed his belief in the ballot for women.

Ferdinand Burdorff, the artist, whose pictures of Carmel and Monterey are greatly admired, is only a little over twenty years old.

United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, was recently elected moderator of the annual "town meeting" of his home town, Nahant, Mass.

The wife of the Prime Minister of Bulgaria is president of the Bulgarian Woman Suffrage Association, which has a membership of more than 5,000 persons, both men and women.

Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, a society woman of New York, is chiefly responsible for the formation of most of the Day Nurseries that have proved such a boon to the poor mothers in the large cities.

The editor of the only Latin periodical on this continent is Arcadio Avelanus, who publishes the Prætor Latinus, or Latin Herald, to promote the speaking of Latin as an everyday language. He lives in Philadelphia.

The only "human being in the German Imperial palace who does not fear the Kaiser when he is angry" is his only daughter, the Princess Victoria Luise, a charming sixteen-year-old girl who bosses her royal father imperiously.

Lord Roberts has a superstitious faith in horseshoes. Acknowledging the receipt of one sent by a friend when things looked dark in South Africa, he wrote: "I shall keep it in company with one picked up the day I entered the Orange Free State and another I found at Paardeburg the day before General Cronje surrendered."

Judge R. S. Lovett, general counsel of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads has assumed, at Mr. Harriman's direction, almost the entire burden of the legal entanglements of the Harriman system, to which the Little Wizard formerly gave much attention. Judge Lovett is a native, and was until recently a resident, of Texas, and still has large business interests in that state.

Edward L. Baldwin, of San Francisco, was recently elected president of the Ohio Society of California. This society has given banquets to President McKinley, Vice-President Fairbanks, Governor Nash, and General Funston.

Prof. Simon Newcomb, one of the most celebrated astronomers in the world, is also a retired admiral of the United States navy. He is seventy-four years old, and is still actively engaged in scientific work, devoting most of his time to completing a book embodying his investigation of the moon.

Miss Jean Webster, whose new novel, "Much Ado About Peter," will be published this month, is the author of "Fool's Mystery," a novel which was published anonymously a year ago. Miss Webster is a grand-niece of Mark Twain and a granddaughter of Charles L. Webster, the publisher who wrote the check for $200,444 for Mrs. J. S. Grant in payment for General Grant's memoirs. This is said to be the largest single check ever made out by a publisher in payment to an author. Miss Webster is a graduate of Vassar college and lives in New York, although she spends a great deal of her time in Italy.

AT TWILIGHT.

When twilight creeps upon thy life and mine,
And on the margin of the sea we stand,
Will some forgotten light gleam on the sand.

Or some lost star in shadow faintly shine?
Shall we find friendly beacons, or a sign
To lead us safely to the unknown land
That lies in far-off beauty, when my hand
Slips softly for the last time into thine?

When twilight falls, and hidden in our dust,
No rose of youth our dimming eyes discern,
When darkness comes upon us from above,

Shall we still have unstained our lifelong trust?

Dear God! Thy utmost lessons we will learn,
And not complain, if we may keep our love!

AFTER THE COWS.

By John Vance Cheney.

"High time, high time the cows were home;
Will lingerin' Jinny never come?"
The father stroked his grizzled head;
The mother, slowly sewing, said:
"Put one and one together;
The bars slip hard in rainy weather."

"Now, mother, do you mean to say
We've had a snitch o' rain to-day?"
A little quicker passed the thread,
As quietly good mother said:
"Put one and one together;
The cows climb high in sunny weather."

"In rain or shine, will Brindle climb Too high to come at milkin' time?"
Good mother smoothed her sewing down;
"When this was my new Sunday gown,
Put lad and lass together,
'Twas love, not cows, in any weather."

MY FAITH.

By John Vance Cheney.

I trust in what the love-mad mavis sings,
In what the whiteweed says wherso it blows.

And the red sorrel and the redder rose;
I trust the power that puts the bee on wings,
And in the socket sets the rock, and rings

The hill with mist, and gilds the brook, and drows
The dusk; is on the wind which comes and goes.

The voice in thunders and leaf-murmurings;
I trust the might that makes the lichen strong,
That leads the rabbit from her burrow forth,
That in the shadow hides, in sunlight shines;
I trust what gives the one lone cricket song,
What points the clamorous wild-geese harrow north,

And shifts the white calm on the winter pines.

Further Safeguards to Liberty.

No person shall be held for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval operations, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger.

The foregoing constitutes the first half of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, ratified December 15, 1791, and will suffice for this lesson. The reader should bear in mind that this relates to the relations of the citizen to the United States, not to the state government. Some states make little or no use of grand juries, but trust the administration of criminal justice to the initiative of individual citizens in making complaints before magistrates, or to district attorneys or to magistrates themselves. The United States acts only through grand juries.

A grand jury is a body of citizens, not less than nineteen, selected by the court from among the citizenry of the district to make inquiry into all reports of infractions of the law with the purpose of ascertaining, first, if any crime has been committed and, second, if there be evidence enough against any person suspected of having committed a crime to warrant putting such person on trial.

During the centuries of autocratic government the wrongs inflicted upon defenseless persons by irresponsible and, it may be, fanatical power, were so cruel, so heartless and so unjust, that the people, when they got a chance to participate in making a government, insisted that such power should be circumscribed and innocence safeguarded. What the obtaining of those few lines have cost the human race in its upward struggle is beyond estimation either in dollars, in heart's blood or in anguish of soul. A question now in the public mind is as to whether the pendulum was not swung so far toward preventing wrongful punishment as also, in many cases, to prevent rightful punishment, but of that hereafter. The above quotation from the Constitution makes one of the bulwarks of the people's liberties and one which the makers of the Constitution did not see fit to include in their handiwork. The people insisted upon it or it would not have been included in that instrument.

Grand juries hold their sessions behind closed doors. Their proceedings are conducted informally. The court selects one member to be foreman, really the presiding officer. The people's attorney usually lays before this body whatever evidence he possesses relating to the commission of crime. Witnesses are summoned and examined. The accused himself is not summoned, but if he wishes to come before the jury and be heard in his own defense he may do so. He does that confront the witnesses against him, if, after making full inquiry, it appears to the jury that a crime has been committed and that there is a reasonable certainty as to who committed it, a "true bill" or indictment is found. The court, upon receiving the report, orders a warrant issued and the accused is placed under arrest. Then, for the first time, the public knows, or should know, what action has been taken.

All the harm this proceeding has done to an accused person lies in the accusation. It does not remove the presumption of innocence that protects him, but he must now answer before a trial jury, in open court, where he may confront his accusers and have the benefit of an attorney to aid him in his defense. To put the case specifically, nineteen of his fellow citizens must first join in accusing him of crime or he cannot be held for trial and then twelve more of his fellow citizens must agree that he is guilty or he cannot be punished. As lately stated by a writer on this subject, there is now many times less danger, under our laws, of a person being convicted of crime than he did not commit than of his being knocked down and run over by an automobile. The surpassing problem before society now is as to how persons may be convicted of crimes that they do commit.

In time of war, or insurrection, or other great danger, the need for a summary punishment is so great that these more orderly proceedings cannot be put up with. Such a proceeding as we are now having in the Calhoun case, where it literally requires months to secure a jury, would be intolerable in the face of a hostile army or when a navy was upon the point of going into battle, or at such a time as followed the great fire in San Francisco. At such a time a court martial takes the place of a court civil or "Judge Lynch" dispenses justice with more promptness than particularity.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A New Economic Wrinkle.

The up-state public service commission of New York has denied a charter for another line of railroad from Buffalo to Rochester, and on to the northeast, on the ground that the enterprise was not properly financed and that there is not enough business to be had to sustain it if built. It is something new to have that kind of a wildcat headed off with a club. The policy has been to let all who wished to build railroads build them at their own, or their backers', risk. Economically considered he who parallels a line of railroad able to carry all the passengers and freight with another road is guilty of extravagant waste, and yet had there existed a government commission with power to deny a franchise to construct a second transcontinental railroad it is conceivable that the franchise would have been denied, on the ground that one railroad across the continent was enough. The power of the up-state commission is fraught with as much danger as benevolence.

Hot Chestnuts.

No doubt Attorney-General U. S. Webb likes chestnuts. No doubt he would enjoy sitting down with Mr. Calhoun and his friends for a frolicsome feast of the old-time delicacies, but not if General Webb is to be expected to rake them from the glowing embers. He has the voice of Jacob, but not the furry fingers of Esau, and it was long ago that he learned that burnt fingers do not feel good. Therefore his declination of the invitation, oft repeated and pressing, to step into Carpenter's Hall and take over from Mr. Heney the cases of the People of California against the higher-ups will be again forthcoming with renewed thanks for the honor. Were General Webb to do otherwise he would find himself in something hotter than ashes and engrossed with something more important than chestnuts.

Promote An Apprentice.

In casting about for someone to succeed to Mr. Langdon's office as District Attorney for the City and County of San Francisco why go farther than Mr. Langdon's own office? Mr. Langdon has made good. Why not promote to his office one of the very bright men who have helped him to make good? What of Mr. O'Gara, Mr. William Hoff Cook, Mr. Hanley? Why seek for an untrained man when there are men so splendidly equipped for the office ready at hand? They can surely so adjust the matter as to be in each other's way. There are other rivers of graft to cross and let there be as little of swapping horses as possible until all are over.

Public Office In Private Control.

It has recently been borne in upon Mr. Patrick Calhoun that it is a bad thing to have public office privately controlled. Mr. Calhoun is in error in supposing that all of his troubles are attributable to that cause. He has had something to do with them himself. But the state of California is well convinced of the inadvisability of having public government either privately or corporately controlled. It is exactly against that thing that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has been doing battle. Possibly Mr. Calhoun might feel disposed to aid it in its work, seeing that he regards himself as a fellow sufferer. But Mr. Calhoun should be careful to discriminate between private or corporate control of public office and private or associated assistance to a public officer in the discharge of duties fraught with large consequences to the public welfare. The one is prolific of injustice, the other indispensable to the establishment of justice in hard cases, such, for instance, as in the conviction of open and notorious grafters in San Francisco. It was Mr. James Rea who once inadvertently upon the political boss who made a slate and left him off it. Upon further consideration perhaps Mr. Calhoun would be willing to so far modify his aspirations against public office being in private control as to add the proviso, "Unless I or my friend Herrin control it."

THIS NUMBER CONTAINS

Elmer Ellsworth Carey

The Fate of Tillman.

Senator Ben Tillman has expressed the belief that President Taft is about to inaugurate an era of good feeling. If so what will become of Ben Tillman? Of what use will that evil eye of his be if it can detect nothing about which to make a rumpus? Has he realized that the ushering in of an era of good feeling would usher out the Honorable Benjamin Ryan Tillman?

The Consumers Heard From.

It no doubt strikes Congress as curious, not to say unseemly, that the women of America should set up so much opposition to an increase of tariff tax upon gloves and hosiery. Heretofore the consumers have been little heard from, unless they were also manufacturers and were solicitous for cheaper raw materials. There have been but two parties to deal with: Those who wanted so much protection as to afford little revenue and those who wanted so much revenue as to afford little protection to American industries. The appearance of the consumer in the arena, even in petticoats, has proven disconcerting. Perhaps if women consumers gain a victory men consumers may be encouraged to make their grievances heard. The cost of living is a pressing problem in nearly every American home and sooner or later those homes are certain to be heard from.

Why Oakland Feels Good.

There is an unusually contented feeling in Oakland just now. The public mind has settled down to the conviction that more is to be hoped for from the city government lately installed than from any other city government in many a year. The preparation of parks and playgrounds is expected to go forward, the public mind is ready to assail the slot machines and other civic sore spots, and public moneys promise to be honestly expended. The death of City Attorney McElroy was a severe blow, for the people had great confidence in him, but John W. Stetson, in whom the people also have great confidence, has been selected to take his place, so the public mind is easy on that score. Oakland appears to have struck an era of good feeling.

Good Results At San Diego.

The Lincoln Roosevelt League forces won a sweeping victory at San Diego on Tuesday and will be in full possession of the city government under the new charter which inaugurates the Des Moines plan of civil government. Now that Mr. Herrin's man Hardy has once been beaten in the southern city it is likely that many whose habit it is to stay close to the fence, and in a condition to vault it if need be, that they may alight on the winning side (there are always a considerable number in any community) will feel like coming out into the open and standing with braver men for freer government. The devoted few who have stood for good politics during all these years will find the result very full of comfort. There are, all over California, many symptoms of revolt against government by a meddlesome corporation and in favor of government by a free people. California is to be congratulated on the victory achieved by San Diego. It starts the ball rolling.

A National League of Justice.

If Prof. George H. Boker can find time and opportunity to organize a National League of Justice he may easily become a national benefactor. The diseases which impair the vitality, benumb the conscience and paralyze the arm of the judiciary of California are not prevalent in California alone. Similar conditions and tendencies have produced similar results in many states if not in all of them. They are mainly over-refinement in disquisition; the sacrifice of the spirit to the letter of the law; over-estimates of the value of procedure and under-valuation of essential justice in the case at bar, without reference to hypothetical issues which may possibly be raised elsewhere at another time; the indirect selection of judges by the chief litigants in their courts, and the crushing of the jury system under an effort to attain impartiality so strained as to make the whole proceeding as ridiculous as it is ineffective. Neither bench nor bar will eradicate these distempers without overwhelming pressure from outside, and a National League of Justice should be able to apply that pressure.

NONE BUT THE GUILTY CONDEMN.

When the so-called graft prosecution began its operations, now nearly three years ago, there were none but the guilty who did not give it approval. Argonaut.

True enough, and the same is just as true now as it was then—none but the guilty with hold their approval. If not accessory before the fact, persistent critics of the prosecution are accessory after the fact. That the aid and comfort they have given the public enemy have been productive of harm the examination of talesmen upon their records abundantly proves. They have so confused issues as to obscure the public vision regarding good and evil.

The Argonaut goes into convulsions because of certain proceedings of search instituted nearly a fortnight ago. Those proceedings were extraordinary. The conditions which gave rise to them were extraordinary and they were met in the only way they could be met successfully, inasmuch as the prosecution caught 'em with the goods on 'em.

It is undeniably distasteful to a gentleman to have the ruthless hands of the law fingering over his private papers but, if they did not find the stolen documents in the hands of Mr. Calhoun himself they were found in the possession of his attorneys and "Qui facit per alium facit per se." The thief or his "fence" can appropriately find no fault with the method of his capture if caught with the goods on him.

The friends of the prosecution are under no obligation to claim that no mistakes have been made, no errors of judgment committed, no excesses of zeal displayed, but they are under obligations to minimize any lapses that may have occurred and to stand by the integrity of intent.

The establishment of justice in San Francisco has gone up against as hard a proposition as justice ever encountered here or elsewhere. All that wealth, all that social prestige, all that craft and cunning, money and brains, subsidy and bribery, sympathy and hate, financial gain and loss, could do has been done to thwart justice of its due, and because justice had dared to assail the seats of the mighty. There remains betwixt hades and heaven not one spring of emotion that has not been touched on behalf of the accused. There has not been one form of crime betwixt petty larceny and attempted wholesale human slaughter that has not been committed in aid of the defense, there are public journals and public men who never tire of assailing the prosecution, that find little occasion for offense at tactics employed by the defense.

In the integrity, the unselfishness, the unsurpassed courage, the steadfastness of purpose, the zeal for justice and not for vengeance, of the prosecution and its friends The California Weekly has the fullest confidence and we repeat that, whether the persistent critics of the prosecution know it or do not know it, the fact remains as true now as it was true three years ago, that none but the guilty withhold from prosecution their hearty and sustaining approval.

THE FOOL AND HIS NICKEL.

To undertake to tie the fool and his money together so that they cannot be pried apart is false economy and bad morals. The nickel-in-the-slot machine was invented for the express purpose of facilitating the process of separation of the fool from his money and the success attained leaves nothing to be desired. Watch in hand a listener to the click-click lately counted one hundred such separations in one minute. This was at the rate of $300 per hour, $3,000 per ten-hour day, not allowing for possible winnings, which may well be left out of the computation because they will ultimately find their way back into the engulfing slot. If only full orbed fools were involved in the issue ordinance and laws prohibiting slot machines would be in contravention of sound public policy and an invasion of the rights of ingenuity and enterprise. No matter who got their money it could not be in worse hands than theirs.

But to strive to prevent rational beings becoming fools is different. That is the justification of anti-slot machine laws and ordinances. Just how efficacious these machines are in depriving men of their reasoning faculties, their wills of the power of resistance, only those who have given consideration to the psychological factors involved are able to state. We memorize by repetition. By saying a thing over and over we make it our own while life lasts. By running the fingers over the piano or writing machine they learn to go of themselves to the right places. We form all our habits of life the same way. We excite our sympathies, arouse our capacities, acquire our manias and mental maladies by repetition. Petty larcenists are rarely cured of their itching fingers, for the reason that they have indulged the impulse so many times that the itch becomes irresistible.

The something-for-nothing concept is latent in the human brain. One can rarely make so many transactions in real estate, take so many flyers in stocks, as to arouse this latent concept into a ruling passion, an uncontrollable mania, but one may feed nickels into a slot with so much rapidity as to stimulate the something-for-nothing impulse one hundred times in a minute. Every organ of the body, every power of the mind, is developed by use and, at a relatively small cost, a slot machine may make a sane, honest man into an inveterate gambler, a something-for-nothing fiend akin to his brother of the "dope." There are hundreds of persons who pour all that they can into a borrow and steal into those slots, and into the same aperture goes all their manhood, strength of will, power of mind. It is in the preventing of the making of fools, not in preventing the separation of fools from their money, that anti-slot machine laws and ordinances find their abundant justification. No person with that mania upon him is safe with his own money or that of anyone else.

Therefore suffer the supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to be sustained in their efforts to abolish this evil. As San Francisco goes so will go the state. Already California is moving in the same direction and for the reason that San Francisco is leading the way.

WHO CAN POINT THE BETTER WAY?

In another column will be found a thoughtful article on "The Christian Law of Temperance." It is right that men should think clearly about an issue that half a continent is up in arms over, and the article in question will help.

Nevertheless, those who place themselves in opposition both to the saloon and to prohibition are under obligation to point to a better way of dealing with a condition that does not yield to theory. The consensus of American opinion is that the saloon is an intolerable institution. There are about three courses of action open for the public to take: Enmend the saloon in the future as in the past, abolish it by prohibiting the sale of the commodities in which it deals, supply a substitute for it.

The issue between saloon and no saloon, between "wet" and "dry," is simple, comprehensible, conclusive. There is no voter so stupid that he cannot determine under which banner he will enlist. Issues are seldom drawn with nicety of discrimination. It is the blunt fact that claims the championship of men, and unless those who are opposed to the saloon, and are opposed also to prohibition, come forward with a simple, workable better thing than either they are not going to command a hearing and will have to choose between saloon and prohibition or stand inconsequentially aside and look on.

The California Weekly recognizes that, whatever is done about it, the liquor evil will remain an evil. When Society exchanges the old sow of a saloon for a whole litter of post-humous blind pigs the gain has not been great. The simile is confessedly inelegant but exactly states the case.

What liquor is sold should be sold under the sanction and surveillance of the law. That much is clear, but how? Some states and cities undertook to answer the question with the dispensary. They have given it up. The Gutenberg system has made little progress. The struggle should be to make an inevitable evil as little of an evil as possible—to reduce the evil to the lowest terms. The saloon sustains the evil at its worst. The "blind pigs" and "bootleggers" under prohibition are only slightly more tolerable. It is up to those who would like something better than either, something that would not invade personal liberty, and yet would prove reasonably effective in preventing the harm that constantly comes of this traffic, to say what that thing should be.

This paper will welcome discussion of the better way for dealing with this subject. It has little space to expend in arguing the pros and cons of prohibition. They are known. If there be a better way it should be possible to find it. Constructive statesmanship should be equal to the emergency. This invitation to be heard must not be understood as opening the door to Utopian theories or stark fanaticisms. In order to be entertained suggestions must possess the grace of common sense, must advance a workable plan, a plan that can be made to appeal to men of average intelligence and it must not leave human nature out of consideration. The subject is before the house. What is your pleasure, gentlemen?

The next person who donates a building for the University of California should make his contribution for the erection of a capacious auditorium. An out-door meeting place has been abundantly provided, but not an indoor. The acoustic properties of Harmon Gymnasium are abominable. Hearst Hall is not large enough and those who sit in the rear of that room are seldom able either to see or hear. Something planned after room 101 in California Hall, only eight or ten times bigger, would meet a want that will be felt until something of the kind is provided.

If Mr. W. J. Burns really did stock his desk with documents filled with important misinformation that they might be stolen therefrom by his traitorous secretary, and sold to the attorneys for the defense, the duplicity of the proceeding will throw the esteemed Argonaut into another spasm of virtuous anguish. It was undoubtedly bad form for a gentleman to do such a thing to another gentleman. If, however, it were done by a gentleman to a member of the common herd it would be a rare joke. A change of personnel does make such a difference!

Significant News of the : : : Week : : :

The Sixth Transcontinental.

On Friday last the last spike was driven for connecting the eastern and western ends of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad across the continent. This is the sixth within the territory of the United States, five of which have been built since May 10, 1869, when the Union and Central Pacific railroads met at Promontory, and this one has been constructed in the face of the fact that the Panama canal will be in operation in a few years. A seventh, the Western Pacific, is tunneling the mountains and putting down rails as rapidly as possible and, on the line of the old Central Pacific, there is in preparation one of the most tremendous engineering undertakings of our time in order that grades may be lowered and snows avoided. Let no one depreciate the splendid services these master builders are conferring upon their country and their time. Only gently remind them, as occasion requires, that railroading, and not governing, is their proper sphere of activity and enterprise.

Is the World Short of Wheat?

The wheat pit at Chicago says that it is, and the price for May delivery went to $1.25 per bushel. And yet the crop prospects of the season so far have not been bad. There has been little complaint of a hard winter killing out winter wheat. There are grounds for believing that the almost unprecedented rise in price is artificial. We are allowing gamblers to sport with the bread of millions. With 7,000,000 wage earners, and 30,000,000 hungry mouths in our own country dependent upon wheat, the price of bread is a serious matter. What is getting so high that our American millers can afford to grind it only upon a hand-to-mouth policy, while, across the water, where such gambling is either regulated or prohibited, the millers are grinding as though nothing had been happening in the wheat pit at Chicago. There is an intolerable wrong here that needs to be righted. It is not expedient that the bread of the people be made dependent upon chance that millions, instead of nickels, may be led into slot machines.

The Baldwin Will Probated.

The probating of the will of E. J. Baldwin, and the alleged pacification of all the discordant heirs, is not important because of the size of the estate, but because the adjustment of differences, and the settling of the estate by due process of law, without undue notoriety, will avert an avalanche of sensation that could not have escaped the infliction of great harm upon the public mind. It is bad enough that so wretched a personality as that of the testator should have left so large an estate without having the line of that life laid open to public inspection, which would almost certainly have been the result had the contest gone into court. It will suffice for all purposes that the record of that life be laid bare elsewhere.

The Standard Oil Dissolution Case.

A very important legal controversy has been taking place the current week in St. Louis. The Department of Justice, of the United States government, has been seeking, in the Circuit Court of the United States, to pry apart the parent Standard Oil company from many of its subsidiary corporations by dissolving the trust formed in 1882, through which the Standard Oil has been able, not alone to monopolize the oil industry, but almost to monopolize the chief industries of the continent. We are all but governed by Standard Oil. What results will flow from this litigation cannot be foretold, but they are likely to be of great importance however they may result. It would be enlightening to fore-know through what influence the circuit judge, before whom the case is being tried, received his appointment and what was the type of mind that governed his selection.

Roosevelt in Italy.

Remembering that Theodore Roosevelt is now only the first citizen of the Great Republic, and that his trip abroad is devoid of all political significance, it is gratifying to his friends to know how cordial and enthusiastic was his reception as soon as his feet rested upon European soil. Not only did the King and Queen of Italy receive him with open arms, and the Italian nation as well, but there were kindly messages from many countries and an especially cordial one from the Emperor of Germany. The word that Mr. Roosevelt sent back from Messina, as to the work that the American relief and Red Cross organizations have accomplished, is also cheering.

The Balkans and the Bread Problem.

The adjustment of the difficulty between Austria-Hungary and Servia, effected early last week on the basis of Servia giving up its day-dream of a pan-Slavic empire and being good or being obliterated from the map, effected through the graces of British diplomacy, will have an important effect on the price of bread in Europe and of wheat in America. The district likely to be affected by war or peace is preeminently agricultural and produces half the export oats of Europe, 45 per cent. of the wheat and 75 per cent. of the corn crop. Winter is just breaking up in that district now and the return of the soldier to the farm will mean much to the hungry millions of western and central Europe who draw no little of their supply from the Balkan district. And so peace hath its victories!

In the World of Steel.

The significance of movements in the steel industry will not be lost upon those who are scanning the horizon for signs and portents of a renewed prosperity. The United States Steel Corporation is producing at the rate of 58 to 62 per cent. of its maximum capacity and the number and volume of its orders are increasing, but prices are so much lower than formerly prevailed that its gains are diminishing and it is expected that the first quarter of this year, whose account is now being made up, will show the lowest profit scale in a number of years. One thing that holds back business is an insistence on the part of railroads that the price of rails shall be lowered from $28 to $25 per ton. This demand is resisted on the ground that, since the broken-rail series of accidents of three or four years ago forced upon manufacturers the need for making a better rail, the cost of manufacture has been much increased by that necessity. As soon as this issue shall have been adjusted there will be renewed activity in the steel industry throughout the country, for the railroads are waiting to begin repairs with the opening of spring.

Castro Can't Go Home.

Is Cipriano Castro a man without a country? Venezuela has refused him permission to land upon her shores and France is disinclined to permit him to take up his abode in her Caribbean possessions. The influence of the United States is being exerted, so it is supposed, to prevent his return to the land he has misruled so long. But he is a resourceful man and has no mean following in Venezuela and it is not improbable that he will again be a factor in affairs, both national and international.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Ambassador James Bryce lately concluded, at Berkeley, a series of admirable addresses upon Ethics and Religion, ethics having to do with the relations of human beings to each other, and religion, with the relation of the human soul to the infinite author of the universe. Hearst Hall was crowded upon each occasion, the attention given was of the finest and the appreciation of the best. The discourses may be classed as profitable rather than great, and as having a historical perspective at once fair and, humanly speaking, accurate.

But the purpose of this article is not to give a review of the course of lectures delivered by Ambassador Bryce. It is rather to set down some of the writer's own lucubrations, set in motion as a result of listening to that course, as the subject unfolded under the good gray statesman's admirable treatment.

The one preeminent thought that ran through the writer's mind, induced by rather than deduced from what the lecturer said, was the certainty that humanity can never fall below a certain standard of morality without wiping itself off the plane of human existence. The God who made us so surrounded us with conditions beyond our power to change that we must be moral up to a certain standard of righteousness or destroy ourselves and the race to which we belong. This is reassuring, and yet the wish can hardly be restrained that the standard of inevitable righteousness had been raised a few notches.

Ethics is a product of mental philosophy. It has been reasoned out and reason is as certainly God-given as revelation, if not as certainly to be depended upon. Before the birth of Christ, even before the advent of the few people, there were clear headed persons who reasoned out standards of moral conduct that have rarely been excelled and they, by their precepts, held the race together above the standard of self destruction. These standards were for the few, but then it was only the few who survived. The doctrine of the destruction of the incorrigibly wicked is as certainly founded in nature as in revelation.

Then there was given to man his religious faculty, his consciousness of relationship to the Most High, to inspire him to better things and to implant within his breast that still, small voice whose counsels may always be heard when not drowned in the general din of the world. Ethics and religion have not always kept company. There have been religious nihilists who were deplorably unmoral as there have been moral millions who were deplorably unreligious.

The dangers of religion are fanaticism, formalism, the following of the letter to the neglect of the spirit, over-organization, dogmatism, excess of pious zeal and deficiency in the humanitarianism of philosophers. The ethics are that they afford the multitude little inspiration. Men walk with their eyes upon the ground, not looking up for help, government is by law rather than by love, righteousness is by force rather than by free choice.

Many almost despair of the world and of the race. We need not. The destiny of the race is in wiser, more far-seeing custody than ours. It was provided for from the foundation of the universe. There were billions of lives ordered, in which the human family cannot descend without extinction and millions suffer that extinction every year. Then there was given us the sound ethics of a clear visioned mental philosophy which we may take hold of and so steady our steps as to make our lives orderly, clean and heartily endurable. Finally, we have that religion to which flesh and blood never attained and by which we may lift ourselves into communion with the infinite First Cause, our devoted brows fanned with the breezes of the skies. Let us be of good cheer. The well-being of the race was abundantly provided for before we came.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

The Situation at Messina.

The world was horrified by the destruction wrought by the great Italian earthquake of last December. It talked of little else, and its newspapers "feetured" it, it was something more than a seven-days' shocking wonder. Then other events demanded attention, and gradually it came to pass that little was heard of Messina and other Italian and Sicilian towns and villages. It should be of interest, then, briefly to review the situation as it exists there to-day. It was said in the days immediately succeeding the catastrophe that Messina probably never would be rebuilt. The indications now are that it will be, for three reasons: First, here is the only natural harbor in that part of Italy; second, the channel has been sounded and demonstrated to be uninjured, and, third, many families which have owned land there for generations are unwilling to give up and admit that it is valueless. These considerations apparently have sufficed to neutralize the first shock of horror, and about 3,000 houses now are in process of construction, although approximately 200 bodies yet are being exhumed daily and it is estimated that from 40,000 to 60,000 still are in the ruins. The greater part of about $3,750,000 contributed to the earthquake-sufferers has been expended, and it is estimated that the work of exhumation alone will require another year before it is completed.

Castro Returning to Venezuela.

Castro, the irrepressible former President of Venezuela, is on his way back to that land of revolutions, although, as he has been notified by the agent of the French steamship which conveys him that he cannot disembark at a Venezuelan port, it is understood that he will stop first in the West Indies and later in Panama. What he intends to do if ever he reaches Venezuela may best be told in his own words spoken at the time of his departure from Paris. He said, "Like Francis I, all I lost save honor. I am going back to Venezuela. My country needs me, and my mission is there," and later in the same address, he said, "I believe that God and destiny call me back to Venezuela. I intend to accomplish my mission there, even though it involves revolution." It has been currently believed that Castro saved considerable coin, as well as some very doubtful honor, but he denies it, and it does not much matter. The main point is that "forewarned is forearmed," and if Venezuela permits this firebrand to cross her boundaries she will deserve whatever may come, whether it be revolution, to which she is wonted, or the intervention of outside nations.

The French and Their Women.

It so long has been taken for granted that the French are the most chivalrous of all nations in their treatment of femininity that cold figures demonstrating that they compel more of their women to be income producers than any other nation on the face of the earth serve to chill. Nevertheless, this is what statistics show. In France practically one-third of all women work for their living. It should be explained here that this refers to work outside of their homes, for most women earn their living by hard work, but as it principally is done in the home, it never has been largely considered in the estimates of men. In Germany about 25 per cent of the women work outside of their homes, and in the United States but 18.8 per cent, and their work here generally is much easier than it is in the old world. How magnificent the chivalric Frenchmen are in paying their women workers may be estimated from the fact that while they comprise one-third of all the toilers, they receive but one-ninth of the total pay to men and women. One average masculine worker receives as much as three average feminine workers. Some individual instances are astonishing. For instance, in Roanne, with a population of 34,901, 97 of every 100 wives aid in supporting the family. After all, it may be that true courtesy consists in something more than the tipping of a hat.

Opposes the Salvation Army.

General William Booth, commander-in-chief of the Salvation Army, recently has been negotiating with the Russian government for permission to establish a branch of the Army in Russia. To all who are acquainted with the wonderfully helpful work done by the Salvationists this must seem particularly good news for the unfortunate Russians, and yet the move is bitterly opposed, and by whom, do you suppose? By the Holy Synod of the Greek Church, the prevailing religious organization of Russia. It seems unbelievable, but the fact is as stated. If there is an organization on earth today that is doing precisely the work Christ did in caring for the needy and the afflicted it is the Salvation Army, and yet a body organized "in His name" stands as its antagonist! Verily, the Father of All Evil must be well pleased with the work an occasional church does.

Dreadnaughts and Paupers.

The question that most agitates Englishmen at the present time relates to the rapidity with which battleships of the Dreadnaught type can be constructed. Yet there is a question, which Englishmen must solve, that exceeds this in importance as the welfare of humanity surpasses in merit implements intended for its destruction. The national wealth of Britain has increased by leaps and bounds in recent years, but between 1896 and 1906 the number of adult male paupers there increased no less than 18 per cent, and this was but a continuation of the record of twenty preceding years. Pauperism is in evidence there as it has not been since each baron had his horde of half-starved serfs. Some attention might wisely be switched from Dreadnaughts to men. Otherwise the warships may not amount to much, for a pauper is a poor man behind a gun.

An Irreparable Loss.

The building in which the Mexican Chamber of Deputies had assembled since 1872 was destroyed by fire recently. This in itself would not have been a serious loss, for the building, originally a theatre and built in 1856, was of no great value, but the loss of its contents is irreparable and will be deeply felt by intelligent Mexicans. Among them were the original Constitution of 1821, the act of independence of 1821, and the constitutions of 1824 and 1857, as well as the signatures of many of the heroes of Mexican history. In fact, the building was a sort of Independence Hall in Mexico, and feeling down there concerning the destruction of the building and its contents is much like that which would be felt here were the old building in Philadelphia and its priceless mementoes of the nation's early days and struggles to be destroyed.

Japanese Boycotting American Goods?

A weekly newspaper published in Yokohama says that Japanese are boycotting American goods and seizing them under pretense of enforcing a pure food law. This would be important news if it were true, and as such it is worthy of momentary consideration, but it is probable that there is no truth in it, for if there were it would not have been confined to a single Japanese weekly. Let Uncle Samuel's eagle have his toes stepped on in such manner, and his screech of wrath would have been heard from the rising to the setting sun.

Eighty Years Young.

To-morrow William Booth, founder of the Salvation Army, will be eighty years old, as we express it, but young in spirit and hopefulness. The message of good will he sent to America is one that might well be heeded. It was to display the same degree of initiative, invention, hustle and determination in doing the best things we know how to do that we have, as a nation, expended in growing rich and strong. The need supplied by the Salvation Army is not one that is felt by all, but there was a peculiar strain of human sheep that was lost to other shepherds and he went forth and found them as no other shepherd ever did since the Good Shepherd taught the world that the sheep that had gone astray were better worth looking after than those that had not. Long life to William Booth, father of the Salvation Army.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

"THE HOLYLAND."

By Gustav Frenssen.

This book has nothing to do with the Holyland in Palestine, but with the mythical village of "Hillegien" on an inlet from the North Sea, Holstein, North Germany, a few of whose humble folk cherished the tradition that, out of their village and out of the loins of some one of them, there should yet arise one who would show the world the way to holiness of life, a practical means of reaching the state of sinlessness and physical comfort embodied in Christ's conception of the Kingdom of God, which men have not yet been able to find and which, to most of us, still seems a way off and a long time coming. Those who read our review, some weeks since, of "Jorn Uhl," will perhaps remember with what satisfaction we spoke of Gustav Frenssen and his reception by the German people as the author of the great German novel, "The Holyland" abundantly maintains the splendid reputation the author had previously achieved. It is a masterpiece of its kind, a bit sombre, perhaps, in a key something below the poetical, but healthful and helpful nevertheless. It is a story of the souls of folk rather than of people, and yet without putting the possessors of those souls upon the rack that they may be forced to give up the ghost while men look on, or upon the dissecting table that their souls may be delved for through heart's blood and tears. They tell their own stories as children do, in word, look and act, keeping nothing hid, and yet without effort to depict or to conceal. As many as ten star performers, and as many more lay figures, occupy the stage at different times and in such groups and scenes as keep the panorama moving from childhood to middle life, from middle life to age. The highest of human relations are handled without tarnish, the lowest without crassness and when one has finished the book and laid it down it is with a sense of loss such as comes to one who moves away from a town where he has long lived leaving behind the fellowships of a lifetime. The culmination of the book is indispensable to the story or a full enjoyment of it, is such a resume of the life of Jesus of Nazareth as conforms to the present day results of German scholarship. This chapter will be repellent to those who are conservative in their Christian faith, and yet of interest as embodying the consensus of latest German scholarship in that department of research. Those of more liberal tendencies will find much in the chapter that will appeal to them as a like-though explanation of problems that have perplexed them. In neither case need this chapter militate for or against the enjoyment of a good story exceedingly well told. (Dana Estes & Co., Boston, publishers.)

THE REFORMER.

By E. R. Sill.

The Editor of The California Weekly writes: "I enclose a copy of Prof. Edward Rowland Sill's, 'The Reformer,' which appeared two years ago in the July Century, 1887, and which, perhaps, you may see fit to publish. Sill must have had a premonition of the work of men like Frances Henry.

Yours truly,

FRANK T. SWETT.

Martinez, Cal.
Before the monstrous wrong he sets him down—

One man against a stone-walled city of sin.
For centuries those walls have been a building;
Smooth porphyry, they slope and coldly glisten.
The flying storm and wheeling sun. No chink,
No crevice left the thinnest arrow in.
He fights alone, and from the cloudy ramparts

A thousand evil faces gibe and jeer him.
Let him lie down and die; what is the right.
And where is justice, in a world like this?

But by and by, earth shakes herself, impatient;
And down, in one great roar of ruin, crash.
Watch-tower and citadel and battlements.
When the red dust has cleared, the lonely soldier
Stands with strange thoughts beneath the friendly stars.

MAGAZINES—MIRRORS OF MEN.

The public does not realize how intimately a magazine is the reflection of the personality of its editor. This fact explains much of the wonder that an article or poem of merit should so often "go the rounds" before it is accepted. But that the editor's personality gives a magazine its character, its quality of effectiveness, may readily be proved by a glance at some magazines and editors.

The World's Work, for example, made an instant success when it was founded in 1900. Walter H. Page has been its editor from the start. The World's Work is a weekly of articles on the South. Mr. Page is a Southern man, a native of North Carolina. The World's Work publishes many articles on the advance in education. Mr. Page taught school in his youth and is so much interested in educational matters that he devotes much time to the work of the great Southern Education Board, of which he is a member. The World's Work has followed the material progress of the West with great persistency. Mr. Page began his career as an editor of a daily paper in St. Joseph, Mo. The articles in The World's Work have, with all their seriousness of subject, a saving grace of anecdote, incident, sometimes humor. Mr. Page, in private life, is a conversationalist of rare charm and wit. The Southerner's native gift of story-telling and humor. And the fact that The World's Work has a New England, rather than a Southern, quality of compression and temperate statement is explained by Mr. Page's residence in Boston and editorship of The Atlantic Monthly, the most conservative of all American magazines.

Again, consider The Saturday Evening Post, the breezy, humorous, slangy, sometimes flippant, often flamboyant weekly paper, published in staid old Philadelphia. George Horace Lorimer is "the reason." The spirit of the Post is not the spirit of Philadelphia. It is the spirit of Chicago, where Mr. Lorimer was educated as a boy where he worked as a "Phil" Armour or "Old Gorgon Graham," as he afterwards disguised him, and where he was married. It is also the spirit of youth. Mr. Lorimer was only thirty-one when he became editor-in-chief of the Post.

Collier's Weekly is edited by Norman Hapgood. Its tendency in editorial comment toward Socialistic solutions of government problems and its articles on Socialistic questions are reflections of Mr. Hapgood's conviction of the truth of theoretical Socialism. Its frequent and distinctive studies of the American stage are reflections of Mr. Hapgood's taste and experience, for Mr. Hapgood was formerly one of the foremost American dramatic critics. Most of the fiction accepted by Collier's is written by New England writers and a large share of it by Harvard graduates. Mr. Hapgood is a Harvard graduate, and deeply imbued with the Harvard spirit of restraint and with the "New England conscience" and that subtle quality of mind that Yale men designate as "Harvard poison." Naturally fiction that reflects these characteristics appeals quickest to Mr. Hapgood, and naturally the people who write it are in the environment where he sits. Therefore Collier's also makes a social play upon all things pertaining to Lincoln, a subject that has always appealed most powerfully to Mr. Hapgood's imagination. He is the author of a biography of Lincoln.

S. S. McClure once stated his editorial creed, and hit the point off exactly. In effect it was this: "I believe I am essentially an average American man. Hence my tastes are probably the tastes of at least a large share of American men. Therefore I print the things that interest me. I am interested in politics, first of all. I like a funny story; I like stories of travel—in America; I like love stories." He hit pretty close to the broad field of average American taste.

This intimate reflection of the character of the editor is what gives a magazine its consistent flavor from month to month, so that the reader who likes it to-day will like it a year from to-day. This fact involves the further fact that, judgment upon manuscripts being finally passed by one man, that judgment is subject not only to the tastes of one man but to the obscurer idiosyncrasies of his character and to the acquired peculiarities of his habit of mind. But, after all, the editor stands or falls with the judgment of the public, and the successful editor is, therefore, himself a reflection of the taste of a large constituency of the public.

A Magazine of Social Advance.

"Charities and The Commons" is the name under which a little magazine has been published for some years under the auspices of the Charities Publication Committee, an organization of such distinguished leaders in social progress as Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, Jacob A. Riis, of New York, and O. K. Cashin, of San Francisco. The magazine has conducted elaborate researches in social conditions, most notably in its recent investigations into the living conditions of wage earners in Pittsburgh. The name of the magazine has just been changed to the more comprehensive title of "The Survey," qualified by the sub-title: "Social—Charitable—Civic." Dr. Edward T. Devine, who was in charge of the Red Cross relief work following the fire in San Francisco, is the editor in chief. The California Weekly heartily commends "The Survey" to the attention of all persons who are interested in the broad phases of social and civic betterment, as a clearinghouse of accurate and significant information.

SILK WEAVER'S PRAYER.

By Grace Latimer Jones.

O pitiful Saviour, hear, I pray,
O Jesu, pity me!
But He not stirred, nor sighed, but looked Down in his agony.

I hear the whirr, the noisy whirr,
I hear the looms that snarl and sing;
They strain my eyes, they cramp my hand,
And make my soul an ugly thing.

O Jesu, Saviour, pity me!
In God's holy name,
Me, in God's image made, yet now
Not God's in soul or frame.

O Jesu, Jesu, Mary's Son,
Christ, in thy suffering there,
Pity the blemsied! Where the wheel
That left a body fair?

It left the dullness in my heart,
The swift silk sheet that passed my eye,
It caught from me the gleam of youth,
It took my soul as it passed by.

It stole from me the strength of limb
That should have bidden me cheer my thriftright;
All crooked of knee and curved of back,
She fires my heart and mocks my sight.

O Mary, Saviour-mother, thou,
Couldst thou then descry
The rising Cross, yet bore him to
So miserably die?

No hope of spring with fresh earth small
And rainbow shower; no comrade dear,
No flight of thought, no joy is mine;
My life a burden, mean and drear.

O Jesu, Mary's suffering Son,
O Jesu, pity me!
O Jesu, bend and kiss, and free
My soul from agony.
—From the Boston Transcript.

THE SECRET.

By Charlotte Becker.

Far and wide a pilgrim went,
Happiness was his goal;
Youth and dreams and gold he spent,
Still his quest was vain.

But when he, expecting naught,
Fled from crowd and mart—
Lo, he found the boon he sought
Hid within his heart!

THE ARCH ROYCROFTER

By ELMER ELLSWORTH CAREY.

Elbert Hubbard, sole Roycroft, High Chief of the Immortals, manufacturer of books and furniture, candy and carpets, editor, author, neoclast, lecturer, critic and so on to the 11th power, is making his regular annual tour as Head Salesman and Chief Drummer for the Roycrofters, East Aurora, which is in the State of New York. The said Elbert Hubbard is well known as the editor of The Philistine, a magazine of protest, which protests against ministers, lawyers, doctors and the idle rich; against colleges, churches, and the 400 and against modern methods of living and thinking and civilization in general. Elbert is the author of "A Message to Garcia," the title of a small pamphlet, of which over 2,000,000 copies have been distributed, and which is worthy of a distribution of 10,000,000 copies annually for ninety-nine years.

There is in East Aurora, of the Empire State, a manufacturing plant, known as The Roycrofters, which stands alone, distinct and unique; there is nothing like it elsewhere on the footstool; as to the desirability of the spread of the Roycroft germ there is a distinct difference of opinion among our very best citizens. Furiously attacking the ecclesiastical dogmas of the day, defending Ingersoll to the last ditch, denouncing the methods of the Sunday school and the religious revival, assaulting by invective and sarcasm the belief in a revealed religion, thundering even at the very foundation of creedal Christianity, Elbert Hubbard is a perpetually roving storm-center around which clash and dart the lightnings of an offended, outraged and indignant clergy. Hubbard has openly challenged any reputable and accredited minister in this country to meet him in the glare of the lime light and give battle for the faith within him, and I am sorry that the ministers with one accord refused the challenge. A debate between Hubbard and any minister would be read by several million people; no minister, though he lived a hundred lifetimes, could hope to reach such an audience. Ministers denounce Hubbard, but often contribute to the box-office receipts when he comes to town.

On the other hand Mr. Hubbard believes in the simple life, temperate living, the dignity of labor, the evil of idleness and idle riches, the wholesomeness of outdoor life, pure air, kind thoughts, the dignity of manhood and the religion of love. He believes in the universal church of mankind, in the law of kindness and good will, and beneficence of natural laws. He believes in the innate goodness of the human heart, denies the doctrine of original sin, human depravity and the necessity for spiritual salvation. At least Elbert Hubbard says he believes in these things. He is accused of insincerity, and there are some proofs that the charge is not unfounded.

Mr. Hubbard has genius. He has a national reputation. He can draw an audience in any city of the nation. He has a great intellect; he is a vivid and pleasing writer, a good business man, and a speaker that charms his audiences. In his lines of thought he acknowledges no master; his style is innate.

He stands for intellectual freedom; he believes that no politician, preacher, lawyer or doctor should manufacture ideas and beliefs for popular consumption; he abhors "canned thought" and "combats" superstition in all quarters. He has branded Joaquin Miller's poem, "Columbus," as the greatest poem of the ages. He is the author of "Little Journeys," a series of essays, which range over the entire field of history, science, art, and invention, and which are destined to take a place among the classics of English literature, being delightful compositions in theme, style and treatment.

In penning these comments and criticisms on the Chief Philistine, I am influenced neither by malice nor admiration; I have no bias, no prejudice. Hubbard should be praised for what he has done to develop self reliance, character and intellectual freedom and to bring about a more rational system of living and more humane business methods. His manufactured articles that he peddles about the country are artistic, original, pleasing; they appeal to those with esthetic tastes and inclinations. Those who have not read The Philistine should do so; they will find a brand new style; they will find epigram, wit, humor, and they will probably read to the end—even the advertisements—although they may condemn. The Philistine is decidedly Hubbardesque; it has served as a model for scores of freakish, one-man magazinelets, that have risen like bubbles on the literary stream only to disappear at the first whirlpool. It takes a powerful and brilliant man to write all the articles in even a small magazine twelve months in the year for ninety-nine years, which is the job Hubbard has undertaken; but even he finds it well to print occasionally an article from some contributor.

Hubbard has been accused of stealing epigrams, mottoes, ideas and inspirations from other writers. There is evidence to support a charge of plagiarism to the second degree. I am informed that Hubbard has said that any one who is smart enough to recognize a brilliant thought should have the privilege of giving it a new dress and using it without credit. However, if this is Mr. Hubbard's custom, he has plenty of company.

Hubbard loves notoriety and publicity; he often publishes in his magazine unfriendly criticisms, but more often he reprints commendatory notices. He is vain, wears long hair and a flyaway tie; he likes to pose, and he loves applause.

I am afraid that the Arch Philistine is guilty of a sublimated species of grafting; I am fearful that he plays a bunco game in an artistic manner (quite "Roycroftite") with the trusting Immortals and others who worship at the shrine of the Sage of East Aurora. In The Philistine and in Elbert Hubbard's lectures the idea is delicately fostered, although indirectly and by implication only, that the Roycroft establishment is a great philanthropic undertaking on a co-operative basis; that Mr. Hubbard is giving his labors gratuitously for the common good; and that a small army of artisans and young people are living in Arcadian simplicity, working, playing and singing by turns and participating in the beneficent scheme of social and business co-operation. Nothing is farther from the truth. Mr. Hubbard owns the Roycroft establishment root and branch, and pockets the profits, which are considerable. It is strange that no Napoleon of finance has tried to incorporate Hubbard and his Roycroft plant; for the Chief Philistine has invented and discovered a new way of separating shekels from a confiding clientele. No, the Hubbard manufacturing

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

This Is the Thing.

This is the thing that staggers and crawls
Where only life's vermin dwell;
This is the larker in crime red halls,
Sudden and foul as hell.
This is the thing, with the dim, bleared eyes
Striving life's scroll to scan,
This is the thing for the world's despise,
And yet it was once—a man.

This is the thing, all broken and frayed,
That a mother-heart held dear,
He looked in her eyes where the daylight played,
And drew to her breast more near,
And the mother dreamed—Then the great world came,
And he looked on its sin and smiled,
Till his soul was burned by its white-hot flame.
This thing that was once a child.

This is the thing of the depth profound
That under man's structure lies,
Less than the brutes of the upper ground,
Leering to weeping skies,
Yet never a creature—doubt not, my soul—
Is lost in the wise God's plan,
And He, as the acorns of healing roll,
Shall make of this thing—a Man.

Justice and Law Met.

Justice and Law met. Frequently they do not, but in this instance they did.
"Well, how are you making it?" Law inquired.

"Pretty hum," Justice replied.
"How so?"
"Well, in the first place, my eyes are bandaged, and it isn't pleasant."
"I suppose not, but I had to cover your eyes myself for fear you would see too much of my proceedings."
"I also am troubled by paralysis; can't move one side of my face at all."
"What caused it?"
"Oh, it was necessary if I was to act as presiding goddess in court proceedings."

"I don't see why."
"Don't, hey? It's like this. They drag in a poor wretch who has stolen seventy-three cents, try him in a hurry and send him over the road. Now, it is my traditional duty, is it not, to frown upon the criminal? Very well,
I turn the unparalyzed side of my face toward him and frown, and he feels it keenly. Then they bring, in an automobile, a man who has been bribed for a million dollars or so. He is as guilty as shoal, and everybody knows it, but he has sixteen learned lawyers who insist that he is not. It is the same old guilt that possessed the little chap, but it is gold-plated.
Then the trial begins with the summoning of 7,000 veniremen who are dismissed with great rapidity. What is his Honor, meaning the best but handicapped by a thousand fool statutes and proceedings, to do? And what am I to do?
If I frown I am likely to interfere with the defense, which would disturb the honorable lawyers who represent it. The result is that I have to keep the side of my face toward the defense perfectly placid, and the attempt to do so in some cases has paralyzed that side.
I shall be grateful if I do not drop dead before a case now on is completed. It's a sad situation. Oh, I wish you could hold my position for a while!"

"As you well know," the Law coldly responded, "I have for a long time refused to have much of anything to do with you."
So, as usual, they parted with mutual distrust.

An Altruistic Chap.

I am an altruistic chap,
And treat my neighbor well;
My bounty's poured into his lap,
His suitness to dispel.
And if there's doubt in one who reads
Here's proof for him who kens:
Each day I'm planting garden seeds
To feed my neighbor's hens.

The Devil Thought Twice.

(And this notwithstanding the presence of the governor, mayor, supreme judges, and other notables at the banquet.)

The devil one day in his office was sitting;
His face was lit up by a jubilant grin.
For all of his demons came flitting and flitting
To tell him that mortals his pitfalls were in
The lower-down thief, and the higher-up

The prostitute justice that shyters create,
The technical bosh and its legal subscriber—
"Oho," quoth the devil, "my business is great!"

"Now bring me," he cried, with a jocular caper.

A jocular caper his joy to disclose,
"Bring straight from the pressroom my favorite paper.

Then leave me to read it while holding my nose.

For ever, when Justice to Justice proves traitor,

Or looking big rascals to puncture the small.

I note with a joy that I find an elater,
The dear Oakland Tribune indorses it all."

They brought him the Tribune. He read it and chuckled.

Then rolled on the floor in demoniac glee,
But then he bethought him, the tear-drops he knuckled.

As he sighed, "There is trouble I sadly foresee."

My 'trap is some spotted I'm freely confessing;

'Tis painted quite black past a question of doubt,

But the fragment that's left I hold as a bless-

Out-of-Doors for the Kids.

George Wharton James, the well-known author and lecturer, says that, throughout much of the year, the children of California should be taught out of doors rather than in many schoolrooms. Mr. James is right, but he will be dead some time before the average school official will be made to see it. With shimmering sunshine, a myriad of flowers and the songs of many birds forever summoning them to the open, the wonder is that California urchins can make even a bluff at studying within walls through much of our year. It is hard enough for even adults to confine themselves in offices during this enchanted time, and how much more difficult it must be for those who still are in the bud let him answer who has a memory that sometimes harks rear-ward.

The trouble with us out here is that we do not half realize that we live in California. A large proportion of us came from a country where, during six months of the year, cold kept us in the house, and during the other six months we never could tell what day or hour it would rain. We came here and imported the customs which were essential in the East, among them that of keeping pupils in the house and away from the intellect-vivifying ozone of the out-of-doors world. We would do well to consider where we are and give our urchins full share in the largesse of health which nature offers them. But we will not do it till we wake to realization of the fact that eastern health laws are not needed where there are no icy fetters to bind them on the children of men.

Interfere With Business.

First Citizen: It is a demonstrable proposition that graft prosecutions always interfere with business.

Second Citizen: With what business do they interfere?

"Why, the business of grafting, of course, you chump."

I Object.

To higher education and suffrage for women because—

I notice that, as it is, they know enough to "do up" the men quite often, and so I contend that we ought to take no more chances; and because—

High authorities claim that if women voted they would make political matters worse than they now are, and even the thought of such a situation ought to make anyone sick; and because—

Woman's place is in the home, and if she has no home she ought to stay there anyway;
and because—

The theory that there should be no taxation without representation may have been good enough for 1776, but it is worn to a frazzle now; and because—

We must sink or swim, live or die, by the man made aphorism that woman is man's mental inferior, and we whose mothers or wives disprove it must cling closest to it; and because—

It is woman's divine mission to rear the babies, and if she has none she ought to hire a few; and because—

Woman doesn't want to vote, and if she says she does she is a prevaricator.

At any rate, if I do not object for the foregoing reasons it is difficult to figure out why I should, for the current arguments are quite generally included in the above list.

Christ Is Risen!

Christ is risen! Nay, the world
Walketh still through fog of pain,
And her robe is tear-impaired
By the drip of sorrow's rain.

Yet, oh, soul of mine, look up;
Thanks for ceaseless bounty give;
Drink thy fill from Heaven's cup,
Christ is risen, and doth live!

Christ is risen! Nay, a cry
From the depths of woe is heard
"Love is not for such as I,"
Man's response to Heaven's word
Yet, my soul, arise and sing;
Join the glad, triumphant strain,
While a million voices ring:
"Christ is risen, and doth reign!"

THE GRIFT CASES.

In the trial of Patrick Calthoun, indicted for bribery, nothing appreciable has been gained during the past week. There has been work enough; venires have come and gone, able attorneys have glared at one another, and numerous talesmen have been examined and dismissed, and still just ten men have been finally passed as jurors, and when the others may be secured no man knoweth. The full jury may be obtained within another week, and it is difficult to conceive how this end can be postponed a month, although a long-suffering people could not be greatly surprised by anything which might come to pass in a criminal trial wherein the defendant has plenty of money.

But if the main trial has merely marked time, one of its interesting offshoots has come to the front. Once upon a time James H. Bowling was secretary and treasurer of the carmen's union. At the same time, it now appears, he was in the pay of the United Railroads, whence it will be evident that Mr. Bowling is a nice man. His obligation to the United Railroads, as consideration for its pay, was to secure or manufacture evidence, direct or by implication, that Rudolph Spreckels, Fremont Older, William J. Burns, James D. Phelan, Francis J. Heney, and men of that type, were responsible for the carmen's strike of 1906 and 1907. He did quite well in securing such evidence, whether it existed or not, until his heart misgave him or he concluded he could make more money out of the job. Then he went, personally or by agent, to Burns and Older and offered to sell his evidence, secured or manufactured, to them for $10,000. His offer was not accepted, but the District Attorney's office called the attention of United Railroad lawyers to the matter and offered to let them see that Bowling was punished for his treachery. Nothing doing; those attorneys did not appear desirous to air the facts concerning Bowling. So, on the complaint of Fremont Older, Bowling and F. E. Davidson, one of Bowling's assistants in obtaining evidence, whether any existed or not, were arrested for criminal libel, and two more were added to the many ships of delayed justice which are waiting in San Francisco's office.

In connection with the prosecution's recovery of 1,693 of its papers, copies or originals, from the desks or safes of United Railroad officials, the funniest event of the week is the attempt of the said officials to secure the return of the stolen papers by judicial process. From Judge Van Nostrand they have secured an alternative writ of prohibition, a temporary order, and to-day Judge Seawell will decide whether the filched goods are to be returned to them. After all, there is something admirable in the "nerve" displayed in such a proceeding, and it is understood that all receivers of stolen property are awaiting the decision with hopeful interest.

In the trial of Adolph S. Newburgh, charged with attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case, E. A. S. Blake was placed on the witness stand and testified, as he did in the previous Newburgh and Murphy trials, that at the suggestion of Newburgh and Murphy he attempted to bribe John Martin Kelly. Sickness has delayed the completion of his testimony. William H. Schooler testified that he was employed as an attorney to defend Blake by Newburgh and Murphy, but his memory in relation to the details was vague.

The case of George D. Collins, convicted of perjury and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment, was argued before the United States Supreme Court this week by Assistant District Attorney Cook. The case has been in the courts since before the big fire, and there now are those who hopefully believe that Collins' punishment may begin before many more months have passed.

("The Arch Roycroft" - Concluded.)

plant is not a co-operative concern, and there is no philanthropy connected with it than with the Standard Oil company. Mr. Hubbard engages the young people of East Aurora by the week or month and he pays only nominal wages in the coin of the realm; he pays very high wages in taffy, fatherly admonition, instruction, advice and glittering generalities. True he is not a hard taskmaster, but if the pay-roll were published in The Philistine, or The Fra, I think there would be numerous vacancies in the roll of the Immortals. In one of his ads he says that one of the "kandy" girls makes candy ($1.00 per pound) in a spotless kitchen while the other, curled up in the sunny cushioned window, twangs the guitar. I suppose the twanging of the guitar is to drown the anguish of the listful who have been wheedled into paying $1.00 for a pound of candy.

Mr. Hubbard's real business is selling books; furniture, rag carpets, leather work, candy, etc., for real money. He sells his manufactured products under the guise of philanthropy and art. He publishes two magazines for the purpose of obscuring the real issue, which is hard cash; his magazines are really advertisements for himself and his rag carpets, and he is very successful in his advertising schemes. It is said that at one time 100,000 copies of The Philistine were printed monthly; it takes a genius to get 100,000 people to pay ten cents each per month for an advertising catalogue. But Hubbard has still more audacious advertising successes to his credit. He is the only manufacturer who can tour the country year after year delivering illustrated lectures, describing his plant and his goods, drawing large audiences, and charging an admission fee of $1.00. Yet Hubbard does this very thing. He has one lecture which is simply an advertisement for his business and his wares; he delivers this homily with slides showing specimens of his furniture, book binding, etc., at $1.00 per admission. So well does he cover up the commercial part that his patrons never suspect that they have been bamboozled. And in the lobby Hubbard has an assortment of books for sale; he uses his lecture hall as a sample room, unpacks his wares and peddles them industriously. But he does all this in the name of art and the public cannot see the dollar sign that spreads the sickly hue of commercialism over all.

Hubbard has capitalized certain ideas, popular with some classes, and is making a success of his venture; posing as a litterateur, art critic, a social reformer, an intellectual Camillus, a philanthropist, an apostle of a better civilization, an advocate of mental freedom, a foe of shams, and preaching advanced ideas socially and commercially, he never for a moment loses sight of the polestar of his existence—the Almighty Dollar. He industriously peddles candy at $1.00 per pound, and rag carpets at $1.50 per yard, all the profits going into his personal pocket. Is this a case of obtaining money under false representations?

The Lady's Hat.

"That lady" that reminds me of a pictured beehive I used to see in one of my school books," the writer remarked to a fellow pedestrian.

"So-o?" drawled the person addressed. "In Holstein where I spent my boyhood we never had any other kind of beehive except the painted of straw, conical in shape, only they were brown instead of blue and did not have a cluster of oranges pinned at the side."

Work basket, clothes basket, milk pail and beehive furnish suggestions of form for women's hats, and a fault with them is that they make a hydrocephalic style of hair dressing indispensable to their wearing.

Like Some Others.

"Do you consider Blinks a thinking man?"
"Certainly I do. In fact, I know it."
"Well, then, what does he think?"
"Thinks that he thinks."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Out For Governor

Charles F. Curry Charles F. Curry, Secretary of State, freely told his friends, while the direct primary law was in the throes of birth, that if it came through all right he would be a candidate before the people of California for governor thereof. Whether this was given out as a horrible fatality to follow the law in the event of its enactment, or as a simple statement of deliberate intent, is not quite clear but, anyhow, it is well understood that Charles Curry is out for governor. He will carry his candidacy directly to the people, and stronger things than happened than that he should win out. What sort of a beginning would that be for our new direct primary law?

His Standards Of Morality

There have been those who objected to Charles F. Curry on the ground that he possesses no tangible, certain, definite standards of political morality. They are mistaken. His standard of morality, political and otherwise, is simple, intelligible, readily applicable. It is this: How will this act affect my political future? From rising late in the morning until going to bed (also late in the morning) Charles Curry performs no act however inconsequential that is not first judged by that standard. He would not throw a bootjack at a warbling tomcat without reflecting upon whose tomcat that was most likely to be and what effect the identification of the bootjack would be likely to have on his political future. He would not leave a brickbat at a vagrant canine without first looking in all directions to see if some sentimental animal lover would be likely to view the act with mental reservations. Those who think that Charles Curry is without a moral standard don't know their man. He has one. It is high only when compared with the moral standards of Abner Weed and Warren Porter, but it has served him many a year.

Charley Curry Nobody's Fool

Charles F. Curry's early life was hard bondage. He had few opportunities such as come to the college-bred man of a later generation, but those taken him for an ignoramus is not wise. Those black, piercing eyes of his do not look out from a dull brain or an ill-informed mind. He has a good memory, especially of political obligations and asperities, and he has been a reader of strong books. He knows men for what they are and can be kind and agreeable to a man he would like to chew up without betraying inward hostility. When he used to be in his cups he used to be ugly and he used to be in his cups every day by four o'clock, but when that brought him face to face with the skull and crossbones he stopped short. He has had the strength of mind and will to turn his back on the habits of a lifetime and so keep that Satan behind him. All honor to the man who can do that! His money goes to buy gin just as it did before, yet not for himself, but if every man in California for whom he has bought a drink turns out and votes for him at the primary he may head his party's ticket, for he is known far and wide as the best entertainer at the State Capital.

The State's Business At His Finger Tips

No man in the state has the state's business more nearly at his fingers' tips than Charles F. Curry, and no man has stuck a greater number of his personal friends into official positions. There is hardly an office in the state that has not one or more of them. In fact Charles Curry's idea of a benefactor of his race is the one who has made two official positions for him to fill, where there was only one before. He is a liberal spender of the state's money as well as his own and every legislature confronts bills for loading his office to the gunwales with starboard positions. Few appropriation bills would be vetoed if he were governor. His contempt for taxes is only equaled by his contempt for those who make a fuss about paying them. If it would make him more solid with the toilers, he would go eighteen-million-dollar Gillett better on the state road proposition by proposing to roof in with state and state all the roads that Gillett's appropriation may build.

Where Curry's Strength Lies

Those who are giving thought to the gubernatorial campaign of 1910, and there are many who are, will make a mistake if they leave out of consideration the candidacy of Charles F. Curry. He is to be reckoned with. It is not the opinion of any well-informed person that a majority of the Republicans of California can prefer Curry to all other candidates, but there are a good many thousand voters in San Francisco, Sacramento and elsewhere who look upon Curry as an ideal politician and they will all vote for him no matter who else may be in the field. He has either conferred some favor upon them or upon some one of their friends. "He is my friend," is the touchstone of his political career. Upon that cohesive principle he and his followers conceive all governmental institutions to be founded. His personal following will make a quantity that it lacks in quality. Nor has he been disobedient to Mr. Herrin, and his own hold upon the vote that gives the Herrin machine its potency may prove so strong as to compel the Southern Pacific political bureau to come to him lest that vote be divided and the bureau be undone.

His Election Unfortunate

His health permitting, his candidacy for governor is to be reckoned with. Give him the push vote and divide the anti-machine vote between half a dozen others and the domination will be his. Against his official efficiency little can be said. California has had few state secretaries who managed their offices better or at greater cost to the state. As ex-officio purchasing agent for the state he drives no hard bargains on the state's behalf. A limited number of firms get the business and they get well paid. Yet he has never been caught in any transaction that was either very crooked or very straight. His views of state policy are narrow, political and personal. He investigated strongly against Governor Pardee's applying to the Department of Agriculture at Washington for a technically trained State Forester because Mr. Allen, the appointee, was not a citizen of California. He has steadily fought the State Board of Charities and Corrections as being obtrusive and meddlesome. These facts give an inkling as to his bent of mind, which is always that of the petty politician. His nomination for governor by a plurality vote of his party would prove a staggering blow to the direct primary idea.

Alden Anderson As Bank Superintendent

The appointment of Alden Anderson as State Superintendent of Banking, to succeed one of the state boards of "organization" politicians, was at least a clear use of the appointive power by Governor Gillett. Trained bankers will be inclined to share the opinion of Mr. Anderson himself, that it would have been possible for the governor to find some one better qualified to fill the position than Mr. Anderson. He is not a technically trained banker. He has had the same sort of connection with banks that many other business men have had without once suspecting themselves of being bankers. During the bankers' panic of 1907 there was a deep sense of public concern for the stability of a banking institution with which Mr. Anderson's name was connected and some tall hustling was done by Mr. Anderson and his associates to bridge a wide-mouthed chasm, but it was bridged and all is well that ends well. That experience probably taught Mr. Anderson a lesson in conservative banking that will stand the new State Bank Superintendent in good stead and prove an added qualification for the position. As a public servant Mr. Anderson has always proven honest, faithful in the performance of public duty, and his executive abilities are exceptional. He is inclined to be easy rather than aggressively resolute, and the hand that he will lay upon the banks of California will be cleaner rather than strong, persuasive rather than compelling.

Not Devoid Of Politics

The appointment of Alden Anderson to be State Bank Superintendent is not devoid of political significance. He camped in the political twilight zone. He was never openly an "organization" man and he could not be induced to assume an attitude of hostility to the "organization." As a large shipper of fruits his relations with the railroad people were close and, presumably, sympathetic, and yet, also presumably, he was not disposed to take orders from the Southern Pacific's political bureau without question. Mr. Anderson has quite a political constituency, by affiliation rather than by leadership or organization, and it was good politics to place Alden Anderson under obligations to, and make him a part of, an "organization" administration. The incident will be likely to make a good machine man of him and his influence, exerted upon and through the banking institutions of the state, will not be inconsiderable. This is not saying that Mr. Anderson will suffer political considerations to stand between him and the proper discharge of his official duties. He will discharge those duties first and afterward give an eye to the "organization's" political fences. The declaration which Governor Gillett made between his election and inauguration, that he would make every appointment with the view of strengthening the Republican "organization," has not been departed from in this instance.

Governor Hughes' Primary Bill

Governor Charles E. Hughes of New York quickly sensed what the general public has been slow in understanding: that control of the party committee of the party in power involves control of the government. He was not first to discover this important fact. Our own Mr. Herrin found it out so long ago that he has probably forgotten how or when he first came to know it, but it seems to have been left to Governor Hughes to discover the remedy. Heretofore party committees have not been representative. Party bosses have been free to select the governing bodies of parties and, through these bodies to program the nominating conventions. Governor Hughes proposes to make the governing body of the party the party convention and to make the delegate-committeemen come before the party constituency for reelection as soon as they shall have done the work of the convention. If that work was not done as it should have been the people have a chance to turn them down. This is a great idea, but it will take the backing of the state of New York to force it through the legislature.

UP AND DOWN :: THE STATE ::

The occasional California fowl which makes a walking good mine of itself was again discovered the other day by Mrs. Emma Wagner, who resides near Lodi. In dressing a domestic duck for dinner she found in its craw a gold nugget about as large as a good sized pea and worth, presumably, two or three dollars. So again is illustrated the unique advantage of Californians in marketing for fowls. To be sure, they may draw a blank, but again, they never can tell when they will draw a capital prize in uncolored gold.

Mrs. Grace Goodyear-Kirkman has sold the Benicia New Era to John R. Cronin, and it is up to him to maintain the excellent standard in country journalism which she has set. If he does more he will have to keep moving.

Those in the best position to judge estimate that from 60,000 to 80,000 "colonists" are coming to California this spring. Out here, however, we use the term "colonist" too loosely, including a large number of people who come with no intention except to take advantage of reduced rates, see the state and return East. Possibly one in three of these "colonists" will remain, and this would be an addition to our population worthy of consideration.

The people of San Jose recently voted on the question of issuing bonds to construct and operate a municipal incinerator plant, and now the common council of that city has declared the election void. The decision was based on the fact that a voting machine failed to "deliver the goods," making no record of 153 votes in one of the wards. Such machines must do better work than this or it will not be long before they will be permanently retired.

That the Philadelphia Western Development Company believes that the Tokay will more and more come to the front as a table grape is demonstrated by the fact that it has purchased 1,000 acres of land near Marysville, every acre of which will be set out to this variety of grape. It is understood, too, that the company is likely to purchase another thousand acres in that vicinity for the same purpose.

San Luis Obispo had an election to vote on the proposition of bonding the city for water, sewers and bridges, and one might have looked some time without discovering that there was any opposition, as the following statistics concerning the result indicate: For water bonds, 725; against, 53. For sewer bonds, 710; against, 65. For bridge bonds, 718; against, 56. That is to say, one person in thirteen or fourteen was opposed to these improvements. It is a record of which San Luis Obispo has a right to feel proud.

The state board of forestry has appointed a committee of five members to review and pass upon all literature concerning eucalyptus growing sent out. The committee's "seal of approval" will be placed upon all literature it approves, and in these days of eucalyptus enthusiasm it will be just as well for the people to see that the seal is on a pamphlet before they "swallow" all of its contents.

The city of Visalia, which empties its sewage into Mill creek, now is involved in a lawsuit on that account. Oscar Evans has sued it for $5,000 damages, claiming that the creek now is a menace to health and deteriorates the value of property in its vicinity. A suit of this sort has long been anticipated, and it is not impossible that it may result in Visalia being compelled to find another sewer outlet.

The citizens of Exeter, Tulare county, wanted to incorporate that town, or thought they did, until they held an election which decided, by a vote of 75 to 65, that they did not. However, as they still maintain that they desire nothing so much as incorporation, it is announced that another election to find out whether they do or not, soon will be held.

The charity conference committee of Los Angeles has adopted and scattered broadcast a resolution requesting organized charities and physicians in the Eastern, Middle West, and Southern states to send no more consumptives to Los Angeles, "only," as the resolution says, "to cause suffering to the indigent and a burden to communities to which such patients have no ties." The resolution ends with a warning that if such indigent patients are sent they will promptly be returned to the places whence they came.

The Christian Scientists of Los Angeles are constructing a "Second Church of Christ, Scientist," which, when completed, will have cost about $300,000, and is always the same when this sect erects one of its temples, there will be not a dollar of indebtedness upon it.

Considerable gold still lies beneath the surface of California hills. For instance, the value of that taken from the North Star mine, Grass Valley, last year, was $1,084,212.08.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Stanford University, March 27, 1909.
The Editors, The California Weekly:

A distinguished economist and publicist recently proclaimed his admiration of your paper in my presence. I begged him to write it. Here it is: "I read no paper whose tone and attitude towards public affairs seem to me so precisely correct as The California Weekly. It will be a great misfortune if the people of California let this journal die. Personally I intend to subscribe for it, although I do not expect to be in California more than two months. It voices the kind of tempered, discriminating radicalism which most appeals to me."

Personally I am delighted with The California Weekly. I like it for its sanity. I like it for its open-mindedness. I like it for its courage. And I like it particularly for its sympathetic hospitality to morals and religion—for these add tremendously to the significance of living!

With every good wish,
Very sincerely yours,
CHARLES GARDNER,
Chapman, Stanford University.

We like The California Weekly ourselves for exactly the reasons above given.—The Staff.

If there is one need before another in the newspaper world today it is for a paper that can be depended upon to be truthful so that it will not be necessary for one to take papers bearing upon all sides of all questions, lump their statements together and divide by two in order to reach an average of truth. The California Weekly has made a good beginning. I hope that it will develop into a first-class daily for it will never be in the competing ranks proper until it reaches that stage.

Yours for truth,
H. L. GREGORY.

Placerville, California.

It would require several hundred thousand dollars to finance a state daily on the lines laid down for The California Weekly, and it would be no new to daily journalism that it would take the public no little time to sense the significance of what was going on. Besides, dailies are and must be hurriedly written to be hastily read and the trend for subject matter for serious thinking is toward weeklies and monthlies. There is a sphere of real utility for such a paper as The California Weekly to fill and it is working its way into that field.

To the Staff of The California Weekly:

A friend, loyal to San Francisco and to justice, is sending you the Gospel of Truth to us and to the people in your night for the moral uplift of the state. We especially wish that the young voters of this state could become acquainted with your "School of Citizenship." Oregon, like California, needs an awakening and only through our new citizens can this be accomplished. Your column on "The Deeper Significance of Living" is always interesting and, we believe, what we like best in your paper.

Yours,

AN OREGONIAN.

Portland, March 27, 1909.

The two departments in The California Weekly above spoken of with favor are the ones that have received the strongest endorsement and the most unfavorable criticism, which only shows how differently different persons can think and feel. The chief comfort The Staff takes in them is that they have not been ignored.

Editors, The California Weekly:

As no one is so qualified about your paper as I am, I am sending it to you. It is comparatively easy for a man to stand up and be stout in a battle for he has the stimulus of combat and the sense of responsibility to his readers and to his country to sustain him, but the kind of courage needed to fight the battles of everyday life, the truth, to denounce, strong regardless of the standing, socially and financially, of the wronger, this kind of courage is rarely found among newspaper men, or with many in other callings. It is an interesting fact that the digging up in recent years of instances of imposition and injustice by the few against the many in our land was done by the muckrakers and not by the daily press. In this line of work in California your paper bids fair to prove a tremendous force.

Oakland, Cal.

JOHN T. BELL.

Many daily papers have made great gifts for great causes, such for instance as the Call and Bulletin have made against graft in San Francisco, and such as the Bulletin made against the racetrack evil in this state. All honor to them. Such contests in daily journalism have a good deal of the stimulus of being out on the firing line, but are often waged more with an eye to the spectacular than for achieving permanent results. They are little adapted to the slow siege and are apt to be more effective on the surface than at the foundation of social life. Here is where the thoughtful family weekly should find its field of utility. There are two fields and it takes both kinds of papers to fill them.

HOW THE PLAGUE WAS DRIVEN OUT

E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Among the marvels of preventive medicine, the work of the United States Health and Marine Hospital Service in stamping out the menace of bubonic plague in San Francisco is one of the most illuminating examples. Here the application of modern science and modern business methods combined to illustrate the triumphs of medical research and business organization.

In the first place, San Francisco was really infested with the bubonic plague. No sane man now denies this fact, which the city for a time tried to conceal from itself, like the ostrich with his head in the sand, while the press dispatches to the outside world told every school child the country over the facts. But as soon as San Francisco realized the gravity of the situation it nobly redeemed its reputation for common sense and vigor. This is the story of the temptation and of the worldwide epidemic of the plague of which San Francisco's experience is a part.

The History of Bubonic Plague.

Bubonic plague is as old as history. In the Old Testament, the Book of I Samuel describes how, when the Philistines stole the ark of the covenant, God punished them with a terrible visitation of "emerods," which scientists identify as the modern "buboes," or swollen glands, typical of the plague. And, to placate the Lord for this visitation, their diviners caused the Philistines to offer up "five golden emerods, and five golden mice," which shows that as far back as 1,000 B. C. the plague was associated in men's experience with rats. It remained for modern scientists to discover how the infection from the rats (which always precedes human infection) is transmitted to mankind. Science has proved that the method of transmission is by fleas. The fleas bite an infected rat and, in turn, are infected. The rat dies, and the fleas leave the cold body for the nearest warm blooded animal—usually another rat, but often enough a human being to cause the spread of the disease among men.

What Bubonic Plague Is.

The name "bubonic" is derived from the "buboes," or inflammation and swelling of the lymphatic glands that are typical of the plague in its bubonic form. There are three forms of the disease: the pneumonic, the septicaemic, and the bubonic. All these forms are caused by the same bacillus, but differ in the avenue by which the bacilli are introduced into the system. In the pneumonic form, which is very rare, the bacilli are introduced through the organs of respiration; the lungs are the first to be attacked, and the cause of death (which is almost invariable in this form) is usually diagnosed by physicians who are unfamiliar with the plague as "rapid pneumonia."

In the septicaemic form, the bacilli are introduced by way of the blood vessels. This form is also rare, because the circulatory system is well guarded by nature.

In the bubonic form the bacilli attack the glands. This is the commonest type of the disease. An infected flea bites a human being; the bite itches and the victim scratches the spot, breaking the skin and rubbing the infection in. The bacilli enter the blood, and soon reach the glands, which are simply filters designed by nature to purify foreign matter in the blood. But these filters are not adequate to the task of handling the bubonic bacilli, and an inflammation sets in, which formerly caused death in nearly all cases, and, in spite of the modern serum treatment, causes death in fully half of the cases.

An Earth-Girdling Epidemic.

The bubonic plague is an endemic disease; that is, it appears constantly in one place. But it has lately begun again to spread, as it has before in historical times, following precisely the highways of commerce, carried by infected rats that stow away in cargoes of merchandise. The present movement of the plague began about twenty years ago in a province in Central China. In 1894 it appeared in Hong-Kong, where it wrought such terrible havoc that the British Government bought, for an enormous sum, the entire island on which the native city was built, and burned the whole city to the ground to prevent the spread of the disease to the mainland where the British Hong-Kong is located.

The Pasteur Institute, of Paris, and the Japanese Government, sent bacteriologists to Hong-Kong to study the disease, and experts from both places, within a few days of one another, isolated the specific bacillus of the disease, Orleans and New York. Then came the modern serum treatment and of the sanitary methods of combating its spread.

From Hong-Kong the plague was carried to Bombay, and into the Punjab of India, where, for the past thirteen years, it has killed on an average 250,000 people a year. From India it spread to various Mohammedan countries by means of the pilgrims to Mecca, and to Marseilles and Liverpool in cargoes of ships. It also appeared in San Francisco about 1900. It came from the west coast of South America and across to Venezuela, where it is now raging. It is now also coming up the Spanish Main, and in three or four years the problem of San Francisco will be the problem of New Orleans and New York. The example of San Francisco in successfully eradicating it thus becomes of vital national importance. If San Francisco had let it get over the Rockies, a national problem would have been created. If New York were not prepared to meet, by the example of San Francisco, the possibilities of havoc in the crowded East Side would be appalling.

San Francisco's First Epidemic.

San Francisco's first struggles with the plague were pitiful. It refused to admit its existence. The Federal Government sent Dr. J. J. Kinyoun to investigate, and he reported that it did exist. The newspapers hooted the idea and damned Dr. Kinyoun. He showed the corpses of plague victims to the health officers, together with microscopic proof of the character of the disease. The health officers laughed at him and talked of "rapid pneumonia" and typhoid. Dr. Kinyoun attempted to clean up Chinatown, which was then the focus of infection. He was met with bitter opposition from the city authorities and the press. The local public was ignorant of the facts. Only the rest of the world knew them, while official San Francisco fatuously denied their existence.

Dr. Kinyoun had two successors. They had no better luck. The first epidemic died down, another epidemic broke out, and San Francisco began the same cry, "Keep it quiet." Then, on September 6, 1907, Dr. Rupert Blue, then director of sanitation at the Jamestown Experiment, was ordered by the Federal Government to take San Francisco's plague campaign in charge. Four days later, Dr. Colby Rucker was ordered to follow as his assistant, in the capacity of executive officer. Then began the real fight that has made San Francisco one of the most sanitary cities in the world.

Doctor Blue quickly obtained the co-operation of the city authorities. He pointed out to them exactly what bubonic plague is; he proved beyond a doubt that it was abroad in the city; he proved that everybody else except San Francisco knew it was here; and he made it plain that if San Francisco did not come to her senses and eradicate the plague, San Francisco soon would be quarantined in every part of the world, which would mean that the commerce of the city would literally be ruined, and that with its ruin would come the ruin of every business in the city. "Multiply the horrors of the first weeks following the fire by ten, and then add some for good measure, and you will have a vague conception of what it means to live in a quarantined city," warned Dr. Blue.

The City Aroused.

The city authorities, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchants' Exchange saw the point. They actively seconded Doctor Blue's work. Every club, labor union, and business organization was warned of the crisis and asked to contribute to a fund to fight the rats. A committee waited on the officials of the Southern Pacific company. "You are assessed $30,000," they said. "Please dig." And they dug. To the Santa Fe they said, "Fifteen thousand dollars, please." They got it. The labor unions paid their share.

Then Doctor Blue went after the organization that was at hand to make the fight. He found about 100 men, whose principal qualifications were political pulls. He pointed out to the city that this meant inefficiency. The city asked him to get the Federal Government to take over the whole campaign, and on November 25, 1907, the Treasury Department authorized this action and got money from Congress to back it.

Organizing the "Rat Killers."

A working force was now organized on the basis of intelligence and education. Schools of instruction for employees were started, and the men were taught what the plague is, how it spreads, how to make a sanitary inspection of a premises, where to look for rat-breeding places, and how to catch rats. Others were taught how to take extreme cases into the courts and compel obedience to the law. Others were taught to dissect the killed rats and to distinguish plague-infected rats from the non-infected. Others were taught to keep the minute records of each inspection of premises, of each case in court, of each rat that was examined by the bacteriologist.

Inside two months a force of 1,000 trained men was at work. More than 200,000 rats have been caught and dissected. Hundreds of places have been made rat-proof. Every building within an area of thirty square miles has been inspected, not once but many times. Thousands of dollars worth of insanitary buildings have been destroyed. The result is that the last case of human bubonic plague was treated on January 30, 1908, and the last infected rat was caught on October 23, 1908. The plague is absolutely wiped out. To-day San Francisco is the most sanitary city of its size in America.

But, better still, the public has been educated to sanitary progress. It has been taught how to recognize the plague, how to fight it, and it has the machinery ready made to continue the work of warding off any future attack. And the incidental education in the rudiments of general sanitation is a priceless benefit. Not only has the plague disappeared, but the work of eradicating the plague has radically reduced the death-rate from both typhoid fever and diphtheria.

Incidental Benefits of Campaign.

Furthermore, scientific information of great value has been gained by the campaign in charge. The theory advanced by a Russian scientist, that the rats get the infection from ground squirrels has received strong confirmation from local experiments. Doctor Blue noticed that Contra Costa county was a focus for infection from the plague. He sent men across the bay to see if infected ground squirrels could be found. They were. Then the question arose as to whether the ground squirrels gave the disease to the rats or the rats to the ground squirrels.

This point was determined by testing the virulence of the disease among the two animals. When an infected rat died, poison drawn from its body was injected into a non-infected rat, to give the disease to him. When the second rat died, a third was infected, and so on down a series. These experiments demonstrated this fact: that the disease diminished rapidly in virulence as it was transmitted to each succeeding animal. It took a very long time longer than its predecessor to die of it until the seventh did not die at all. These same experiments, however, when tried on ground squirrels, showed the virulence to be undiminished.

(Concluded on Page 318.)

CHRISTIAN LAW OF TEMPERANCE.

A conception of civil law which provides that the grape or corn may be eaten is less comprehensive than Christian law which orders milk for babes and meat for the strong. God's provisions for gladness of heart and social joys may not be prohibited everybody because somebody overflows the stomach with wine.

The Psalmist gave thanks for wine that gladdens the heart of man. The Master walked ninety miles to comply with man's social needs, and created the best of wine to prolong social joys. St. Paul prescribed wine to the weak for his stomach's sake. But he reproveth the Ephesian Christians for drunkenness. And they who would, in interest of a spurious temperance in one thing, restrict the observance of the Lord's Supper to the use of unfemented grape juice, should note that Ephesus is situated in the heart of Ionia, and that the Ionian wines were like that which the Savior provided at the wedding feast at Cana of Galilee, the strongest and best in the world. And new wine of Christ's time would burst old bottles. Unfemented grape juice has no such effect.

The Master's heavenly life rebukes all wasteful life. Civil law should not be less comprehensive as to abuse, but should include that personal freedom in use which has Old and New Testament sanctions, and is one of "the unalienable rights" for which our American government stands.

Freedom of Use But Not Abuse.

Christ's example and Apostolic teaching permit personal freedom of use, and exclude all abuse of nature's provisions for nature's needs. This is the great temperance principle. For convenience I call it the first.

Prohibitive law excludes personal freedom of use, because personal freedom of use includes freedom to abuse. This is a second great principle. The strict application of either one of these two great principles, affects every man's interest. It touches human nature on its every side. Man's social, mental, and spiritual powers can reach only an abnormal development when personal liberty to use nature's provisions for his needs is denied him by civil law. Any municipal ordinance or civil law is Christian only so far as it is based on the first great principle and supports the spirit of personal freedom included therein.

The second great principle is intended to be personal in its application, and is sound and Christian that far. But a remedy is designed for restoration to normal conditions, and in the very nature of things, is only applicable to those in an abnormal state. The abnormal condition cannot justify denial of the needs of a normal life. As "the life is more than meat and the body more than raiment," there can be no moral sanction to sacrifice the life for meat, nor the body for raiment, nor to prohibit meat and raiment. They are nature's needs, and therefore have God's sanction for personal freedom to use. "They that use with need not a physician." The application of the second principle may only be extended to those who have abused that freedom which inheres as a fundamental "unalienable right" to normal life.

Lawful Use Must Not Be Punished.

Inseparably conjoined with the application of prohibitive law is the false assumption of the right to condemn abuse in terms to cover exclusion of lawful use. The use of the public road may not be prohibited the law abiding citizen because the robber abuses his freedom of use. Penalty is due only to the law breaker. Protection is due only to the orderly citizen. No protection by government is made so costly to the loyal citizen that either his business or health or pleasure is imperilled, his right to use the road is practically oppression. Protection becomes penalty. Such application of civil law is clearly a subversion of the fundamental system of government. Our government is a league of law and order loving citizens, primarily to create power to protect such citizens in "their unalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

None of the corporeal and grape raisers are so restricted by law, in market for their products, by prohibiting the lawful use of them to all law abiding citizens, because some individuals abuse use of whiskey, beer and wine, then the innocent suffer the penalty due the guilty. Such law destroys the very end for which our government exists. The republic is based on the fact that man is created capable of self government. This is the basic principle of citizenship, as opposed to the status of a subject. Remedial measures are a necessity for government as for the individual. The digger of pitfalls in the public road may be justly prohibited the use of the road, because he is engaged in destroying a public need. He shows a spirit of such ill will as forfeits all right to free citizenship. His lawless spirit justifies law to take from himself control of his own body. Prison life is his just due. The temperate user of whiskey, beer or wine should not be punished with penalty due the boisterous drunken disturber of the public peace. Municipal or state law visits penalty on the temperate citizen when ordinance or statute requires every citizen to pay a doctor's fee before he can use a "little wine for his stomach"—for cold or colic, or drink a glass of beer or claret with his dinner, or before he can get a little wood alcohol to stain a picture frame, or to run the flatiron. The druggist's extra profit and cost of doctor's prescription, is not only prohibitive of use, but is penalty imposed upon the innocent. The spirit of such legislation assumes the right to direct details in the household and personal affairs. Eatables, drinkables, wearables, and all amusements fall under its oppressive surveillance. Such narrow minded intolerance and bigotry will soon brush from California's sun-bathed valleys industries as old as civilized man, and as necessary for his needs and comfort and progress as the plow or the book, the cow and the alfalfa. It invites the return of the jackrabbit and howling coyote over a great extent of country, which God, during unnumbered geological ages, prepared to be a natural home for the grape, and gave to it the most congenial climate for its residence that there is on earth. The very conception of application of law must include all man's natural needs, and all God's provisions to supply them in every foot of every zone of earth.

Aburd Restrictions Invite Revolution.

In some localities, as in some of the southern states, the presence of a large, ignorant, vicious element, unused to self-control of appetites and passions, imperils its own and the life and property of all other citizens, if a free use of intoxicants is allowed. And in every state and territory there are demoralized, covetous, and avaricious brewers and saloon keepers, who should be restricted from their evil work. But the government would invite revolution instead of aiding reformation, if she stultifies herself by choking all self respect out of her best citizens by compelling them to suffer the penalty due offenders. The day of revolution is already here, if the government cannot prevent the vicious from ruling or ruining. There is a boneless, silly, sentimental so-called Christianity that runs under cover of sentiment and so-called prayer, when the trumpet of common sense, reason and God calls to battle. The loyal grain and grape growers should be free to produce and vend all their products that the natural needs of all loyal citizens demand. The stability of free government is at stake. The loyal producer and consumer are entitled to such protection, and by conditions of free citizenship they pledge life and property to secure and maintain it for themselves and all others under its stars and stripes. The enemies of law and peaceful pursuits, whether internal or foreign, must know that there is a Rubicon which they dare not cross except at peril.

Saloons Must Go: Liquors Stay.

No lover of quiet and good morals can uphold the saloon as it has been conducted for the past fifty years. Its manner of life has been largely its immoral trend, by forfeiting its right to life. We rejoice to see it pass. But let us not apply law with as little discrimination as the old-fashioned schoolmaster did the rod. He flogged every boy who happened to be seated at the time on the same bench with the bad boy. Such a cover of conduct in government deserves and intuitively gets condemnation from all right minded citizens. J. H. WATERMAN

IT was another one of those surprising nights that do occasionally come to California coast cities when the wind and the fog come bowling in from the sea, not cold, but chill, giving the inglorious attractions that the outside can seldom overcome. On such a night the charter members of the Galoot Club again found themselves huddled about the card table in the whist room dreading to go home, for the ghosts would walk the earth that night if any, and the hold-up man, too.

"Look here, Abner Appleby," exclaimed the newspaper man at length, "you picked out the black ball at the last try-out and it is your turn to 'fess up'. All set, drive ahead."

"Well, my story is so old," remarked the banker, hugging his meerschaum a little closer and taking from it two or three reassuring whiffs. "Yes, I did have rather a peculiar affection of the heart a matter of forty years or so ago, with occasional relapses since then, and I don't mind telling it if it will contribute anything to the professor's philosophy, although it is not altogether pleasant to have other people, even one's best friends, know too much about one's personal affairs. I have noticed that a man's heart is about the ugliest joke in the world in the eyes of all except the one who has it."

"But we loved each other, Helen and I did, talked love and all that about the same as the rest of human kind," he told, "and never fixed and I was not 'fixed' and we were both very young, too young to think of marrying yet a while. You see our folks were prudent people, economical, hard working and not very well off, and I had not thought much about life or calculated on being anything more than my father and grandfather had been, did not care about going to college, but just worked away for father good and hard, loved Helen and kept healthy. That was about all."

"But Helen took to reading matters, set my dumb head to thinking about things in general and induced me to go down to Boston to try to do something better than farming and I went the day after I was twenty-one."

The first thing I struck was being janitor for a bank and I did that till the day after figuring, just setting down columns of figures as long as my arm and adding them up quickly and right every time and when I felt sure of myself I asked the head bookkeeper to let me show him what I could do and the upshot of it was that he gave me a set of books to verify at odd hours. Then I got on as bookkeeper and it was not three years from the day I struck Boston until I understood banking pretty thoroughly, had a good salary and might have been promoted and settled down in Boston as Helen wanted me to.

"One day I had to go to the president's residence out at Brookline to consult him about something, for he was ill and off duty, and while there I heard the president's wife say to her coachman: 'John, the carriage at two, please.' That's the way to live, thought I, as I walked away. 'John, the carriage at two.' The thing kept running in my head all the rest of the day and I took it to bed with me at night. 'John, the carriage at two.' I thought I did not look sleek and comfortable like the president's wife and neither did Helen's. Their fingers were bony and hard, and they walked sort of the way that boys do on stilts, one side at a time and without stilticity of movement, while the bank president's wife glided in and out of the room with grace and elegance. Helen went about trippingly, it was true, and it was enough sight prettier to see her go about than it was the banker's wife, but perhaps it had been so with her mother and her grandmother when they were young. What made the difference? Was it hard work and scarcely a day for rest? 'John, the carriage at two.' That's the way white folks ought to live, thought I, anyhow it is the way a man would wish to see live the woman he loves and I love Helen. 'John, the carriage at two, please.' The words, the voice, the comfortable and well dressed wife of the bank president, mother with her bent back and her bony hands, and Helen—they were all in my head in a jumble and I could not shake them out."

"About this time the president's brother came back from California on a visit, wanted a good man to go back with him and open a bank, the president recommended me. A good offer was made me and I accepted."

THE CARRIAGE AT TWO

(Being the Second Galoot Club Romance.)

By TOBIAS BLACK

"I went home to see the folks and Helen and tell them about my good fortune and say good-by, and all the time I was there that everlasting John, the carriage at two, business kept dinging in my head. Helen agreed with me that I ought to go, though she did not like for me to be so far away, but calculated that I could come back for her before so very long if I cared to like the country."

"Then there popped into my head the carriage business: 'John, the carriage at two, please.' Until that instant it had not settled itself down to any determination, but it did right then and was fixed from that minute."

"Helen," said I, "I don't calculate to be so distant a place as you people think. I'm always have been. It's just no way at all to live, and I have made up my mind that I am not going to marry until my wife can live like a lady and order her carriage when she wants it. Now I am going out to California and I am going to do my level best, but I am not coming back until I am well fixed if it's never, and if you get tired waiting, why just you don't wait any longer if some good man turns up and wants you, as most likely there will, but if you've got married before I come back contrive to let me know and I'll never come back at all."

"Helen looked up into my face with a funny, frightened look, said that I meant it and began to cry. She said she believed that I did not love her any more, and she burst out and walked back to the house, for we had been sitting under the old elm tree down by the orchard where she had read to me about all the grand or pretty things in literature that I ever knew. I went to New York and took a passage for the Isthmus, but I wrote Helen as encouraging a letter as I could before the steamer sailed and did not have the smallest idea but that she would wait until the grave closed over her if need be or that I would be more than five years in making my fortune. For I was full of hard work, had a quick head and had gotten on so rapidly during the three years that I had been away from home, having been advanced right over the heads of several older men, that my confidence in myself was boundless."

"John, the carriage at two, please." That set the pace for me and I tell you I buckled down to work pretty hard. If ever I slacked up to chaff with somebody or to idle away a spell that carriage business would pop into my head and send me about my work again with the thought: 'It's for you, Helen. It's all for you and someday I will make a fine lady of you.' Talk about happiness! I never dreamed that a man could be as happy as I was, working from morning till night over columns of figures and estimates, planning and scheming, and yet the troubled face of Helen as she looked up at me when I told her of my determination passed before my mental vision many times a day and cast kind of a sweet shade of sadness over my joy. Of course I wrote to her every now and then as encouragingly of my prospects as I thought I ought, seeing that I might never succeed or ever go back for her at all and did not put into my letters any of the love I felt and that made me so strong for work and so careful in planning."

"And I did do well here from the start, but not well enough to suit me. I was getting on but not getting rich, and I soon got to casting about for a bigger thing than I had, studied the country and the markets and in short, made a business of business. I had not lost a day from work for three years, but, partly for a few days' rest and partly with an eye to business, I accepted the invitation of a rancher and went home with him for a few days' duck shooting. This man had an island down on the Joaquin, had borrowed a good deal of money from the bank and the security needed looking into, so I went. He had a good idea if he could keep it sticking through tight times, but the water in the spring, and, I was trying hard and spending lots of the bank's money making levees, pumping water and all that, but with poor success. I saw how matters stood, that he had a bonanza if he could keep the water off but that he could not—had the wrong ideas—so I set my brain to work and waited. It was just as I foresaw it would be. The water came in on him the next spring, drowned out his crop, broke him up financially, and the bank had to take his island. I made terms with the bank and tried my hand at reclamation."

"Meantime I had studied dyking and pumping and had several alternative plans perfected and went at the work with confidence, but the problem was a match for me and for a time I sunk money pretty fast. My levees washed away like soft butter and a spring freshet and do the best I could with logs and hay and patches of grain saved out of the wash-outs I did not get any the better of the debt I had assumed, and it began to look as though the bank would have to close out on me, too. I scarcely wrote to Helen at all, and when I did it was with no promises or prophecies for the future, but I kept right on working just the same. I built levees, drove piles, pumped the water out and planted grain. The levees broke, the grain got drowned and mostly I had my trouble for my money. The engineers did not know how to build levees, and the farmers did not know how to farm, and it was five years before I turned a dollar out of that venture. I had planted a lot of crops and I had harvested parts of crops and kept my credit up."

"But my luck changed at last. 'Twasn't luck either. It was about as cold calculation as ever was, and I finally got the levees so that I knew they would hold, and put twelve thousand acres of that rich, moist sediment soil into wheat, and after harvest I put about the biggest single crop of grain into the San Francisco market that ever went there. I guess, and wheat was what that year, too."

"I bought a big drove of hogs and herded them across the stubble as fast as they could take it clean, followed with the plow and planted potatoes with which I cornered the spud market of San Francisco that winter. That year's farming campaign, with the speculative value it gave my island made me comparatively a rich man, but I foresaw the future of reclamation when other river owners got to leveeing against me as I had leveed against them, and when a syndicate of big men was planning to plant a big price on my goods."

"John, the carriage at two." Gentlemen, no genuine 'jag' was ever comparable to the intoxication I felt the day that I drew on the syndicate for the price of that land, paid off the last debt and banked the remainder of the proceeds. I lived in the heavens and subsisted on expectancy. I bought and furnished a newly completed house in the Western Addition, in San Francisco, secured the finest span of chestnuts to be found in the market, ordered some tailor-made clothes, hired a coachman and changed his name from Pat to John, then put in a few days straightening up affairs so that I could go back after Helen."

"I had put a housekeeper in charge, got my trunk packed ready to start that afternoon and was just getting a bit from having made the show-up, when a messenger came together with a servant entered with the morning's mail. The first thing that my eyes fell on was one of those stiff, square, formal affairs that may announce a birth, a wedding or only an invitation to plant a big price on my goods. It was for a portrait, but it was postmarked at Methuen, Massachusetts. Somehow my heart gave a great tug when I saw the postmark and then it stopped beating altogether. It was more than a minute before my fumbling fingers could open the thing, but when they did I drew forth a gilt and beveled edged card bearing in part this legend:

"Married: At the residence of the bride's mother at Methuen, Massachusetts, September 10, 1869, Helen Parker Bailey—

"I did not read any further. I flung the envelope, and the rest of the mail into the open grate, touched a match to the pile and sank back into my chair with arms hanging limp at my side and watched the eager flames lick up the letters and the papers, watched the little, floating films of cinema pass up the chimney and the charred residue smoke and crinkle and lie dead in the ash pan. How cold I got! My soul went sinking down, down until it seemed that my disembodied spirit must pass out at my toes and leave my frame cold and stark. 'John, the carriage at two, please.'

"Then I laughed, laughed until I made the house echo from cellar to garret, rolled on the floor and laughed until the housekeeper and servants, who came running, made sure that I had not gone mad. I had considered and had provided in advance for every contingency which could defeat my plans except death and the marriage of Helen to someone else. Death had seemed unlikely and little counted on and her marriage less likely to occur than the death of either of us. The idea of this one unconsidered and unforeseen contingency chancing at last to frustrate my plans struck me as being grotesque and I laughed.

"I rang for the coachman and in the blandest manner said to him: 'John, the carriage at two, please,' and then: 'No, confound you, I want it now, in thirty minutes, not a minute over,' and I laughed again into his startled, puzzled face.

"Stepping to my desk I wrote a note to Louise Foster and the housekeeper's son hasten with it. It read as follows: 'Be ready in half an hour to drive with me to Redwood City. You must go. It is important. I am to be married there to-day.'

"Louise's husband had been my foreman at the island and had died from malarial poison, making me promise before he closed his eyes that 'Louie' should not starve, and I had bought her a boarding house outfit in the city and had boarded there ever since.

"She was nearly ready when I drove up and we were soon off, but I could see from her face that she was uneasy on account of my behavior and so I tried to gather myself together, so to speak, upon her account.

"Why, how you drive, Ab Appleby,' she exclaimed, 'your horses will not last half way to Redwood if you let them go at that rate.'

"'I'll get some more at San Mateo then.'

"I supposed that you were to start east this afternoon for the purpose of getting married."

"Just two weeks too late."

"Has she come out to Redwood?"

"No, married another man."

"But your note said that you were to be married at Redwood to-day."

"So I am."

"For goodness' sake whom are you going to marry?"

"Yourself."

"You are insane."

"No doubt of it."

"Look, here, Louise,' I said, facing her and pulling the horses down to a respectable gait. 'I have loved a woman for more than twenty years. Never knew anything else but to love her and I have worked day and night (you know something of how I have worked and what obstacles I have overcome) to make her a lady and now, just as I have conquered every obstacle, made a fortune and bought a home fit for any lady in America and am just ready to start back to fetch her away, here comes the man who has been my enemy for years. You know that I am, or have been up to now, a good, clean man, and I know that you are a good woman, and I like you, always have and always shall, but if that sun goes down leaving me a single man I shall live single until I die. More than that I shall be a woman-hater and a scoundrel. Marry me to-day at Redwood, and all I have is yours in equal share, and I swear that I will be true to you and good to you as long as we both live. I will do everything but love you, and I promise to never look upon the face of that woman again or let her memory cross my mind. Will you have me?"

"No, to-morrow you will be over your crazy fit and bitterly penitent."

"What of it? Did I ever make the bargain that I did not stand by?"

"A colder blooded proposition I never heard of."

"My blood never boiled as it boils this day."

"I would rather have the love of a poor man than be the purchased wife of the richest man on earth."

"And I had that love once and it will never come to you again."

"Then I'll live out my days alone."

"And I will burn my house to the ground to-night, and take passage on the first vessel that sails out of the Golden Gate."

"I turned my team round and drove leisurely back toward the city without uttering a word, and for a mile or two neither of us spoke."

"Abner Appleby, you surely do not mean all that you have said to me?"

"I swear to God that I do."

"Then turn again and drive to Redwood."

"And we did."

"We have had six children, Louie and I. Two are dead and four are living, all of whom you gentlemen know, but you do not know what a precious scrape that eldest boy of ours got me into two summers ago. But that is another story. I am going home. Good night gentlemen."

"Good night."

"And that is how Abner Appleby became so flinty," remarked the professor as he reached for his hat.

("The Plague"—Concluded.)

minished as far as the thirtieth squirrel, which is as far as they have had time to try it. The ground squirrel, then, is the one that perpetuates the disease; the rats perennially renew it by infection from the squirrels, and mankind gets it from the rats. The moral is obvious: Kill the ground squirrels. And this task will soon be undertaken under the auspices of the National Government.

The campaign also demonstrated the fact that the way to fight an invasion of the plague is to kill the rats. San Francisco is the first city that adopted this method, and its success brings a large measure of applause to Doctor Blue, who originated it.

For these great benefits the chief credit is due to "the corps," as the officers of the United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service call themselves. They have demonstrated here again, as they demonstrated it at the yellow fever crisis of New Orleans in 1905, their fitness to cope with invasions of plague that menace human lives and American commerce as gravely and more subtly than the invasion of foreign armies and navies.

Automobile Notes.

The head vulcanizer at the Goodyear factory at Akron, Ohio, says that about 20 per cent. of the inner tubes which come for repair showed signs of dirt having been dropped into the cover when one head had been detached by the roadside, and having afterwards set up friction between cover and tube when the tire was replaced. Consequently, whenever a tube is changed by the roadside, before the new tube is inserted the interior of the cover should be mopped out from top to bottom on each side with a dry rag first of all, the wheel should then be spun to loosen any road dirt or grit in its interior, and when one is certain that all foreign matter has dropped to the bottom of the cover at the lowest point of its circumference, that part of the cover should be carefully mopped out with a rag slightly dampened. The cover may then be lubricated with french chalk in entire certainty that the new tube will behave guilelessly.

An auto stage line between Muir's mill and Willits, Cal., will be opened on May 15th next, a distance of twelve miles, by the Studebaker E-M-F "30" agent at Fort Bragg, W. H. Ward. Associated with Ward will be Len Bernard. According to Ward, two trips will be made daily, in order to accommodate passengers for both the morning and afternoon trains. Ward has been instrumental in arousing considerable interest in automobiles in his district and lately has made several sales of the popular car for which he is the agent. Ward has also made several hill climbing records with his machine.

Thomas A. Edton carries a dollar watch. His $1,700 Swedish movement watch in an engraved gold case is stored in a safe deposit vault. When the dollar watch wears out he smashes it with a hammer and buys a new one.

Bernhardt once decided to leave the stage because of an unsatisfactory part given her by her manager, and to open a confectionery shop, even going so far as to select the store. The darkness of the back room and basement discouraged her enough to make her return to the stage.

Probably the greatest swimmer in the world is C. M. Daniels of the New York Athletic Club who has broken world's records in a good share of the races he has swam. He clipped three seconds from the world's record for the 220-yard swim a few weeks ago, making it in 2:25-2-5.

Sir John Tenniel, the famous cartoonist and illustrator of "Alice in Wonderland" was ninety years old a few days ago. His "Dropping the Pilot," made British sentiment on the subject of the young Kaiser's dismissal of Bismarck. It will surprise many to know that Sir John is still alive.

Miss P. Stella Michelson, a young attorney of Los Angeles, has decided to assist William R. George in establishing George Junior Republics all over the country. She will go first to study at Freeville, New Jersey, and then travel from state to state to assist in organizing the republics.

Moncreux Perkins, of New York; Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson; Mrs. Reginald Brooks; Mrs. Waldorf Astor; and Miss Nora Langhorne.

The greatest mathematical prodigy is said to be Thomas C. O'Neil, of Hubbardston, Mich., who can instantly answer the most complicated problems in mental arithmetic. He is said to be able to square numbers instantaneously that would take from the first day of creation to the present to figure out in the ordinary way.

Though seventy-five years old, Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court of the United States has the ruddy complexion, face free from wrinkles, and the general activity of a man of fifty. Besides his work on the bench he lectures one hour a day in the law school of the George Washington University, besides taking long walks and playing golf.

THE SUM.

By Paul Laurence Dunbar.

A little dreaming by the way,
A little toiling by the day,
A little pain, a little strife,
A little joy—and that is life.

A short-lived fleeting summer's morn
When happiness seems newly born,
When one day's sky is blue above,
And one bird sings—and that is love.

A little weeping of the years,
The trials of a hot hot tears,
Two folded hands—the fainting breath
And peace at last—and that is death.

Just as living, loving, dying, so
The actors in the drama go:
A fitting picture on the wall,
Love, death, the themes! But is that all?

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Two Important Safeguards.

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which we partially discussed a week ago, was packed by our revered ancestors very full of safeguards against tyranny and oppression from power of government, so full indeed as seriously to cripple the power of government when exercised beneficially for the establishment of justice. The constitution makers are not blameworthy, if blame attaches anywhere. It was the people themselves whose insistence upon amendment carried the provisions following into the immortal document.

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." This provision had its origin in oppressive governments. When such a government failed of convicting an enemy in one court, straightway it haled him before another and so persecuted him as often to make the lives of innocent persons unsafe if not intolerable. So grievous had become the burden of oppression that the tendency of legislation since has been to make laws for the relief of the innocent rather than for the punishment of the guilty.

The meaning of this clause in the constitution is that the prosecutor shall have one chance to convict the person charged with an offense and only one, but that chance shall go to the length of eliciting one unequivocal verdict from a jury, a verdict of guilty or of not guilty. If the jury says not guilty the prisoner must be discharged from custody no matter how great his guilt, and he cannot be again arrested on that charge no matter if newly discovered evidence show his guilt to be unmistakable, or even if he confess to himself. So many failures of justice have grown out of this time-honored safeguard that there has been discussion favoring the placing of some limitation or qualification upon it, but it is almost inconceivable that the public mind will ever sanction any assault upon the integrity of this clause, either in national constitution or state. It is imbedded in the tradition of our people.

If the jury disagree, or if it find a verdict of guilty and the defendant himself be granted a new trial and the verdict set aside, it will be the same, in the sight of this provision, as though there had been no trial at all. Such a proceeding does not place one in jeopardy.

Another pregnant clause in this amendment is, "Nor shall any person be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The defendant in a criminal action may go upon the witness stand and testify in his own behalf if he wishes to do so, and if he does so testify, he can generally be cross-questioned like any other witness. If he does not no law can force him to open his mouth and, according to the laws of California, the fact that he does not testify in his own behalf—the fact that he does not go upon the witness stand to explain what, possibly, no other living person can explain—cannot be referred to by implication in an argument to the jury by the prosecuting attorney. Fortunately, intelligent jurors cannot be prevented from drawing their own conclusions although the law does what it can to prohibit their so doing.

The origin of this clause dates back to the time when men were tortured in order to make them confess their wrongs—doing, when they were hanged until nearly dead, were stretched upon the rack, bitten into with hot pincers and had power screws applied to their thumbs. The horror of that era so impressed itself upon the minds of men that prosecutors have ever since been prohibited from extorting reluctant testimony.

This is not true of all countries. On the continent of Europe a person accused of crime is rigidly questioned by a magistrate and his every answer is taken down and confuted if possible. After further investigation the accused is questioned again and is again confronted with such evidence as the prosecution has been able to discover. If he has spoken falsely he is soon tangled in a mesh of his own making and his testimony is utterly discredited; but if he has spoken truly his testimony will have been corroborated to the minutest detail and he will be given full credit for the integrity of his story.

Much of this kind of work is done in this country also, but outside of any lawful, judicial procedure. It is done by police authorities and is commonly called "sweating" the prisoner, of which we read almost daily in our papers. It is unfeeling and yet permitted for the good reason that it is the only way to get at the truth in regard to crimes of certain types. The query is as to whether or not what seems to be so indispensable should be made legal and conducted in a more orderly manner, ancient constitutional "safeguards" to the contrary notwithstanding.

KNIGHTS AND KING.

By William Watson.

The knights rode up with gifts for the king,
And one was a jeweled sword,
And one was a suit of golden mail,
And one was a golden Word.

He buckled the shining armor on,
And he girt the sword at his side;
But he flung at his feet the golden Word,
And trampled it in his pride.

The armor is pierced with many spears,
And the sword is breaking in twain;
But the Word has risen in storm and fire
To vanquish and to reign.

Since Gladys went away
All clock seems the day,
The clock doth strike
With doleful sound;
In favorite book
No surcease found;
Each night doth slowly wear away,
And dawn doth break a duller gray,
Since Gladys went away. —(Unidentified.)

Since Gladys went away
We've pruned three times a day,
And for our one
Unchanging meat
We get but canned
Corned beef to eat,
And oh, our men's far from gay,
Won't someone send a cook who'll stay,
Since Gladys went away?

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, ungraceful and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so comfortably and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Good Work By the Supervisors.

The final passage of the anti-slot machine ordinance was a good piece of work, but it will not be complete until the police power of the city is given authority to commandeer every machine found offending and smash it with a hammer. Philadelphia destroyed dray loads of them, after which the ordinance was effective. The protests made against the ordinance, showing the ruin it would spread in the ranks of commerce and property ownership, were rightly taken as conclusive evidence of the need for the ordinance and its strict enforcement. Even the proponents of the measure were not prepared to believe the enormity of the offense these machines were committing against public morality. As well might property owners have protested against killing rats on the ground that the elimination of the plague would lessen the ability of the undertakers to pay rent.

The Protest of the Bankers.

It is unfortunate, yet not unusual, that many bankers should have joined in protest against the adoption of the slot machine ordinance. We are what our occupations make us. The mind of the banker naturally addresses itself to the financial aspect of every issue. Unless he has taken pains to cultivate breadth of vision and depth of sympathy, often at financial cost, he is likely to determine issues solely upon their financial aspects. This explains why the Rothschilds accomplished the temporary defeat of a movement to lessen the evil of drunkenness in England, by lessening the number of drinking places, inasmuch as such a measure, although making for the betterment of the nation, would tend to lessen the value of breweries and distilleries upon which the banks have placed loans. This also explains why, in San Francisco, many large banking interests have thrown the weight of their influence against the prosecution of rich grafters, making their conviction difficult and the contest with injustice long drawn out. The net tendency of this attitude of bankers toward public affairs is to persuade the public mind that the banking mind is immoral if not immoral.

Give the President Time.

The pertinacity with which certain molders of public opinion are trying to make it appear that President Taft has turned his back upon the Roosevelt policies suggests that the wish may be father to the thought. Give the President time. Give him a full year before making up the mind regarding him. He has been well tried and has borne every test until now. His methods will be different, but his purposes will be essentially the same as those of Roosevelt. If the event should prove otherwise the disappointment of the public will be bitter and the resentment keen, but give the man a chance to make good. He is a good man and will redeem every pledge express or implied, but the public may not hear of what he is doing until after he has done it. William Howard Taft is no mental or moral weakling or a setter up of false pretenses. There are interests that would hug themselves with delight if they could estrange the friends of Roosevelt from Taft and his friends. Keep a weather eye on 'em.

The Gospel of Economy.

If the voice of the eastern economist can make itself heard Uncle Sam is to become as tight-fisted as the closest down-east Yankee. The more liberal West will not have it that way. The several departments of government have been asking for appropriations to suit their separate needs without co-ordination or consultation with other departments and congress has been appropriating money with an equal lack of team work. President Taft has taken steps to remedy this cause of unregulated expenditure. If he can carry his reform measure through we shall arrive at something analogous to the budget making of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, a device that should have been incorporated into our government at the start. This will lead to prudent expenditure, not parsimonious, and the distribution of funds will be more equitable, but the demands for internal improvements are going to increase, not diminish, and those demands should be met as rapidly as the nation can bear the burden without groaning under it.

Shuffle Those Justices Again.

The states of the Union should notify Uncle Sam that the inheritance tax has been enclosed as part of state-taxation preserves and that it would be well for him to keep off. However, there is the income tax which he may have in welcome and, in order to get it, it will only be necessary to shuffle those nine justices a few times more so that five of them may be drawn for the tax to four against, a feat the contrary “interests” performed to the contrary effect in 1895. That decision cannot stand. Sooner or later the pressure of national need will reverse it. Why not apply that pressure now? The need is not for finding new ways of taxing the same old people, but ways for taxing those who escape their adequate share of the common burden or who can bear more than their share without injury. An income tax accomplishes this end. Thirty-six states now impose inheritance taxes while only six tax incomes and these unsuccessfully and inadequately.

“Wet” Spots and “Dry.”

It should be evident enough that the anti-saloon issue has reached California. To be sure Santa Cruz, being a bathing resort anywhere, voted to be “wet” inside as well as outside. Alameda, with similar aquatic aspirations, did likewise, a rather surprising feature of the returns being that, of sixteen precincts voting separately on the issue, fifteen voted to have saloons and only one voted to exclude them from such precinct. There are relatively few cities that would make such a showing of favor toward saloons in residence districts. Fresno, the center of a great wine and a considerable brewing industry, astonished itself, and the state, by voting the saloon out, leaving only the hotel and restaurant and liquor store. Porterville lately closed its saloons, a fact that must make some of the old pioneers wonder where they are living, for it was once prophesied of Porterville that, when the earth should be consumed with fervent heat and should wander darkling in space, on the spot where Porterville once had stood there would be a little flickering blue flame of alcohol yet burning. With Dr. Rowell in the mayor's chair at Fresno the laws will be enforced whether the mayor believes in the sanity of those laws or not. Out of the turmoil of this contest betwixt “wet” and “dry” something will sometime come that will be more tolerable than the saloon and less intolerable than the “blind pig.”

What More Are They?

Of a group of sixteen railway presidents in the United States five are former clerks, three telegraph operators, two switchmen, a ticket agent, a brakeman, an office boy, a printer's devil, a rodman and a section hand, showing that the way up from the bottom rung to the top of the ladder is still open. There is a hotel man in this state who began as a dish-washer half a century ago and now is rated at $2,000,000, but he is still essentially a dishwasher. His life has been much less than a success, for the newer standards for the measurement of success require more than that one shall get up the ladder. They demand to know how he got up and what he was like after he got to the top.

America Still An Asylum.

Upon hearing of the eastern paper's exhortation to the case of the latter paper exclaimed, “Thank God America is still an asylum!” So it is, not merely for the oppressed of all nations, but also for the lame and the halt, the insane and the criminal, the agitator and the anarchist, the fit and the unfit. America is so much of an asylum that it is time for it to think seriously upon whether or not the asylum business has not been overdone in America.

NATURAL BUT NOT ESSENTIAL.

That the labor party people of San Francisco should wish to retrieve their injured reputations as a governing power is natural enough. Any other separate element in the city's population would, under similar conditions, feel the same way, but it is essential to the wellbeing of San Francisco that they be given the opportunity? Richard Brinsley Sheridan once fought a duel with a coward merely to afford that coward an opportunity to retrieve a lost reputation and the coward, goaded to desperation, nearly killed him. San Francisco might suffer a similar fatality.

Besides, this is or should be a government by all of the people, not by a part of them. At the council board should sit the banker and mechanic, the professional man and the merchant, representing, not alone their own constituencies, but the whole people of the city. In no other way can the best interests of the whole people be represented. And it is a splendid respect which those in any walk of life will acquire for those in other walks when they have sat awhile over against them, have given and taken, tried the quality of each other's minds and understandings. There they will learn that a man is a man (if he is a man) for a' his banking, a' his working, his profession or his place in the counting room.

Organized labor should participate in city government. Labor cannot do this to advantage without being organized, but its participation should be in proportion to its ability to bring forward men of sound judgment, broad sympathies and tried integrity, being mindful of the fact that San Francisco has other interests besides those of labor. Of twenty-three Republican or Democratic union labor representatives in the late legislature not above five were fit to be there. That is not as good a showing as labor should have made even though hyphenated to Republican or Democrat, and it does not augur well for its being able to set up a safe government for this city.

Union labor should stand for a good representation in the next city government, not for taking over control of that government. No class, no walk of life, nor department of commerce or industry—not even the Southern Pacific railroad—should assume to do that. Government by anything less than the whole people is not government by The People.

STATISTICS SHOW.

The ordinary arguer feels that all he has to do in order to overthrow his adversary is to raise his voice to concert pitch and declare that "statistics show"—whatever he happens to wish them to show, and statistics are very obliging.

A storm center of statistical fury has been waging about certain statistics presented by Mayor Rose of Milwaukee, whose advocacy of beer and opposition to prohibition has given him national fame. According to Mayor Rose there are more divorces in prohibition Kansas than in beer-flowing Milwaukee, therefore prohibition encourages divorce. There are fewer deaths from alcohol than from whooping cough or measles, and only a fraction of as many as from tuberculosis or pneumonia, therefore drunkenness is not unhealthy. His prohibition adversaries come back with statistics calculated to make the hair on little boys' heads stand straight up and their ears to hear the roarings of the demon rum like those of a ravaging lion.

Sane persons will do well to view statistics, in the hands of non-expert enthusiasts, with caution. In Germany some years ago it developed that the consumption of beer, the spread of elementary education and increase of juvenile delinquency all progressed by percentages practically equal, but only a congenital idiot could have drawn the conclusion that the increased consumption of beer was the cause of the spread of elementary education, or that the spread of elementary education was the cause of an increase in juvenile delinquency. It requires more than two related facts to make "statistics show" anything more valuable than an unverified hypothesis.

Those reported in vital statistics as dying from alcoholism are the unidentified nobodies picked out of the gutter and sent to the receiving hospital. No man with a family occupying a station of influence dies of alcoholism even though pickled in the juice of king corn. Men made so soft with guzzling beer that they could be stabbed to death with a cat's tail die of heart failure, syncope, apoplexy. When alcohol kills it is in conspiracy with some disease that has brought its victim to the threshold of the lowly domicile and only needs a little help to deliver the body to the undertaker. Then it is that alcohol proves its potency, but these things statistics do not show.

Nor do statistics show the truth about the causes of insanity, pauperism and domestic infelicity. Causes and consequences are in such cases badly mixed, and yet not far from half the pauperism in the world has inebrity as a contributing cause, half the broken homes in the world would not have been broken if drunkenness had not entered into the problem. As to insanity, half of it may roughly be set down to prenatal tendency and the other half to the excesses of life, while halves of both halves would scarcely have developed their perfect fruit but for the aid afforded by alcohol. Yet these probable truths cannot be proven or disproven by such vital statistics as are commonly accessible.

Humanity may be divided into those who are teetotalers and those who are not. Of those who are not it may be doubted if 5 per cent. make such use of liquors as causes them to be more delirious than other folk in the performance of social obligations, yet the 5 per cent. who find the drink habit a millstone around their necks cause the world about as much misery as it can stagger under. If one person in the hundred were a confirmed criminal Society would have to fight for its life like killing snakes, and with five common drunkards out of each hundred of drinkers the burden of rum might spell the ruin of a nation.

The difficulties presented by the problem of liquor are serious enough to warrant the ascertainment of truth by an application of the scientific method, which consists in instituting comparisons with all related facts, lead they never so far afield, not in hurling thunderbolts with no better warrant than be derived from instituting comparisons between two facts out of a possible thousand bearing on the issue. Sobriety in reasoning is as truly a temperance as sobriety in beverages.

PROGRESS IN HETCH-HETCHY DISCUSSION.

Second only to the establishment of justice in San Francisco and the bay cities ranks the procurement of an ample, permanent and reasonably cheap source of municipal water and power supply. The issue is taking on national aspects. The best way to meet those aspects is to have the entire citizenry made familiar with the best that can be said pro and con regarding the issues involved. These differences may prove irreconcilable, in which event one side or the other will have to yield to superior force, but so long as there is the smallest hope of reaching a common ground of interest and understanding good citizenship should not cease to thresh the issue out, not over. Distinctly there is a difference between "out" and "over." The one marks progress. The other marks time, and is unprofitable.

Elsewhere in this paper is a readable article from the view point of a nature lover, Mr. E. T. Parsons. Succinctly stated, his chief points are as follows: That had it not been for the activity of John Muir and others the Tuolumne watershed would not have been made into a national park, and if not, all the opportunities would now be in private hands and would cost "untold millions" in being bought out; that the Stanislaus source of water supply is equally good and equally as cheap as that of Hetch-Hetchy and has fewer prior rights to be acquired; that Eel river offers as good a source of water supply very much cheaper; that the Tuolumne watershed embraces such incomparable scenery that to deprive the public of its enjoyment would be a serious loss and that to grant what San Francisco asks would involve such deprivation.

Of the feasibility of the Stanislaus and Eel river sources of water supply the writer of this cannot speak advisedly, but in both cases the generation of electric energy is not a factor, whereas a source of municipal power supply is only second in importance to a source of water supply. It will mean "untold millions" of dollars saved to untold millions of people for untold generations of men.

The beneficial results of the activity of John Muir and his friends in creating this park may be thankfully conceded. All honor to John Muir! He may have builded better than he knew then or yet knows. To have saved for the Greater New York of the Pacific Coast a permanent and adequate source of water and power supply for millions of men, women and children may make his name revered when all else he has done has been forgotten, even if "he didn't go to do it" as Columbus "didn't go" to discover America, but blundered onto a continent while looking for something else. How this source became available is not germane to the issue. That it is available is all important.

The pivotal issue of the whole controversy seems to lie in this: The exclusive sequestration on behalf of the bay cities of the entire Tuolumne watershed vs. the construction of a filtration plant. The nature lovers themselves will hardly contend that the deprivation of the floor of the valley to campers, by covering it with water, would justify the rejection of San Francisco's petition. Why not, then, mutually agree that if the issue ever comes to the point where the public must either be excluded from the entire watershed of the Tuolumne or a filtration plant be constructed, then, and in that case, the filtration plant shall be constructed. This concession on the part of the Hetch-Hetchy source may the more readily be made because of the truth that filtration is likely to prove necessary no matter from what source a supply of water may be derived. Water must be above suspicion. Will not those who write of the subject hereafter address themselves to this basis of compromise? May it not prove to be the key to unlock a chest of surpassing treasure?

THE GLASS REVERSAL.

There are times when the heart is made sick through the triumph of wrong, through the spread of decay among the institutions of men, through the ineffectuality of human effort to stem the tide of adversity. Such a time has come upon the people of San Francisco and California with reference to the establishment of justice. Such a time came to the people of Israel when the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes brought forth the Maccabees and extorted from an unbelieving people a conviction that if a man die he must live again that justice may not perish from the universe. Such a time came to the followers of the Christ when he was crucified, dead and buried and it seemed to those that followed him that all was lost. Such a time came when the unrestrained folly of pro-slavery interests forced that issue to an arbitrament of the sword.

These times call for steadfastness, not for despair. Right has triumphed hitherto and will triumph hereafter. Doddering dotards will yet be driven from benches upon which they are unworthy to sit and men like Marshall, Story and Kent will again so declare the law as to command the respect, and the commiseration, of men; but that will be when judicial positions are filled by a nonpartisan expression of the will of the people and not from a political bargain counter presided over by the paid manipulator of a great and greedy corporation.

This paper will not at this time attempt to analyze or criticize the decision of the appellate court by which a convicted felon has been practically turned free a year and a half after his conviction. The man whom he was accused of bribing is dead. The city and county of San Francisco has little material left but of which, under the laws and customs which now prevail in jury making, a new jury may now be empaneled for the retrial of Louis Glass. Verily, it is easier for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven than into a state prison no matter what the degree of his guilt, or how unquestioned the certainty of it. It is not for us at this time to say that the appellate court has not, in the case of the People against Glass, laid down the law as it is. We only know that justice has miscarried, that the law as laid down by this court, and the one above it in a previous instance, has not been accepted as sound either by the common sense of the commonality or by those best equipped to review those decisions in the light of a broadened and progressive jurisprudence, and these facts raise a presumption that this court has again erred. Only this much may safely be ventured at this time: Whatever was irrelevant and incompetent as testimony at the former trial might have had its relevancy and competency safely left to a jury of men and women, and constitute a jury without serious danger of convicting an innocent man; any law that deprives a juror of the right to draw a conclusion that every man outside of a jury box inevitably must draw—that if a man refuses to testify it must be because that testimony, if given, would be incriminatory and not exculpatory—is bad law even though it be law.

Finally, in view of the way our courts have been constituted, there is no sanctity which so surrounds them as to safeguard their decisions from the most thorough and, if need be, unsparring analysis and criticism, albeit always with a view of establishing the truth and not with the purpose of inflicting humiliation or heaping on reproach. It is also worth while to bear in mind that, under the prevailing tendency to exalt technicality and over-emphasize procedure, any appellate court can be relied on to discover reversible error in the proceedings of any protracted trial if that is what it is seeking, and what it is seeking is dependent upon the atmosphere in which it lives and moves and has its being, an atmosphere often created by the power that ordained who should fill judicial positions. These reflections refer to the entire judicial system since government came under corporate control and not to any particular department of that system.

April Eighteenth.

No one who was in San Francisco, in his senses, April 18, 1906, will, while he lives, need to be reminded of the recurrence of the day and the date. It made for us a new calendar. Thenceforth the events of our lives are fixed as to time by being before or after the great fire. Life has gone strenuously since then. Not only have concrete results been attained, but results expressed in steel and iron, brick and terra cotta. Splendid material results have been achieved and San Francisco is coming to be itself again. It is only in the establishment of justice, even handed, without respect to persons or influence, poverty or riches, that our city has acquitted itself with less than justice to itself, with less than honor to state and nation. And yet striving for justice has been as determined, as courageous, as full of resource and ability as any other department of human endeavor. In material things the people have been of one mind. In moral things they have been at cross purposes. Not all the splendid rebuilding that can be done, not all the beautifying, can make the world forget that justice still sits dethroned at the feet of predatory wealth. It is easier to rebuild a city than to re-establish justice when once it has been dethroned. The lesson of April 18, 1906, has only been half learned. That tragedy taught us the evanescent character of property. We ought also to have learned from it the enduring property of character.

The Tariff Bill.

The new tariff bill passed the House of Representatives on Saturday of last week and went to the Senate. The finance committee of that body, which had been working on the House measure ever since the extra session began, reported the bill to the Senate on Monday and the measure may now be said to be definitely upon the anvil, good and hot, to be hammered into shape, and a deal of hammering it will require. By what is claimed to have been a mere oversight standard oil products, in which the Standard Oil company does a larger aggregate business than in petroleum alone, are substantially protected while crude oils, which are mainly produced by others than the Standard Oil company, are put upon the free list.

Liquor Legislation and Divisions.

The Iowa legislature has passed two important bills relating to the liquor business. One prohibits breweries being financially interested in drinking places and the other limits saloons to one to each thousand inhabitants. Missouri appears to be on the point of submitting to the people a state-wide prohibition amendment to the constitution, notwithstanding the opposition of Governor Hadley, who recommends in its stead county, town and precinct option as promising better results morally and certainly better financially inasmuch as about one-third of the state's revenue comes from liquor licenses.

The Oakland Ledger is a new candidate for favor in the newspaper field. It is a convenient sized four-page venture under the able editorship of John T. Bell, a journalist of so many years standing that, no matter what else he may undertake as an occupation, he never can quite let the newspaper business alone. The Ledger will stand for right things and stand hard.

The Deeper Significance
: : : : of Living : : : :

It was the opinion of Ambassador James Bryce that not all of the declarations of moral law made by Jesus of Nazareth could have been intended to be taken literally, that some of them are to be understood in connection with the time in which he lived, the understandings of those whom he addressed and the capacity of flesh and blood for fulfilling the law. Among the injunctions so to be taken was the one to lay not up for to-morrow.

It would be absurd to say of the property-less that they are so because of this injunction. There have been those who have taken vows of poverty that they might devote themselves to lives of holy service, the world has found need for their services, and there have not been too many such; but the poverty that afflicts the world is that poverty that strikes the laboring population of the world live within ninety days of possible mendicancy, the poverty that gives rise to crime and disease, to physical and mental misery—that kind of poverty has no more relation to the teachings of Jesus than have war and pestilence, insanity and feeble mindedness.

The Son of Man "had not where to lay his head," but this he said in a spirit of sadness as exemplifying the sacrifice he was making for the cause of humanity. It would have been far from his thoughts to suggest that it is not a good thing for the families of the world to have where to lay their heads. With the work he had before him, and the little time he had to do it in, he could spare neither time nor effort in the establishment for himself of a home, and so it would prove with his chosen messengers to carry the good tidings to the ends of the earth, but, as for those to whom these tidings were to be carried, the more of these who have homes of their own and pillows of their own upon which to lay their heads under the sheltering security of roofs of their own the happier will be the world.

Those who live in flats and apartment houses, in tenements and cottages not their own, know little of the luxury of a first night's sleep under a roof all one's own. The things which cost us most dearly are the things we most greatly love and the things we love are the things that make us what we are. It is nearly as great a deprivation for one never to have had a home of his own as never to have had wife, husband or child. It leaves just that much of barrenness to be lamented, makes one fall just that far short of having lived a full, well-rounded life.

One hears it said sometimes that it is cheaper to rent than to own. Sometimes it is so, counted in dollars, though very rarely, but hiring a home is like hiring a dress suit instead of owning one, it never quite fits or feels comfortable. Who ever grew to love a rented home? Who ever told his God in his heart, when he drew near to a lighted window in an apartment house, and reflected that behind that window and under that apartment house roof, his family was sheltered—who ever thanked God for such a home?

And what shall we say of the citizen who lives and dies and never gets his name on the tax roll? That should be shame enough to make one hang his head forever. To go through life so careless of the future as to have the $100 constitutional tax exemption cover all, what a purpose to have in the mind when, at the same time, the groom slips the wedding ring upon the finger of the bride and says: "With all my worldly goods I thee endow!"

The poverty of misfortune is to be pitied and forgiven, but the homelessness of heedlessness should be regarded as a disgrace. Whoever has an earnest heart, the groom slips that of a ditch digger can get for himself in or near any American city enough of God's earth to hold the foundations of a cottage and, with diligence and health, he can, sometime, somehow, get some kind of a cottage on that lot that will be worthy of the name "Home."

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Why Russia Recognized.

When Russia recently recognized Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina her action was unexplained and was the occasion of much wonderment. Now the explanation is at hand, and may be given in just four words—the intervention of Germany. Nor was the intervention of a placatory nature; Russia was compelled either to recognize the annexation or adopt the alternative of war with the Kaiser's armies. The London correspondent of the New York Sun conveys the foregoing information as follows: "It is now definitely known, despite semi-official denials from Berlin, that Germany delivered a distinct ultimatum to Russia on March 25th summoning her to recognize Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina forthwith or else military operations would begin against immediately." And the London Times ("The Thunderer") has been heard to the same effect. It scarcely need be said that Russia did not enjoy the medicine she was compelled to take, but what was the much-cursed monarch of a much-oppressed people to do? Had he not recently felt the demonstration that there is no strength in such a people? A curious phase of the matter is the agitation it has produced in England. If the Kaiser dare issue such an ultimatum to Russia, why not next to Britain? the people of the right little tight little isle are asking, and they are inclined to believe that almost anything unsatisfactory to them may be expected from the Faderland in these days. This has no little to do with British desire to see the work of building Dreadnaughts accelerated.

A Dream of Universal Peace.

Notwithstanding the rush of the nations to build Dreadnaughts—seeing as they chance to be under discussion—and notwithstanding the many millions which are being thus expended, they will in a few years from now be but waste timber and iron, this, if Dr. Gustav de Bon, an eminent French scientist, is sound in his theory of the matter. According to Doctor Le Bon war will be absolutely a thing of the past within the next half century, not because men will be too good to fight, but because they will be afraid to do so. It is the use of these Herizian waves which will bring this desirable consummation to pass. A description of the method of their use would be technical, and will not be attempted here, but, properly directed, they would—still according to Doctor Le Bon—annihilate armies as fire annihilates chaff, while Dreadnaughts would be but shattered playthings in their mighty grasp. So one scientist, at least, affirms, and perhaps he is right. It may be that the olden dreamer was wisest of prophets when in a vision he foresaw the day when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Parisian Women Rebelled.

What interests one half of the world should be of fairly direct interest to all the world, and so a bit of news that floats hitherward from Paris is worth any notice. It has been said that when the Parisian milliners fostered the present peach-basket-waste-paper-basket-bushel-basket-butter-bowl style of feminine headgear upon a long-suffering world, the women of Paris, who are noted for their good taste, refused to have much of anything to do with it. On the contrary, they retrimmed their hats of the year before, and left the accumulated straw horrors on the shelves of the milliners. There they would have remained, too, had it not been for a happy thought which came to the milliners. Acting on this thought, they shipped a large number of the hats—all marked "Parisian"—to America, and here the women kindly have taken them off their hands. Re-reading this, it occurs to the writer that somebody may consider it satirical. Then the facts furnish their own satire, for the assertions herein made are, in effect, precisely as first made by the Paris correspondent of the Chicago Tribune. And, for that matter, why should anybody who has been educated to a belief in the taste of Parisian women, doubt them?

Memorial to the Pilgrims.

A movement which is of interest to all Americans now is under way in Southampton, England. This is the erection of a suitable memorial on the spot whence the Pilgrim Fathers sailed for the then inhospitable shores of New England. Already Plymouth has three memorials commemorating the sailing of the Pilgrims from that place, but as they started from Southampton on their memorable voyage, and halted at Plymouth only for repairs, the present movement is appropriate. A "live Yankee" might wonder why the people of Southampton so long have neglected to advertise their city to the roving descendants of the Pilgrims as well as to those who would like to be their descendants, but such a question has nothing to do with the case: The point worthy of consideration is that it is eminently fitting that the place whence the Pilgrim Fathers departed on that memorable journey should contain a memorial of the fact.

How Japanese Farm.

That Americans generally know very little about close cultivation of the soil is a fact which must become quite evident to anyone if he considers some of the statistics relating to Japan. The total of the cultivable parts of that country would be equal to about one-eighth of the total area of California. A somewhat tiny bit of country, it will be observed, yet on these scraps of land more than 30,000,000 people—about two-thirds of the population of the United States—find their support. It goes without saying, however, that practically every square inch of the cultivable soil is tilled. An annual average of about 250,000,000 bushels of rice, 100,000,000 bushels of rice, barley and wheat is grown, not to mention a multitude of other things, and a large number of families live on the produce from two acres of ground each. No, we do not know much about close cultivation, and it may as well be admitted that there is an extent of knowledge to which we would sooner not attain.

Competition for Standard Oil.

Down in Mexico, where things are different, there is some evidence that Standard Oil is to be subjected to actual competition, a competition so real that it does not belong to Mr. Rockefeller. S. Pearson & Son, Ltd., the great British firm which issued challenge of battle to the Standard some months ago, are proceeding in a manner which indicates that they mean business of the strict variety. They already have an immense refinery at Minatitlan, isthmus of Tehuantepec, and now they are building another, which will cost $3,000,000, at Tampico. Immense oil storage tanks also are being constructed, and a fleet of oil barges will carry the oil from the wells to the refinery. The British firm has a vast amount of capital at its disposal, and it seems that a battle royal which will be worth witnessing is imminent. Up here the idea of competition with Standard Oil has been pretty largely abandoned as hopeless, but, even at this distance from Mexico, it would look good to see a tentacle or two of the octopus uncoiled from somebody's neck.

One Way of Settling Opposition.

Habibullah Khan is the Ameer of Afghanistan, and a barbarian. Now comes the report that when anybody opposes him he places his name on his blacklist, and then has him shot from a cannon. This settles the opposition. How much gentler and more beautiful are the methods of civilization. For instance, how far more seemly it would be if Habibullah Khan would place the man on his blacklist, see that he gets no work and thus gradually and soothingly starve him to death.

Russia's Great Canal.

It is expected that within five years the Baltic and Black seas will be connected by water, as projected by Prince Kikhoff. The length of the waterway will be more than 1,500 miles, but only about sixty-five miles of it will be canal, which will connect the Duna, emptying into the Baltic, and the Dnieper, emptying into the Black. It is intended that the ordinary Baltic steamers will be able to navigate the waterway, but not war vessels—not for the present, at least.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

"LUTHER BURBANK'S WORK."

By David Starr Jordan and Vernon L. Kellogg.

The full title of this book indicates exactly its character: "The Scientific Aspect of Luther Burbank's Work." It is a book by two scientists who give the estimate of scientists in general as opposed to the exaggerated and misleading estimate derived from the newspaper and magazine exploitation of Mr. Burbank. Withal it is very friendly to him, and puts his achievements on a much more intelligible and solid foundation. It describes him as a man whose spirit is primarily artistic, though, "in his general attitude" he is "essentially a man of science." In science "he has at his command the knowledge of no new fundamental scientific principles." And yet none of us has done what Burbank has been able to do, although many of us have tried.

These things that he has done are to apply the known principles of special selection and artificial production of variation in fruit and flower forms on a vastly more comprehensive scale than any other investigator and to produce new varieties that are superior to the old either for commercial purposes or for esthetic beauty.

His genius is in his unrivaled expertness. "In this double process of recognition and selection of desirable variations Burbank's genius comes into particular play. Right here he brings something to bear on his work that few other men have been able to do. It is the extraordinary keenness of perception, the delicacy of recognition of desirable variations in their (usually) small and to most men imperceptible beginnings."

Of Burbank's character and his place in science, President Jordan concludes: "Great men are usually men of simple, direct sincerity of character. These marks we found in Burbank. As sweet, straightforward, and as unspoiled as a child, always interested in the phenomena of Nature, and never seeking fame or money or anything else for himself. If his place is outside the temple of science, there are not many of us who will be found fit to enter."

Some things in the book will be difficult of comprehension to the non-technical reader. Most of it is not. It is an admirably temperate laudation of a great man. For its correctness the lay reader will be content to trust its competent authors. It is also an excellent example of good printing and binding, and bears the imprint of A. M. Robertson, of San Francisco, as publisher. (Price, $1.75, net.)

"A WINE OF WIZARDRY."

By George Sterling.

A truly poetic spirit, profoundly influenced by Poe and Keats, is revealed in "A Wine of Wizardry and Other Poems," by George Sterling. The author by word and sign indicates his preferred allegiance to the poetical philosophy of Poe, but the best things in his book are in the manner and spirit of Keats. "The immortal youth" would not have been ashamed to write the last line of Mr. Sterling's sonnet on "Romance":

"And find these standing on the dust of kings,

A lion at thy side, and on thy brow

The light of sunsets wonderful and lost!"

A line that stings the imagination to action like a blow. "The soul Prismatic" is a comical, and real poetry. "An April Morning," and others are real music and real imagination. One regrets to see some of the rest alongside such gems as these, for they are commonplace in sentiment if not in diction.

Of "A Wine of Wizardry" itself, it is more difficult to speak. Gorgeousness of word-painting that is as unusual as it is sure-footed, is here. Some passages have the qualities of poetry of high rank. But it seems to us to be a glowing excursion of the fancy rather than of the poetic imagination. For the distinction in ideas the reader is referred to "Poetry, Comedy, and Duty," by C. C. Everett, a most illuminating canon of criticism. Also, to our taste, it lacks both the unity and loftiness of subject matter that characterize the highest song.

But, for all these qualifications, one's admiration of Mr. Sterling's achievements is great, and one's hope of his future greater still. A poet who can write some of the lines mentioned above before he is thirty is more than likely to satisfy high expectations of his genius as he grows older. The spirit and the skill are his already. Add one great sorrow to his experience (which God forbid!) and we shall have greatness, we predict. (Published by A. M. Robertson, San Francisco. $1.25, net.)

"CARMINA."

By T. A. Daly.

If the reader at any time has read, in periodical or newspaper, a poem in Italian-American dialect, he will need no further introduction to T. A. Daly, the author of the book of verse which carries the above title, for the chances are fully 99 to 100 that the fugitive poem came from the pen of Daly. About all verse of this dialect now afloat on the wide sea of current literature was written by him, and yet he is not of Italian descent; it is the red blood of Hibernia that flows in his veins, a fact he demonstrates by handling Irish dialect no less felicitously than that of Italy, and his English poetry is no less good.

Probably the most striking characteristic of his poetical work is its tenderness. The Irish-American heart of him beats very close to the warm heart of Mother Nature. You laugh with him, and you cry with him, and sometimes you do both in the progress of one brief poem. His poetry that is not in dialect is the most perfect in its literary finish, but it is in dialect that he comes closest to the soul of humanity. It is difficult to imagine that even the individual who "don't like poetry" can fail to find a charm in Daly's poetry, for, though the ear be not attuned to concourse of sweet sounds, the soul of man should recognize the food on which it feeds.

"Carmina" is a book which should appeal to lovers of poetry, whether in dialect or otherwise. "John Lee's Company, New York. $1.00, net, postage ten cents."

"THE CHRYSALIS."

By Harold Morton Kramer.

A novel of the Palouse country of Washington, in which are worked out the issues of political ambition, "high finance," love, and hate that carry the story along in a pulsing panorama of incident. The story begins with a football game between Harvard and Yale, after which the scene shifts to the state of Washington, where politicians, cattle rustlers, half-breeds, show girls, and Boston millionaires indulge in gun-play, night orgies, and automobile races, and where the lingo that the author intends to be the language of polite society is contrasted with Siwash jargon. The story is crude and melodramatic, but keeps the interest intense to the end. It is a sort of sublimated dime novel, that makes the reader read on, but impels him to wonder at the end if the author has not studied the actions of his near-namesake, Theodore Kremer, the most prolific of American melodramatists. (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., Boston, $1.50.)

THE PUBLISHERS.

New York is by all odds the great center of the American publishing business, and, like all other businesses, it tends to gather in districts, though the publishers do not flock nearly so close together as, for instance, the jewelers who crowd Maiden Lane. However, they are nearly all on Fourth avenue or Fifth avenue (or on cross-streets between them) above Washington Square and below Thirty-third street.

The old publishing district, down near Newspaper Row below Brooklyn Bridge, has almost wholly disintegrated, as Newspaper Row itself is now tending to disintegrate. Only Harper & Bros. still nestle under the bridges; and the only other publication consequence downtown is The Independent, which clings faithfully to Fulton street.

On Washington Square, the American Book Company occupies the finest of all the publishers' buildings. The reading public hears little of the American Book Company, but every parent of a school child pays tribute to it, for it is the parent of the "school book trust." Success Magazine also has offices in this building.

Just below Thirtieth street on Fifth avenue, and only a block from the old First Presbyterian Church that George William Curtis celebrated in "Prue and I" as being on the corner where "I," the sentimental old clerk, fell over the apple woman's cart, is The Macmillan company, the largest publishers in America and the American agents of the English Macmillans. The Macmillan company occupies two old-fashioned and once fashionable Fifth avenue residences, in what is still an exclusive and aristocratic residence district. Two doors away is Thomas F. Ryan's New York home, around the corner is the famous Salma-gundi Club, across the street is the mansion of the Lenox who founded the Lenox Library, and three blocks below is Mark Twain's home. The president of The Macmillan company is George P. Brett, a native of London, but his youthful experience in America was gained in the orchard of California.

A few blocks farther up the Avenue, Scribner's, Fleming H. Revell, and the American Magazine are located. Just off Fifth avenue, on Twenty-third street, D. Appleton & Co. and E. P. Dutton & Co. are almost side by side, and directly overhead are Henry Holt & Co. The last-named are the American discoverers of Miss Sinclair, the author of the famous "Divine Fire," and of William de Morgan, whom English critics declare to be the contemporary Thackeray.

At Twenty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, Brentano's new place is established. Brentano, by the way, published "The Florentines," the poetic drama by Maurice V. Samuels of San Francisco. Away farther up, Dodd Mead & Co. lead the advance uptownward.

The Fourth avenue side of the district begins in the neighborhood of Union Square, on the north side of which the Century company and Baker & Taylor are located, and Everybody's Magazine is published. On Sixteenth street, off the square, are Doubleday, Page & Co., who, since they recently absorbed McClure's book business are one of the "Big Four" (Macmillan, Scribner, Houghton-Mifflin, and Doubleday), the biggest general publishers in the country. Frank N. Doubleday is probably Mr. Brett's most dangerous rival for supremacy in the publishing world, and he is by four years the younger man. Mr. Doubleday got his training with Scribner's, where he started as office boy at fifteen years of age, and graduated as business manager twenty years later.

The Outlook is published on Fourth avenue above Eighteenth street. At Twenty-third street are the S. S. McClure Co., Funk & Wagnalls (publishers of the Literary Digest), and System, all in the same building. Two blocks farther up Travel Magazine and Frederick A. Stokes & Co. are housed.

The Review of Reviews is near Wanamaker's, off Broadway on Astor Place, the farthest down of the uptown group. Collier's is out of either district, away over near the Hudson river on Thirtieth street, in a building that looks more like a warehouse than a business block. The Outing Publishing company has a New York office, but its plant and executive offices are at Deposit, N. J., well upstate, unless it should be said that they are now in a New York courtroom, as the company has just gone into the hands of a receiver.

PLAYGROUNDS IN OAKLAND

PLANS FOR A COMPREHENSIVE SYSTEM.

The movement to provide public playgrounds for the children of the municipality has taken firm hold in Oakland, and considerable work has already been done to realize the hope of its proponents. On June 3, 1908, the city council passed an ordinance creating the Playgrounds Commission of five members, to serve for two years without pay as an advisory body to investigate the subject and to counsel the mayor and the board as to plans for carrying the playgrounds idea into effect. The commission is appointed by the mayor, and three of its members must be women.

The Advisory Commission.

About two months ago Mayor Mott named the following five members of the first commission: A. S. McDonald, chairman, Mrs. Cora Jones, Mrs. Alice Bunnell, Miss Ethel Moore, and C. E. Hudspeth. The ladies are all active clubwomen in hearty sympathy with the work, and Mr. Hudspeth is principal of the Washington school.

This commission has done much active work already. It has enlisted the co-operation of Mr. Raitt, the superintendent of playgrounds in Los Angeles, who spent a week in Oakland investigating sites, and whose report contains suggestions that will probably largely influence the action of the council and the board of works. In connection with this report, O. A. Prager, the city landscape gardener, has prepared a series of plans designed to illustrate the arrangement of the grounds.

Five Sites Already Owned.

Oakland already owns five sites that will probably be turned over to the playgrounds commission. These are: Independence Park, in East Oakland; the park in West Oakland near Sixteenth street; the park at the east end of Lake Merritt; the Twelfth street park, at the west end of Lake Merritt; and Bushrod Park, adjoining the Washington school at Shattuck avenue and Sixteenth street. These parks range in area from one to twenty acres. Twelfth Street Park will be the largest and the nearest the center of population. Bushrod Park of eighteen acres will probably be merged with the grounds of the Washington school, making a playground of about twenty acres.

Equipment of Grounds.

These sites will have to be fenced and equipped. Improvements will necessarily come gradually, but the ideal towards which the commission is working is a series of playgrounds, one within the radius of every mile and a half (as recommended by Mr. Raitt), each under the supervision of a director, and, ultimately, of a woman attendant besides. The equipment that is desired is varied: baseball fields, basket-ball courts, tennis courts, croquet grounds, plunge baths, wading pools, sand beds, swings, teeter-boards, slides, etc. For the present, much less than this will have to do. However, Mayor Mott and the council are in hearty sympathy with the movement, and it is certain that a preliminary budget for playgrounds will be included in the next proposal for a bond issue, the election upon which will be held this summer or fall—probably in September. A tentative estimate of the amount desired is between $40,000 and $50,000.

Two Uses of Grounds.

The proposed uses of the playgrounds are two: one, as summer playgrounds for all the children; and, second, as after-school playgrounds for school-children. The movement is so closely linked with the theory of primary education that there will undoubtedly come a close connection between the playgrounds and the school grounds—probably in the way of utilizing the school grounds and permitting their use as playgrounds under the supervision of the commission. The board of education is cordial in its attitude toward this arrangement, which is really vital to the success of the main idea. The school children are the most numerous beneficiaries of the playgrounds, and the locking of school yards on afternoons and holidays is a waste of useful space.

The Tompkins Summer School.

The summer use of school yards has already been vindicated in Oakland. The women's clubs have for years maintained a "summer vacation school" at the Tompkins school in West Oakland. This title is not a proper definition; it is not a "school" at all, but a summer "playground"—only school discipline is gently maintained at the play, the school grounds are used, and the toilet facilities of the schoolhouse basement are lent to the children. The Tompkins school experiment has been a great success, and has solved many problems: the child's problem of where to play, the parents' problem of taking care of vigorous youngsters during vacation, and the police problem of preventing youthful mischief.

This, in broad outline, is the preliminary work done in Oakland, the tentative plan, and the cheering sign of the times, is the sympathetic attitude of all citizens and all officials toward a movement that is immensely important to the welfare of the children and the betterment of our human product. Oakland has joined the forefront of enlightened municipal progress.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Twelve men now have been sworn to serve as jurors in the trial of Patrick Calhoun on a charge of bribery, and the jury is complete except, as a precaution in a trial which probably will be long drawn out, a thirteenth juror will be summoned to act in the event of the sickness of a juror or anything of that nature. The work of selecting this juror is in progress at this writing, and he may be found at any time. Otto T. Hildebrecht and Otto H. Mackroth were the last two accepted.

Before these twelve men were chosen 2,310 talesmen had been summoned, so it will be observed that it requires almost 200 presumably average citizens of San Francisco to furnish that rare stuff from which a Calhoun juror is made. In the Ruef case 1,450 talesmen were summoned, or about 37 per cent. less than in this case. The days consumed in the Calhoun case were ninety-one, in the Ruef case seventy-two, or 20 per cent. less. The Ruef defence stood upon technicalities; the Calhoun defence solemnly announced that it would not, and the figures appear to justify a wish that it had.

Louis Glass, vice-president and formerly general manager of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph company, whom a jury in Judge Lawlor's court found guilty of bribing former supervisor Thomas Lonergan, will have a new trial. The appellate court, in an opinion prepared by Judge Hall, Judges Cooper and Kerrigan concurring, has thus decided.

Three points were raised by the defence in its argument before the court: First, that the evidence in the case was insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty; second, that the indictment was defective and not sufficient to base proceedings upon; third, that the trial court erred in admitting the introduction of evidence relating to the organization of the Home Telephone company of Oakland, under the direction of Glass, to forestall opposition to the Pacific company, and also in neglecting to charge the jury that it should not heed E. J. Zimmer's refusal to testify against Glass in the trial as he had done before the grand jury.

The appellate court decides, first, that the indictment was not fatally defective; but it decides, secondly, that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony relating to the Home Telephone company and also in neglecting to give the requested instructions concerning Zimmer's refusal to testify.

It probably would appear to the lay mind that the question of real importance in this case relates to whether or not the evidence was sufficient to demonstrate the guilt of Glass, but, as is well known, the lay mind is prone to error, a fact which the appellate court happily points out in the following language: "In addition to the points discussed in this opinion the appellant has urged that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict of guilty. Inasmuch as the judgment and order must be reversed for the errors above noted and the case remanded for another trial we do not deem it necessary to pass upon the question." So it will be seen that the serious question was not whether or not the evidence showed that Glass was guilty but whether or not the trial judge made a mistake. The admission seems naive, but it leads to a better understanding of the law.

The case of Adolph S. Newburgh, charged with attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case, went to the jury for decision

Bit of wriggling white and pink;
Solemn eyes that blink and blink;
Pudgy arms and legs that go
Wildly waving to and fro;
Dimpled fists that look so sweet
Owner thinks they're good to eat;
Gurgled laughter, shrieks more drear;
Bud of Hebe's blossom here—

Bidding worries haste away,
Or the soul of sweetness found
Where God's blossoms star the ground;
Fairest of all things so fair
That without them life were bare;
Pure as lily-buds that grow
Where the wood-nymphs come and go—
That's the baby's sister.

Imps of mischief joined in one;
Mad embodiment of fun;
Rout and riot, blaring toys;
Noise, and noise, and yet more noise;
Mama's pet and sister's drend;
Cause of gray on papa's head;
Run by neither rule nor plan,
Yet of stuff that makes the man—
That's the baby's brother.

Center of her universe;
Housemaid, seamstress, cook and nurse,
Ay, and somewhat more than queen
Of her homely, woe desmeine;
Drying eyes with tears ashine;
One-half human, half divine;
O'er a wee form bending low,
Crooning songs that love doth know—
That's the baby's mother.

Not so handsome as he's good;
Useful in providing food,
Easter hats and divers things
Made of lace, or silk, or strings;
Somewhat bald and somewhat grim;
Used to mention as just "him,"
Child of sorrows and of dread,
Yet quite useful, as was said—
That's—now do your guessing.

Occasion for Pride.

"I notice that our governmental pension roll costs us from five to ten times as much as that of any other nation."
"Yes, doesn't it fill your soul with pride?"
"How so?"
"Why, of course it irrefutably demonstrates that we have from five to ten times as many patriots and heroes as they."

It Shall Surely Come.

It shall surely come, the fair, glad day
When the world shall turn to a better way,
Shall turn from the slough and the mire of greed

To the white, bright height by its God decreed
Ere the old, old earth, while it still was young,
Its part in the chant of the universe sung,
Ay, out of the shadows that haunt our way,
It surely is coming, the fair, glad day.

It shall surely come. Shall the dollar sign
Be worshipped for aye by a thing divine,
Half god and half brute? Nay, over the strife
Is the One who ruleth the melody of life,
And we know right well He is more than this,
The greed of an hour, or a moment's bliss,
As we hear His whisper that aetons obey;
"It surely is coming, the fair, glad day."

It shall surely come. Lo, our brother's cry
Sweeps out and wails out to the arch of sky;
While our fingers fondle the store of greed,
It is cursed by the tears that our God shall heed,

But the soul of man shall at last awake,
With the cup of love shall its long thirst slake,
For, out of the shadows that haunt our way,
It cometh, it cometh! the fair, glad day.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Don't be quite discouraged 'bout the black sheep. Lots o' times it turns out to be the best sheep in the family ef once it gits started in the right drection.

You'll have to be a mighty mean man 'fore your meanness 'll be so big that infinite love can't cover it.

Your worry seems big, but it's so small that a very few years 'll hide it forever.

When I see the self-sacrificin' devotion of some mothers I understand why the master artists painted only female angels.

Some girls might be reel bright of their ginn didn't work their jaws so much that their brain don't have much show to operate.

Slidin' 'Long.

Just a-slidin', slidin' 'long.
All I have is but a song
And a little home of cheer,
But that's enough for heaven here,
'Nough to make the pathway brighter,
'Nough to make the burden lighter,
'Nough to scare old Worry's throng.
While I'm slidin', slidin' 'long.

Just a-slidin', slidin' 'long.
Bark my shins against the Wrong.
But there's someone whispers in,
"Barker luck!" and "Try again!"
And her kiss is just the same
When I limp because I'm lame:
So all life is like a song,
While I'm slidin', slidin' 'long.

Bad Effect of the Bay Breezes.

"Tis a bad thing about the bay breezes," said the man who sat next me on the boat.
"How so?" I inquired.

"You ought to know without being told," he responded, "but it's like this: I reside in Berkeley, and I do business or anybody I can, in San Francisco. Well, it is well known that the atmosphere of Berkeley is intellectually invigorating. I don't show that I feel superior to other men, but how can I help knowing that I am when the blood in my veins is fed by Berkeley atmosphere? I join a club for psychological research which happily provides that if a member unbends once he shall be suspended, and if he unbends twice he shall be disgracefully expelled, but there is no danger of expulsion while one continues to breathe the Berkeley atmosphere."

"Well, being loaded with academic atmosphere, I start for San Francisco. The bay breezes fan my Jovelike brow, and by the time I have passed Goat Island I realize that I am just a worm of the dust that is out for a dollar—anybody's dollar will do. It is a sudden drop from the calm, pure height of the coldly intellectual to the muddy slosh of the commercial. Talk about relapses! The gentleman known as Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde must have had an easy time comparatively. Oh, dern the bay breezes which convert a Berkeley philosopher into a groveling money-grubber! Don't they ever worry you?"

"Sometimes," said I.

Ladies, Take Notice.

The Yonkers Statesman republishes the following official notice recently issued by the Swiss railroads:

"Ladies' hats more than 31½ inches in diameter will, according to article 117 of the railway tariff adopted in February, 1906, henceforth be regarded as wheels (bicycles). Any lady wearing a hat of larger dimensions desires to travel by a Swiss passenger train must either ride in the luggage van or deposit her hat with the luggage guard and enter the passengers' carriage bare-headed."

Nothing could be added to the possibly unconscious humor of that official proclamation, and so no such attempt will be made. But if only railways elsewhere, as well as some church officials, would prick up their ears and take notice of the suggestion!

Is This True?

Now heed the thing I tell you, lad,
Until its purport clears.
You've done some things that were not bad,
Some things that called for cheers,
But here's a fact no less, my son,
That equally is true:
Sometimes the best thing you have done
Is what you didn't do.

A Gossiping World.

It is a gossiping world.
She said that her neighbor might be a nice enough woman, but her taste in dress was simply outrageous.
"Why, that is precisely what she said about you," her confidant confided in return.
"The miserable old gossip!" was her only comment.

Don't smile. She was not the only one of the kind; there are others. As a matter of fact, every last son and daughter of us all prattles on about Mr. or Mrs. Blank, criticising him or her without check. Then, after a while, we hear that Mr. or Mrs. Blank has exercised a like prerogative at our expense, and, who'd doesn't the fur fly! If we do not say that he or she is a miserable old gossip, we think it, at any rate. We find it hard to take our own medicine.

It is a gossiping world. Rely upon this, brethren and sisters: The critical, mean, or semi-mean, things that you say about others are being said about you also. Or if the same things are not said, perhaps they would seem pleasant by comparison. You have no copy-right on verbal stab and criticism, and your neighbor who smashes so pleasantly upon you runs a little business in that line, himself.

The Wonderland of Dreaming.

In the Wonderland of Dreaming,
Where the outside is the in,
Where the topside is the downside,
And the ended things begin,
If you give your hand unto me,
While the moon is sailing high,
We will wander there together,
Just my little maid and I.

Here are sunbeams floating round us,
Though there's ne'er a sun at all,
And a Brownie band has found us
Where the starbeam cascades fall.
Clasp my finger very tightly,
Tiny maiden, we go
To that Wonderland of Dreaming
That but dreamers ever know.

Here's a fairy vale of glory.
Candy grows on every tree;
Good, perhaps, for tiny toddlers,
But it's not so good for me.
Here's the Rose-queen of the garden;
Lily-princess, white as snow—
What, your eyes of blue are open!
Then I guess we will not go.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Dear Mr. Editor:

Oakland, Cal., April 3, 1909.

You want to know "what does the reader think about 'The Deeper Significance of Living'." It is all right! It is a brilliant thing in the paper, and more, it requires heart to write it. I would gladly welcome a page instead of a column, but I wouldn't welcome more than a page because it takes all the brain I have for that much.

I am, not a newspaper man but I'm sixty years old and believe I have common sense, and it is my opinion you know more about what The California Weekly ought to be than your readers. Just go ahead, giving us a clean, thoughtful paper, and let the kickers kick. C. B.

No editor can know so much about editing a paper that the humblest patron he has may not be able to give him a suggestion that he can use to the advantage of all his patrons and self-sufficiency is a species of dry rot that lies in wait to attack every newspaper man who can be caught off his guard. Just as an orator can talk better to an audience that either applauds or hisses so every writer can write better to a constituency that he can hear from occasionally, a constituency of kickers who will kick, or of appreciators who will testify their appreciation. There is many a writer who has, metaphorically speaking, poured the best there was in him into a gopher hole for a quarter of a century at a stretch and never saw any gopher come out.

Maricopa, Cal., April 6, 1909.

Editor of The California Weekly: Dear Sir: What do I think about "The Deeper Significance of Living"? I think it is the very best column in your paper, and the keystone of your arch to uplift our moral tone—which is evidently sadly in need of many more arches to uplift it from its slough of politics.

Out of place? Yes, if morality and spirituality are ever out of place in this world of too much materiality. And why should those of us who can relish such a bit of preaching with its freedom from dogma and doctrine be denied it in this free and simple fashion, and told to take it in large indigestible doses in a religious paper? We like this exactly better than that, perhaps, so why may we not have it? Just because some one else does not wish to be reminded that life is "other than the shallow thing he makes of it."

That is what this reader thinks about "The Deeper Significance of Living," and she does not wish to miss it from her "California Weekly."

Yours truly,
MRS. ASHLEY J. THOMPSON

2331 Eagle Ave.

That the writer of "The Deeper Significance of Living" may maintain the interest in that column he would be glad indeed for contributions fitted to fill it or for suggestions as to themes that might well be treated. Contributions should be free from dogma and sectarian bias and be addressed directly either to heart or understanding or to both heart and understanding, which is better.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 6, 1909.

Editor The California Weekly: You ask for an opinion from your readers upon the weekly. Here is mine. I take two periodicals—outside of newspapers and professional journals. If I were obliged to take all but two these two would be the New York Outlook and The California Weekly. What the Outlook is to the country this weekly is to the state. "The Deeper Significance of Living" is the keystone of the arch. To suggest its omission is a confession that should be humiliating.

Your paper is fine. I shall do all I can to increase its subscription list.

Yours very truly,

FRANCIS B. KELLOGG, M. D.

618 Auditorium.

We are very thankful for Doctor Kellogg's words of encouragement, and will merely add that the "Deeper Significance of Living" will not only not be dropped but, if possible, will be made deeper and more significant and closer to the living of the human life. The expressions in its favor have been so many and so general that I have accepted our own judgment of its value as abundantly sanctioned.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

First there was John. Incidental to John there was Papa, Mamma, Grandma, and baby, all nicely dressed and off for a Sunday. There was a wait of five minutes for the car. John went down on all fours on the gravel. "John!" screamed three throats in discordant union. "Oh! what a boy you are!" There were thirty-seven admonitions to John before the car came. And baby, bare legged baby, came in for her share, too. Baby tried to do whatever John did. "Baby mustn't jump any more." "Baby mustn't run out into the grass. Baby will get her frock all dirty." "Why can't baby be still a minute?" "Next time John will be left at home sure, then perhaps baby will behave." "There comes the car. Look out, John!"

It was a beautiful Sunday, but one could not help foreseeing that it was to be made miserable for three people because three of them would have to spend the whole of it trying to head off John and Baby. It is a safe guess that he was lyingly told 500 times during that day that next time he would be left at home. The writer's sympathies were with John and Baby. They were delightful children, and were only doing the things that God told them to do in order that they might acquire mastery over their bodies, that their minds might be stimulated into alertness. If they had been "good children" and sat motionless, as their elders wanted them to do, their case in this world would have been hopeless. They would grow up to be stupid parents of stupid children in turn, human knots on logs as inconsequential as bonny-clabber. The only hopeful aspect of the whole miserable incident was that John paid little attention to the "John don'ts" that were hurled at him. His only chance of a successful career lies in being able to rise superior to these don'ts but the chances are that they will embitter his existence. Like the dripping water that wears away rocks those don'ts will reach the heart of him after awhile. The gamine in the street has at least an equal chance in life with John despite the refinements of a model American home.

In splendid contrast with the lamentable environment of John was that of Billy on the boat coming across the bay with Papa. Billy also was about five years old and had come into a strange world, just out from the East. He was taking in everything: the buoys, the light house and the wireless telegraph mast on Goat Island, the gulls, the tugboats, the ferry depot tower—everything that came in the range of vision had a question mark after it, and when Papa's knowledge was unequal to the answering as, being a tenderfoot, it sometimes was, the writer of this countered the requisite information. Not once did Papa weary of the little crooked child at the end of every boyish phrase or sentence. He answered as best he could and in form as intelligible as possible to the childish mind. The writer has not seen Billy or his Papa since, but he could not refrain from extending his hand and offering congratulations because of his intelligent appreciation of the needs of the childish mind. And with what difficulty did the writer refrain from "butting in" and giving John's three-point Nemesis a three minute talk on the evolution of the human mind. The (?) is not only the key to all language but to all human progress and the child that is not active is a jellyfish.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

San Francisco's Next Election San Francisco will undergo a change in city administration next November. Issues are already crystallizing and men being mentioned for the various public offices. The California Weekly will furnish its readers developments of conditions as the campaign progresses, with concise biographies of the more prominent characters. Two phases already appear prominently: the status of the graft prosecution, and the labor party's attitude toward the present city administration.

Who Shall Be Prosecutor? District Attorney William H. Langdon has definitely announced that he will not be a candidate to succeed himself. He has large business interests that are pressing for attention, and he thinks he has earned a rest. The problem of his successor is most important. A man friendly to the corporate interests could paralyze the efforts to convict the indicted men, bringing to naught the labors of years to establish justice. If the public wants to see justice done, a man known to be in sympathy with the present character of the District Attorney's office must be elected.

Should Be Familiar With the Work Done He should also be a man familiar with the work already done in the graft cases. A stranger to the inner workings of the office would need months to acquire a working knowledge of the vast accumulation of detail information now in that office's possession, and essential to an effective conduct of the cases. The line of mental and temperamental succession should not be lightly broken under present conditions, when the defendants are trying to wear out the prosecution by delays in the hope of just such a possible break.

Mr. Heney As a Candidate? Mr. Heney himself is being mentioned as a candidate by many who want the issue to be brought squarely before the people: Shall we prosecute the grafters to the limit? If he would run, his election would mean "yes"; if defeated, it would amount to throwing the indictments out of court. Others believe that the issue should be, in a sense, sidestepped by naming as candidate one of Mr. Langdon's deputies—O'Gara, Cook, or Hanley—who would certainly continue the cases as they have been conducted, but whose possible defeat would not be a decisive vote against the prosecution per se. Mr. Cook would probably decline to run. Mr. Heney has not had occasion to declare himself. His attitude on the question will be an important element when it becomes known.

Where the Labor Party Stands Labor leaders declare that the Labor Party will certainly have a ticket in the field—that the new direct primary law makes it inevitable, even if the candidates go on the ballot only by petition. Above all things else, labor in San Francisco wants to redeem itself from the ignominy of the Schmitz regime, and its leaders declare that they mean to elect a clean labor ticket next fall for that purpose, if for no other. Incidentally, the labor men have been greatly disappointed in Mayor Taylor's administration, notably in the matter of "recognition of labor" in public offices. The reduction to the ranks of Michael Casey, formerly president of the Board of Public Works, and now, in the phrase of a labor leader, "only a cipher on the board," was particularly offensive to them.

Labor's Objections To Mayor Taylor They say that the Mayor has not been aggressive enough: that he left in office many vestiges of the old regime that properly should have been thrown out bodily; and that he should have asserted himself vigorously in the activities of the various commissions instead of allowing them to have the length of their rope and pull at odds with one another. They recall with some bitterness, also, the fact that some labor leaders took the stump for the Mayor in the last campaign.

By Their Records Let Them Be Judged For thirty years the railroad interests of California have been a law unto themselves. Our statute books have been practically free from railroad legislation and the railroads have been practically free from regulation for the public's protection. It was the hope that the issue had been brought to a head and that, at the recent session of the legislature, steps would be taken to bring the transportation corporations under definite control. The corporations themselves expected this and prepared for it, how adroitly and successfully the sequel will show. Let those who were responsible for what was done, and was left undone, be judged by their records. They cannot complain that this is not righteous judgment.

Sheep and Goats Bond and Free The measure before the legislature that was really remedial in its character was the proposed Campbell constitutional amendment which provided that, in place of the present railroad commission, elected by the people, there should be a railroad commission, appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the state senate, removable for good cause shown by a two-thirds vote of the legislature. Instead of striving to define in the constitution the duties of the commission the legislature was proposed to be given full power to prescribe such duties from time to time as occasion warranted. This amendment would, if adopted, have fixed responsibility and made the powers of the commission flexible, more easily changed to suit proven needs than by constitutional provision. This measure was defeated in the senate by the vote following. It is a vote that separates the free from the bond, the sheep from the goats, with considerable nicety. Those voting for the submission of this amendment to the constitution for the ratification of the people were: Senators Bell, Birdsall, Boynton, Burnett, Cammett, Campbell, Cartwright, Curtin, Cutten, Holohan, McCartney, Miller, Roseberry, Rush, Strowbridge, Thompson, Walker and Wright—18. Those against were: Senators Anthony, Bills, Estudillo, Finn, Hartman, Hurd, Kennedy, Leavitt, Lewis, Price, Reilly, Sanborn, Savage, Wells, Willis and Wolfe—17. Inasmuch as a two-thirds vote is requisite for proposing a constitutional amendment the proposal was lost. Estudillo explained his vote on the ground that he favored election of all officers by the people. Senator Sanborn voted in the negative, that he might move a reconsideration. There were two other men who voted no who were reasonably free from corporate influence, Anthony and Welch, while McCartney and Wright of the ayes are clearly corporate men with Curtin and Burnett rated as half- and half.

The First Alternative The second best measure before the legislature, for the regulation of common carriers, was what came to be known as the Stetson bill. It was prepared in the main by Attorney-General U. S. Webb, an official classed as "organization" by predilection and affiliation and not heretofore disobedient, although there was some evidence of disobedience in drafting this measure. He had the assistance of good men, including John W. Stetson whose loyalty to right things is unquestioned. The measure made the duties of the railroad commission positive instead of negative, prohibited discriminating and rebating without equivocation, abolished the pass system, except in certain proper cases, made the rate fixing power definite, yet afforded a right of appeal to the courts where the carrier thought itself ill used.

So far as a layman may judge it was a good measure, as good perhaps as could have been prepared under the constitution as it is.

The Wright And Wrong It was not whispered in the corridors that Senator Leroy Wright had in incubation any railroad regulation measure until he plumped it into the legislative basket, and this is not the way Leroy Wright generally does things. Coming events usually cast their shadows a long way before Leroy Wright. Therefore the conclusion was promptly reached that this bill was furnished the San Diego senator ready made and that it was incubated in the Flood Building at the corner of Market and Powell streets in San Francisco. What the measure really portends the attorney-general of the state and the railroad commissioners are now trying to find out. They would probably facilitate matters by asking Mr. Herrin. Perhaps they have done so. Characterized in a word the general tendency of the measure is to go at the abuses of which shippers and travelers complain with a meat ax, but the meat ax is made of brown paper and the gore that develops is only from a red shirt worn under the white and which shows through a rent previously made in the outer garment. In other words, the railroad commission is commanded to do many things—unless it does not feel like it, in which event it needn't. As in the enactment of a direct primary measure, so also in the enactment of a new law for the regulation of transportation in this state, Senator Leroy Wright proved that, at the crucial instant, he could be relied on to serve the corporate interests rather than those of the People of California. That is the Wright and wrong of it, bright man with a predilection for bad association.

Unconstitutionality The Pretended Reason A great to-do was made over the unconstitutionality of this measure as justification for voting it down and perhaps two or three were influenced to vote against it through that fear. As for the rest they took orders and that was the whole of it. But the constitutionality of such powers as were proposed to be conferred has never been brought to the serious attention of the Supreme Court of California. We have it upon the authority of Mr. Justice Shaw that the question of exact maximum rates has never come up to the court for decision. In the Fresno rate case the court said: "We do not understand that the railroad commissioners do more than to prescribe the maximum change allowable" but, in the language of Justice Shaw, "This had reference to what the railroad commission had done, not to what they might do or had power to do." In fine, the plea of unconstitutionality was a make-believe.

UP AND DOWN : : THE STATE : :

San Bernardinians are elated by the information, conveyed in a late number of the Engineering Magazine, that their city probably will be made a manufacturing center for the Santa Fe railroad. The Santa Fe already has such a center at Topeka, Kansas, but it is understood that the increase of its business on this coast will necessitate the establishment of another, and San Bernardino apparently is the fortunate place that will be selected.

Whatever other city, town or hamlet may conclude to go without its cocktails and other similar inducements to temporary cheer, Santa Cruz refuses to be of the number. By a vote of nearly three to one, last Monday, it decided in favor of being "wet," and as the vote was the largest ever polled there in a city election, it should be considered a fair representative of the popular opinion. Vanish the private flask in Santa Cruz, and avant the frequent trip to neighboring towns! Both will be unnecessary.

Southern California newspapers in these days contain much agitation for state division; at any rate, a considerable number of them do. The main argument for such division is the West's need of more representation in the United States Senate. Excellent; and why would not the force of the argument be multiplied by six if it were contended that California should be divided into twelve states? The logic of the case might as well be worked for all it is worth.

A. P. Bittersworth has transferred his interest in the Hollister Free Lance to A. G. Barre, and henceforth the editorial destinies of that paper will be in the hands of the latter gentleman. It has been a good local paper, and its new editor promises that it will maintain that position in the newspaper world.

"Dave" Sanders, proprietor of the Visalia House in the city of that name, has been arrested on a charge of stealing fifty-seven head of cattle. The Delta says, "the evidence in this case is conclusive, and no doubt as to his guilt exists." It is alleged that Sanders was the head of a band of cattle thieves who have been operating in Tulare and adjacent counties for some time past.

By a majority of 403 Pasadena re-elected Mayor Earley over his opponent, William Waterhouse. The election differed from some recent ones in that there appeared to be no charge of craft, "push" affiliations, etc., on either side, to be decided by the voters. It seemed to be a case of clean man against clean man, and the citizens selected whom they preferred.

Petaluma is "dry" on Sundays, but a recent arrest indicates that it has not been so dry as some people thought it. It was observed that a barber was having an uncommonly large run of Sunday business for his bathing adjunct. This led to curiosity on the part of a constable, who investigated and discovered that when he turned a bath-tub faucet a flow of very fair beer responded. Further investigation revealed that a saloon and the bath-tub were connected by pipes. Arrests followed, and Petaluma is believed to be again dry on Sundays.

Work on the Stanislaus county railroad between Modesto and Empire has begun. The railroad will be somewhat unique in one respect: It will be entirely built and owned by residents of Stanislaus county.

A syndicate is endeavoring to purchase irrigation district number ten, north of Marysville, and already has secured options on 6,000 of the 11,000 acres contained in the district. If it succeeds, it will spend about $120,000 in safeguarding against floods, and will then sell the tract in ten, twenty, and forty-acre lots. Of course the syndicate is not doing this for its health, but how much the resulting influx of settlers and tillers would mean to Marysville and vicinity only people who have lived near vast cultivated or semi-cultivated tracts can judge.

About four miles from Alpaugh, in Tulare county, 2,000 acres of land have been purchased, and now comes the information that a new town, to be known as Solita, is to be laid out on it, and that it and the surrounding country will be settled by 2,400 negroes who are coming from the larger cities of Iowa.

A rush of miners to Plumas county is reported. Many of them are from the state of Nevada, and they have been attracted by the reports of rich discoveries of gold. It is said that claims are being staked out on ground which now is covered by twenty feet of snow. It is difficult to say how much there may be to justify this excitement, but miners may do well to keep a watchful eye on Plumas.

The federal government has decided to construct its buildings in Southern California hereafter in the mission style of architecture. An excellent idea, for the mission architecture is both distinctive and attractive, but why not extend it to Central California? The old padres established their missions up this way, too.

Unlearned Lesson.

Twice and thrice he had dreamed it over,
Twice and thrice he had said it wrong;
The air was heavy with breath of clover,
And shrill with joy of a robin's song.
One could see only the sweet blue sky
With a silver cloud fleet sailing high,
And the feathery tops of the tallest trees
Stirring a bit in the lazy breeze.
"Nine times seven is sixty-three."
"What do we care?" droned a honey-bee.
"Nine times eight is seventy-two."
"And how can that matter to me and you?"
"Nine times nine—" and a butterfly,
Black and polished and pricked with flame,
Tossing and tilting airily
Over the brink of the window came.
Straight by the desk like a flower a-wing,
Poised on another, wavering,
Shut and unshut in the gay sunshine—
Who could answer for nine times nine?
So it went through the hours' retreating;
A spider wove for him magic-wise,
A clamoring rose looked in for greeting,
And the lure of its beauty was in his eyes.
The other children fared forth with laughter,
Flocking out in the golden light;
One might follow them only after
He'd learned his lesson and said it right
And the long light ebbed with the ebbing day,
And the far fleet dimmed in a sea of gray.
After the sunset glow was past
I groped my way to his seat, at last.
Twilight, now, and the task undone!
My heart was hard for the wayward one.

The book had dropped, with its pages crumpled,
Thumbed and folded and thumbed again;
And he lay quite still with his hot hair rumpled—

Fallen asleep at nine times ten!
Late, and his sky was fading, colder,
The glory that won him too dim to mark;
I stopped and laid him upon my shoulder
And carried him home through the deep'ning dark.

Ah, in our grown-up school we ponder,
Through the good days, on alien thoughts,
Letting our idle heart-dreams wander
Over the grand world with truant wings.
And often the unseen shadows creep
Close, while our erring thoughts are turned;
Master, what if we fall asleep
Still with our lesson of life unlearned?
Humbly we pray if Thou find it thus
When the sad end of the day be come,
For Thy great mercy to pardon us,
In Thy gentleness bear us home!

—Nancy Byrd Turner.

yesterday afternoon, and it may have been decided before this number of The California Weekly reaches the reader. The evidence in general was about the same as that presented in the previous trial of Newburgh and that of Murphy. E. A. S. Blake again swore that he acted at the request of Newburgh and Murphy in attempting to bribe Juror Kelly, and Newburgh and Kelly denied it. Attorney Schooler testified that he was employed by Newburgh and Murphy as an attorney to defend Blake, when the latter was arrested, but Mr. Schooler's memory of details was poor.

REPLY TO MR. PHELAN ON HETCH-HETCHY

By E. T. PARSONS.

Mr. Phelan's contribution to the Hetch-Hetchy controversy in your issue of March 26, 1909, is convincing to the uninformed. The purpose of this reply is to call attention to some of the "inexact information" in which the article abounds in spite of the fact that the writer deprecates this character of information as being used by the "fine writers" who are opposing the destruction of Hetch-Hetchy Valley.

Let us emphasize two propositions foremost in the minds of those who believe that the Yosemite Park should be preserved:

1. The Yosemite National Park was created to preserve the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, the Grand Canyon of the Tuolumne, and the Tuolumne Meadows from destructive invasion and as a public park for resort and recreation. If the land now held by the Hetch-Hetchy water system would long since have passed into private ownership and would be no more available for the use of San Francisco than any of the dozen other sources that will furnish an adequate supply for San Francisco. The private rights that would have existed would have cost her untold millions.

2. This is best expressed in the language of R. U. Johnson of the Century Magazine:

"Let us say at once that we hold human life more sacred than the Yosemite. Let us say that the natural wonderlands, vastly as they contribute to save life and promote happiness; and if that were the issue, if San Francisco could not otherwise obtain an abundant water supply, we should be willing to dedicate to that purpose not only Hetch-Hetchy, but even the incomparable Yosemite itself."

Other Available Sources.

The first question that arises in the mind of every practical man is whether there are any other sources available and if so what would be their comparative cost. That there are other Sierra sources, not even Mr. Phelan will deny, for he testifies before the Senate Committee that "There are no less than half a dozen water supplies from the Sierras." That there is not sufficient information now available upon which to base an opinion as to the comparative merits of the various Sierra sources is the judgment of one of the city's eminent experts, Professor Marx. There are, however, several systems that in the matter of cost and amount and purity of water will compare favorably with the Hetch-Hetchy project.

The Stanislaus Source.

One of these, the Stanislaus, was mentioned by Doctor Bade, but it is brushed lightly aside by Mr. Phelan, who quoted from certain testimony in the Senate Record to prove his point. We cannot accuse Mr. Phelan of willfully misrepresenting facts, even though he does seem at times overcautious in denying his water scheme. The only alternative is to charge him with ignorance as to basic facts. The testimony quoted purports to establish the fact that there is no reservoir site below the tail-race of the Stanislaus. Powerful companies are sufficient to reservoir the water of the Stanislaus river for the city of San Francisco. Any person qualified to discuss the subject of water supply must know that a reservoir at the point mentioned is utterly unnecessary. All that would be required is a mere diversion dam which can easily be constructed in a score of places below the tail-race.

As Much Interested as San Francisco.

The Stanislaus Power company is as vitally interested in storing sufficient water in reservoirs above the tail-race, and in equalizing the flow of the river, as would be the city of San Francisco. A continuous maximum flow of water is essential to the successful operation of the power plant. The power company has already constructed dams and will in time construct others so as to store a quantity of water in excess of that which can be stored in Hetch-Hetchy valley. How simple then to divert the continuous flow of water that has already been reservoird and use it for a municipal supply. The power rights above the tail-race are held in private ownership, it is true, but the generation of electric power does not consume the water in some mysterious manner as the assertions of certain of the Hetch-Hetchy advocates would lead us to believe. Until the water itself is actually put to some beneficial use it cannot be subjected to private ownership and others prevented from using it.

The Preferred Rights Problem.

The rights along the Stanislaus river below the power company's tail-race are few and of minor importance. The rights on the Stanislaus do not begin to compare in importance with the private rights that have already attached on the Tuolumne river below Hetch-Hetchy.

Since the recent decision of Miller & Lux vs. Madera Water Co. the city will have to condemn all the riparian rights on the Tuolumne which, the Supreme Court has held, attach to flood waters as well as to minimum flow. These are much more important on the Tuolumne than on the Stanislaus where there is greater rainfall and a less area of irrigable land. The Stanislaus company once offered to build a complete transmission system and deliver to the city of San Francisco for actual cost 10 per cent, a maximum supply of water equal to any possible requirements and to guarantee all titles under satisfactory bond.

Cost About the Same.

We can reasonably assume that the cost of the Stanislaus project would be about the same as the Hetch-Hetchy, and if anything would be slightly less. In actual distance the Stanislaus project would appear to have a slight advantage over the Hetch-Hetchy. Mr. Manson has made the same allowance of 10 per cent and added it to the cost of actual construction of the Hetch-Hetchy project. The Stanislaus river heads in a granite country similar in its characteristics to the Tuolumne and is protected by the same rocks.

The Eel River Source.

Another possible source for San Francisco, that has never received a complete and exhaustive investigation, but which the data now available tends to strongly indicate will cost much less than the Hetch-Hetchy project, is South Fork of the Eel river. The Snow Mountain Power and Water company has already diverted the flow of this river through a tunnel and allows the water to escape into the Russian river after generating power. This water flows down the natural channel of the Russian river fifty or sixty miles, and can be diverted near Cloverdale after being filtered through extensive natural gravel beds that exist in that vicinity. The water can then be taken in a pipe line and run by gravity along near the California and Northwestern railroad grade to the water works in San Pablo bay. The distance would be less than two-thirds of the length of the proposed Hetch-Hetchy line and, being a gravity system running close to a railroad, would mean an enormous saving in cost of pipe line and transportation of materials necessary for construction. The cost of crossing San Pablo bay would be a simple matter and small expense compared with the crossing of the San Joaquin valley and the crossing of the Coast Range at Altamont, as would have to be done in the case of the Hetch-Hetchy system.

A. M. Hunt, an eminent engineer, has estimated that 60,000,000 gallons per day can be brought to San Francisco for approximately $12,000,000, or for a little more than a third of what the city engineer has estimated it would cost to bring in the same amount from the Hetch-Hetchy system. The amount of water can be increased to 200,000,000 gallons per day without requiring the same storage on the Eel river, its source is the snow of Snow mountain, it is protected by a forest reserve, and there is little habitation on the water-shed either present or prospective. All danger of contamination is completely eliminated by the filtering above mentioned. This is an ideal and cheap source for Berkeley, Oakland and Alameda, since the pipe line could be brought through these cities on its way to the San Francisco peninsula reservoirs.

Other Possible Sources.

There are many other projects that have been favorably mentioned by eminent engineers. For example, the waters of the San Joaquin river could be pumped from the proposed crossing of that river by the Hetch-Hetchy system and all the expensive head works and dam construction and length of pipe line from head works to the San Joaquin river eliminated. This would result in a saving of over ten million dollars. There would have to be offset against this the cost of power for pumping over the coast range and the cost of filtration, but there would result a much less expensive source of supply. It should be remembered that water properly filtered is the safest for a municipality to use and the day is not far distant when all self-respecting communities will recognize this fact.

The Importance of the Yosemite Park.

It is difficult to convey to those who have not visited it, an adequate idea of the importance and grandeur of our great national park. Most persons confuse it with the Yosemite valley, whereas that is but a small part of the park embracing the Tuolumne watershed is by far the half. This portion of the park includes the Hetch-Hetchy valley, the Grand Canyon of the Tuolumne, and the Tuolumne Meadows. There is no finer aggregation of natural scenery anywhere in the entire Sierra, and, for that matter, in the world. The Hetch-Hetchy valley ranks second only to the Yosemite in wonder and importance. Mr. Phelan has been quoted as saying "it is only one of a thousand similar valleys in the Sierra." He has traveled from one end of these mountains to the other and I know that John Muir is correct in stating that "Excepting only Yosemite, Hetch-Hetchy is the most attractive and wonderful valley within the bounds of the great Yosemite National Park, the best of all the camp grounds." And I agree with Mr. Keith in declaring that "in varied picturesque beauty Hetch-Hetchy even surpasses Yosemite."

One of the Greatest Canyons.

The Grand Canyon of the Tuolumne is one of the greatest and most stupendous canyons in the world. Let any one take a topographic map of the Yosemite quadrangle and one of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado and compare them. He will find that in the case of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado there is a vertical drop of nearly 5,000 feet from the hotel on the rim of the canyon to the river at the bottom. But this is in a horizontal distance of two miles. There are places in the Tuolumne Canyon, however, where there is a vertical depth of almost 5,000 feet in a horizontal distance of one mile. While the Tuolumne Canyon lacks some of the sculpturing and coloration which the Colorado Canyon possesses, it has other charms that are none the less attractive and wonderful. Spires, domes, towers, castellated promontories, lace-like waterfalls pouring in over sheer walls of dizzy height, the mighty thundering cascades of the river with their "water wheels" that cannot be matched even in the Yosemite, and a hundred lesser charms of forest and flowery meadow. All this drains directly into the Hetch-Hetchy valley and is not separated from it by a distance of twenty miles as Mr. Phelan would have us believe, but it is a part of those twenty miles. While now somewhat inaccessible except to the hardy climber it can be made easily accessible at not a great expense, and in time the government will undoubtedly make it so.

The Tuolumne Meadows.

Then just above and on the same river are the Tuolumne Meadows. Prof. Joseph LeConte, the late eminent scientist, described them as "a beautiful grassy plain of great extent thickly matted with low-flowing canyons surrounded with the most magnificent scenery. . . . To any one wishing really to enjoy camp-life among the High Sierra, I know of no place more delightful. . . . The scenery is nowhere more glorious."

The United States engineers sent out to report on the park said: "The scenery is particularly grand. . . a paradise for campers."

John Muir says that "The upper Tuolumne valley is the widest, smoothest, most serenely spacious, and in every way the most delightful pleasure park in all the High Sierra."

While we keep in mind the fact that John Muir, Stewart Edward White and others who have camped in all parts of America, and in fact, the world, agree that our Sierra is the finest campground of them all, we can commence to gain some faint idea of what this means.

The Artificial Lake Idea.

But Mr. Phelan says that damming Hetch-Hetchy will make a beautiful lake of it and enhance the scenery. It ought to be a sufficient answer to say that John Muir, Wm. Keith, and those who know the valley best deny this. It is sophistry invented to mislead the uninformed. Camping or living on the edge of the valley or anywhere in the immediate vicinity would be rendered impossible, and one of the three great scenic campgrounds in the park absolutely destroyed. This fact has been overlooked. Five thousand people could be accommodated in Hetch-Hetchy valley in camps and hotels. This is only true of the Tuolumne Meadows and Yosemite. With Hetch-Hetchy valley gone, travel to this portion of the park must necessarily be stifled.

Danger of Pollution.

Mr. Phelan thinks that travel to the Tuolumne Meadows would not be greatly interfered with and that danger of pollution would be less than on other watersheds. He falls into the error of judging by the present conditions. If the travel into the Meadows never increased this might be so, though even this is doubtful. But travel there has increased ten fold in the last decade and bids fair to increase in the future in the same proportion. The state road from Mono county is now being built up the eastern slope of the Sierra and is nearly completed. It will connect with the old Tioga mining road and will be one of the great highways of travel across the Sierra, which will pass through these Meadows and cross the Hetch-Hetchy river. It is certain that any one of the other available sources, all of which are protected by forest reserves, will be subject to less liability of contamination than will the Tuolumne supply with its constantly increasing travel.

Divided Use Irreconcilable.

J. Horace McFarland, president of the American Civic Association, and all the authorities on the subject of sanitation differ with Mr. Phelan and agree that the use of Hetch-Hetchy as a reservoir for a municipal supply will mean the eventual exclusion of the traveling public from the entire watershed. We can look into the future far enough to realize that this irreconcilable and divided use of the water shed will mean continuing warfare with the municipal authorities. Once let an epidemic of typhoid occur in San Francisco and no power on earth could resist the effect that would be made to effect rigid exclusion.

Other Scenery Not Comparable.

But Mr. Phelan says, "Go into other portions of the Sierra for your pleasure travel." It only illustrates how little he knows of the region he is talking about. North of the Yosemite park there is no scenery comparable to it and no region so thoroughly adapted to camping and recreation. The same is true to the south. There are no such spacious and attractive camp grounds. The San Joaquin region cannot be classed with it for a moment. Portions of the Kings and Kern river regions do compare favorably, but even there we find no great scenic camp grounds where large numbers can be accommodated. Feed for animals is scarce for even the few who now resort there. It is the only great national park in the Sierra and in California.

Esthetic vs. Utilitarian.

I take issue with Mr. Phelan when he says that the esthetic must give way to the utilitarian. The millions of dollars invested in city parks and public galleries and museums are a refutation of his statement. It is not all of life to eat and drink and sleep and be clothed. The wage earners and wealth producers may not all be able to visit the Yosemite National Park, but many of them have already done so and many more will follow. In time, I predict that the wage earners of this state will be doing as the citizens of Germany now do—deprive themselves of luxuries and save throughout the year in order that they may spend a few days of rest and recreation with their families in the scenic regions of Europe.

Honor to John Muir.

When that time shall have arrived, those wealth-producing pilgrims will revere the name of John Muir and call him blessed because he had that prophetic vision and patriotic unselfishness which caused him to labor and endeavor to preserve from the ravages of the present day commercialism and save from unnecessary destruction some of the most wonderful handwork of the Lord.

A BALLAD.

By Ray McIntyre King.

Once 'pon a time, when politicians

Overran the sea and land,

Making speeches, kissing babies,

Shaking voters by the hand,

To a simple country village,

Came an orator of note.

He'd orate 'till save his country.

And, mayhaps, he'd charm a vote.

Just before the ev'ning session,

In a parlor stiff and cold,

Sat he on a horse-hair sofa,

While his entertainer told

Of the ways of Old Bill Bailey.

The amusing ways he had,

How he interrupted speakers,

How he tangled them up bad,

How he'd mix 'em on the tariff!

On "fee-nance" he'd have a bout.

Yes, he asked some stunning questions,

Knocked their underpinning out!

And the young man on the sofa

Wished to goodness he was home!

Said his host: "You should a heered him

Muddle Senator Jerome!"

(And the young man saw in fancy

How Old Bill would fuddle him

On that memorized oration.

And its arguments so slim,

And the young man's collar wilted.

Should he send the chairman word

He was very indisposed?—

Mother dying, he had heard?—

Must excuse him to the people?

That the misusing farmer said:

"Yes, Old Bailey was a terror!

Poor Old Bailey! He is dead!"

More Napoleon Stories.

"Alexander has often remarked to me: 'I feel that I am not an Emperor like you because I depend on my generals.' He asked me a hundred questions about the art of war. When we rode together on horseback he would ask: 'Is that a position? How might it be developed? How might it be used to kill the enemy?' If I made war on Austria he would like to lead a corps of 30,000 men under me in order to learn the art of war. And the King of Spain thinks me a genius. And Jerome also! When Murat left me Jerome asked to be my Lieutenant-General. 'Are you joking with me?' I asked him. 'When you have been through six campaigns and had six horses killed under you we'll see about it.' But I said he, 'I have less experience. I have more ability.' 'And what do I care for your ability?' said I, 'it is ability for the one thing which I want. There is no fool who is not good for something, and there is no ability that is good for everything.'"

Then he reverted to war:

"There is nothing in war which I cannot do myself," he declared. "If there is nobody who can make cannon powder, I know how to make it. If gun carriages are needed, I know how to make them. If cannon must be cast, I know how to cast them. If the details of maneuvering must be taught, I can teach them."

"I am always working. I think a great deal. If I always appear ready to answer everything, to face everything it is because, before undertaking anything, I have thought a long time and foreseen what may happen. No guess reveals to me the future. In secret, what I am to say or do in an emergency; it is reflection, meditation. I am always at work at dinner, at the theatre. At night I get up and look at the stars. Last night I got up at two o'clock in the morning, sat down in an armchair before my fire, looked over some papers from the Ministry of War, found twenty errors in them, and sent them back with my corrections to the Minister, who is now busy with his staff in rectifying them."

YOU will have to imagine a good deal of this story, because, in the first place, it has to do with certain exalted people at whose doings one must look, perhaps, as through a veil, and, again, because the lady would naturally shrink from exposing to the world even a glimpse of her true emotions, and, still further, it may all be a mistake. Anyhow, whose business is it if a man who rose from nobody to be the envied and honorable man of millions chose to become exclusive and wished to ally his house—not the walls and the roof over his head, such usage of the word is for the poor; but his "house," his family, his name, and all that—to ally his house, we say, with another "house" more distinguished by age and not less by fortune?

However, let the facts speak their own inferences.

Let us call this man Plummer—Lemuel Plummer. He made his millions by contracts—engineering feats such as dredging a river for the Russian government, running a railroad through Siberia, opening a new harbor in India, and contributing to the success of a great dam in Egypt. His residence was in New York, but he kept valises and steamer trunks packed in his office in Wall street, and an hour's notice by cable sufficed to start him hither or yon to the earth's end, a citizen of the world. His patrons were kings and viziers: he wore odd medals and ribbons in European courts. In the field he wore overalls, and swore strange Mississippi river oaths that made the coolies of Shanghai shiver and the boys in the office in Wall street call him the Old Man. The boys judged him well. They laughed at Lemuel Plummer's pretensions to social position: they admired the Old Man, who knew his business and loved his work.

And his daughter. She burst into the office one day, home from a preparatory school in Boston, where she was being trained to her part as mistress of Plummer's millions; and had demolished the decorum of the staff. The married men shook their heads and went mumbling back to work. The bachelors and boys begged one another for admiring synonyms to express their admiration of Plummer's spectacularly helpless, begged off from four appointments by telephone, and submitted to being hurried forth to show her the sights of New York. She was more to him than his daughter and the pride of his life: she was the reminiscence of his life's memory. Business was suspended at 21 Wall street that day, while every youth in the place dawdled with pen or rule and dreamed golden dreams of a dress suit and a dark corner in a conservatory alone with Her and the envious eyes of a dozen rejected suitors outside the door.

All save Jones. Jones's name was unromantic, but do not suppose that Jones invented his name. He was plain to look on, plain as his name, but within constituted about as we all. He beheld the vision face to face—to be exact, he was he to whom the vision had spoken, her glorious eyes meeting his frankly, her smile and "Thank you" repaying his reply to a question. Every companion envied him, but Jones was unmoved. His fellows did not suspect it nor did he assert it; but let the facts continue.

Lemuel Plummer spent the rest of the day with Miss Constance Plummer, and the Old Man made much over Conny, and Mr. Plummer showed Miss Plummer the very most desirable residence sites on Fifth avenue that he had a mind to buy, and the Old Man went with Conny to see "The Heart of Maryland" at a matinee performance, and Mr. Plummer got a great deal of pleasure out of being the Old Man and Conny's mind went whirling down long vistas of delights as Miss Plummer of Fifth avenue. And a number of friends saw a vision of a face amongst the youthful subordinates in her father's office, though she had seen it first this day.

Soon after, Conny vetoed the Old Man's command that she return to the school in Boston, and the Plummer society friends took Miss Plummer in hand and brought her out. The great Mrs. Van Verden did the honors herself, and the society papers made much of the event, and society made much of the new belle. Miss Plummer enjoyed herself immensely, and was the radiant center of a group of handsome young men who, however distinctly they saw the Plummer millions, saw more vividly the Plummer beauty who would inherit them.

A WAR IN THE EAST

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

Miss Plummer, however, developed a peculiar fad for a society girl. She besought her father to be allowed to learn something of affairs, and the papers again had a good story in the beautiful Miss Plummer who chose to devote half of each day to studying business in her father's office, and as the Old Man profanely refused to be interviewed, the story was naturally better than the facts. And as society easily allows what a beautiful and wealthy young lady chooses to do, her strange avocation only added to her charms a claim of originality.

What one might imagine about this story might, perhaps, have been different if Mr. Plummer's mind had not been busied with momentous things. Murmurs of an approaching war in the East came to New York by way of Lemuel Plummer's office in Wall street, in the form of a cipher cable from the mandarin of a province in China, informing Mr. Plummer, as a great engineer, that his services were wanted in devising some changes in a great river's mouth to permit freer ingress of battleships drawing more than average water, and could he come at once. Mr. Plummer slept that night on the Limited for Chicago, calm in the knowledge that the San Francisco office had booked him on the next steamer out of the Gate.

This turn of the Fates left Miss Plummer mistress of 21 Wall street. The executive officer in charge had received brief instructions to "let her sweat this nonsense out of her with hard work at a typewriter." Miss Plummer did the rest of the ordering. She chose to work on the foreign mail, and as Jones did the foreign correspondence, she was duly installed his stenographer. Hence, under Jones's careful, but impassive eyes, she wrote reams of specifications for dredgers that were building in Scotland for use on the Volga river, yards of instructions for French to subordinate engineers who were wrestling with the harbor of Antwerp and the contrary river Scheldt, and books of other dry and matter of fact detail correspondence.

All this she did with great speed and accuracy, winning from Jones an earned commendation of her capacity, and even conquering the sour old executive who loathed women as office workers and thought Plummer was crazy to let his daughter drudge. Miss Plummer, however, did not seem to consider it drudgery, but worked with sprightliness and energy until the Chinese mail brought word that the Old Man would be back in thirty days. Then Miss Plummer instantly resigned and was seen in the office no more, to the much sorrow of the young men, who mourned her absence, and to their mingled pleasure that Jones was deprived of his monopoly of her presence.

The next morning's mail, however, brought Jones a surprise. The stationery was surprising enough, but the note was more so. In the bold hand that girls like to simulate she expressed Miss Plummer's appreciation of Mr. Jones's great kindness and patience in helping her to gain an insight into business methods, and concluded with the phrase that "Miss Plummer's aunt wishes her to invite Mr. Jones to dine with them this evening, so that she may thank him on behalf of Mr. Plummer, now absent in the East."

Jones felt a little uneasy, but the invitation of the queen is the king's command, so he went. Miss Plummer's aunt did thank Mr. Jones on behalf of Mr. Plummer, now absent in the East, though with obvious reserve; but Miss Plummer's gracious cordiality put him at his ease through the ordeal of dinner and the rather bewildering splendor of an evening in a Fifth avenue mansion. Never had Miss Plummer looked more lovely. Never before had Jones realized the beauty of the family name charm, for the Miss Plummer of the office was a cog in the machine—an extraordinary and disconcerting cog, but still only a cog—whereas the Miss Plummer of Fifth avenue in her own home was the most individual and interesting of young ladies.

Jones left the house that evening with feelings of wonder and alarm mingled in his mind. He could not but be amazed at the suddenness and the completeness of his intimacy in the household, for Miss Plummer, with a nod at her aunt, had engaged his presence for the next evening at a theater party and supper, and had dismissed him with friendliest informality; and he could not but be alarmed at the possibilities of anger when the Old Man came home and had a talk with the reserved Miss Plummer senior. Other feelings of alarm perturbed him, but of these we must not surmise.

The theater party was only the forerunner of the most splendid month of Jones's career. Miss Plummer's sense of gratitude was large, for she repaid her debt with a spendthriftness of hospitalities. Jones ones grew outwardly more impatient, inwardly more perturbed. Then the Old Man came home.

Miss Plummer senior, the aunt, and Mr. Plummer had a long private conversation the day after. The Old Man swore, and Miss Plummer senior that evening announced the most gorgeous series of social functions with the most exclusive lists of guests that New York society had the opportunity to discuss in years. The Old Man appeared at the office in more violent raiment than his worst offenses had ever before sanctioned, and in the most violent manner the boys had ever seen. The executive left his sanctum sorer than ever. Jones was called in. The Old Man glared and announced in veiled but forceful terms that Jones was badly needed to manage the office in Hong-Kong and would he please see that he did not miss the next steamer. His pay would be increased to meet the dignity of his new position, but it was understood to be a three-year contract and no leave of absence.

RECENT VERSE.

Retrospection.

He was better to me than all my hopes,
He was better than all my fears;
He made a bridge of my broken works,
And a rainbow of my tears.
The billows that guarded my sea-grit path
Carried my Lord on the crest;
When I dwell on the days of my wilderness
march,
I can lean on His love for the rest.

He guided by paths that I could not see,
By ways that I have not known;
The crooked was straight, and the rough made plain,
As I followed the Lord alone.
I praise Him still for the pleasant palms,
And the water springs by the way;
For the glowing pillar of flame by night,
And the sheltering cloud by day.

Never a watch on the dreariest halt,
But some promise of love endears;
I read from my past what my future shall be,
Far better than all my fears,
Like the golden pot of the wilderness bread,
Laid up with the blossoming rod,
All safe in the Ark with the law of the Lord,
Is the Covenant care of my God.

She Did!

Whin back to the Ould Sod me day dreams are wingin'.
Sure Kathleen Mavourneen's the song I'll be singin'
But more often me thoughts, the truth to be tellin',
Wid a nearer Kathleen an' dearer are dwellin'.
One's known all the homes o' the poor an' the rich in,
But my mavourneen is the Queen o' the Kitchen.
Wid the two of us waitin', slavin' an' savin', Faith 'till not be long till that same she'll be lavin'.

An' faith 'tis her swate self is nadin', God bless her,
Some more of a man than a Father Confessor!
An' faith 'tis meself an' no other is wishin'
The colleen'd stayed home whin she wint to confession.

The day before Bridget O'Flaherty's party
Some bit of a sin she tells Father McCarthy.
"For your fault," then says he, "which God knows was glarin'," Tin days twenty beans in each shoe you'll be wearin'."

"Sure the praste—I spake wid the riverence due
him,
An' little it is, may the bad scan be to him!"— Says I to the colleen, "ain't fit to lie dead on
The same ground at all that your darlin' feet tread on!"

"O Kathleen, acushla, ye'll never be thinkin'
O' doin' this penance at all; for it's drinkin'
The good father's been, ayther that or he's crazy,"—
"Ochone! But he said it," says she, "so go aisey."

"Ye mustn't be hard wid dear Father Mc-Carthy—
But sorra the bit can I go to the party.
An' there's the new gownd as I've just finished makin'!"—
"Ahas-liga," says I, "'tis me heart you are breakin'!"

"Although I'm no praste, I'll absolve ye," I
tould'er,
Me arms 'round her waist an' her head on me shoulder,
"So dry your dear eyes, for I'll not have ye spoil 'em—
The beans will set aisy, ashore, av ye boil
'em!"

MR. PINCHOT ON HETCH-HETCHY.

United States Department of Agriculture,
Forest Service.Washington, D. C., April 8, 1909.
Hon. James D. Phelan,
Phelan Building,
San Francisco, Cal.

My dear Mr. Phelan:—On my return to Washington I want to send you my best thanks for the copy of The California Weekly, containing your article, entitled, "Hetch-Hetchy for the Wealth Producer." You have certainly emphasized vigorously the fact that the decision in the Hetch-Hetchy matter involved the foremost principle of the conservation policy—the greatest good to the greatest number for the longest time. With you, I feel that the wisdom of the decision has been thoroughly established by now, and I think the controversy should cease.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Forester.

Automobile Notes.

Three thousand miles without once having to open the hood while on the road, is another Studebaker record, according to G. E. Tarbell of New York city, who three months ago purchased a Studebaker '40' touring car from the New York branch of the Studebaker concern.

"We ran the car more than 2,600 miles before we even had a puncture," says Tarbell in his letter to the Studebaker company.
"Another thing we appreciate is the easy riding of the machine and the ease with which the speed of the car may be controlled, the driver being able to drive as slowly as three or even two miles an hour without any inconvenience. Our car has also proven itself remarkably quiet."

Mr. Tarbell is probably the greatest life insurance solicitor who ever lived. Until he became vice-president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society his income from commissions was more than $100,000 a year.

A motorist who takes particular pride in the bright appearance his car always presents says that an automobilist can remove dust and mud from his machine by letting water from a hose play gently over the varnished surface of the body and wheels as soon as possible after the return from off the road. When mud has been thoroughly soaked through it may be removed with a wet sponge, which must be constantly cleaned in water.

There will be something saved if, whenever possible, as it often is when running through the rural districts, the radiator is replenished with rain water instead of hard water. A constant deposit is being made in water jackets and radiators by the mineral elements in spring water, from which the water of the rain barrel and cistern have been freed in nature's distillery.

AUTOMOBILE EFFICIENCY

of the highest type is embodied in the Studebaker-Garford car. Consider it point for point and you will find the only logical conclusion to be reached is that it is the best car on the market today. Call and inspect our recent arrivals of Models "C" and "D" and make appointments for demonstrations.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Due Process of Law.

In this lesson we shall try to finish considering the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and we may well begin with the clause reading, "Nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

"Due process of law" is at once an exasperation and a safeguard for the lives, the liberties and the properties of the people. Every similar clause in the constitution has behind it, as a provoking cause of its existence, long ages of suffering wrong because of the want of such a safeguard. Autocratic power has taken what it wanted wherever it found it and has hardly asked "by your leave," of the possessor.

In Russia it has long been the custom to send men out of their own country and into far Siberia by what is called "administrative process," that is, as an act of the executive and not the judicial arm of government, without trial and, in all lands except our own, in former times thousands of persons have rotted in prisons because the hatred, the fear or the caprice of some despot had so ordained. It was to prevent such history repeating itself that this clause was inserted in the constitution.

"Due process of law," has reference to the orderly, customary, time-sanctioned proceedings in the trial and adjudication of causes. No short cuts or summary proceedings are permitted, except where custom and proceedings have provided for them. An undue drawing out and refinement of these processes have given rise to complaint of the law's delays working as great an injustice perhaps as the more summary processes of some autocratic power. Unscrupulous lawyers and litigants, with careless or indifferent judges, can work almost as serious injuries through a perversion of laws made for the preservation of order, though they were made for the infliction of wrongs. This only emphasizes what the writer of this series of citizenship lessons has, from the first, sought to drive home to the reader's consciousness—there is a law on paper and a law written into the minds and customs of people and public officials, and it is the conscience law and not the law written on paper that governs us.

There are times, however, when the due processes of the law are suspended and autocratic power yields the scepter with no one to restrain. This is when the act of God or the public enemy throw the orderly machinery of law into such disorder that it cannot be operated. There was such a time during and following the great fire in San Francisco. The earthquake and fire were, in the meaning of the law, acts of God. Men were shot without trial when caught looting; were arrested without warrants and committed to jail without preliminary examinations. Such powers are commonly used in war times in disturbed districts and for the reason that society has a natural right to protect itself with summary processes when the usual machinery of the law does not suffice to that end.

The concluding clause of the fifth amendment reads thus: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Private property cannot be taken for private use at all without the consent of the owner. This is sometimes very exasperating, as when an adjacent lot is wanted to enlarge a church ground, or an eligible site is wanted for a factory that the public would like to see erected, and the owner will not sell at a fair price, but every man's house, or farm, or town lot is his castle and cannot be entered for any private purpose whatever against his will.

But if the public needs private property it can be taken by what is commonly known as the "statute of eminent domain," which prescribes just how (what process of law) such property may be acquired for public use. Unless an agreement can be reached as to price the services of a jury are required to assess the value.

Private property may thus be taken although the title to the property may never vest in the public. This is done in the case of lands taken for rights of way for a railroad or an irrigation canal. In such case the power of eminent domain compels a private owner to sell this property to a corporation, often very much against that owner's will, and for the reason that the public has authorized (franchised) such corporation to perform some service on behalf of the public in the public's room and stead.

Those who have followed this series of articles will not have failed to notice how carefully the Constitution of the United States safeguards property. While the body is more than raiment and the spirit more than what we eat, yet without security in property we can have no civilization worthy the name. Whatever one lawfully acquires the law must enable him to keep while he lives, no matter if his acquisitions are as great as the fortunes of a Rockefeller, a Carnegie or an Astor, and no matter if his palace be surrounded by the hovels of the poor, for, otherwise, incentive to enterprise will be wanting and the world will be involved in a hopeless level of poverty and hardship.

Nevertheless, the question, "How did he get it?" is always a pertinent one and if the answer does not bear the test of lawfulness society must find some way of restoring the ill-gotten gains, if not to their rightful owners, because they cannot be ascertained, at least to the common fund to be used for the common good. Along this line of reformatory work there yet remains much to be done, but not at the expense of property rightfully acquired.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

The Sorrows of Biggy.

The unfortunate taking-off of former Chief of Police W. J. Biggy will leave a note of pathos in the strain of San Francisco history until the present generation shall have followed him to another world and, meantime, it is not very likely that the mystery of it will be revealed. But this will not prevent the utilization of the incident as long as it can be made to do service in obscuring the visions of men or to turn the rivulets of sympathy into perverted channels. If Mr. Rudolph Spreckels went to Chief Biggy's office and, to his face, charged him with being an associate of brothel keepers and with surrounding himself with crooks and, therefore, demanded his resignation from office, he might certainly have paid the visit for a less meritorious purpose. If all good citizens, having reason to believe that such charges were true, would go to public officials thus openly, and make such charges thus specifically, such officials would soon come to avoid even the appearance of evil. If Chief Biggy did in fact commit suicide it was not because he knew Mr. Spreckels' charges to be untrue, but because he knew them to be true and dared not face an investigation. Men do not take their own lives through fear of facing charges they know to be without foundation, but through fear of facing charges that cannot be faced down. That Chief Biggy had fallen into bad company was painfully evident. If a reason must be sought for justifying a suicide theory that reason should prove sufficient without seeking to attach responsibility to one whom the facts as stated convict of nothing worse than good citizenship. But, be it remembered, there is as little to justify the suicide theory as the theory of accident in Biggy's taking off.

The Civic Center Idea.

The problems which confront a community of individuals are not essentially different from problems that may confront any individual in such community. We all of us have to do without things that we cannot afford and we all of us, if enterprising, take some chances on the future in the belief that time will warrant the hazard. It is true that San Francisco is confronted with need for large expenditures for necessities, most of them indispensable. It may be that it cannot afford to invest $2,000,000 additional in pursuit of an artistic ideal, in the form of a civic center; but let the people of San Francisco beware of the spirit of the huckster. It was due to a surrender to the chief huckster of them all in this particular that Montgomery and Sutter streets were not made as broad as Van Ness avenue, and because they were not so broadened property owners will pay usurious interest on what that broadening would have cost to the insurance companies in added premiums to the end of time. A newspaper that hucksters its news columns is an unsafe guide in such an emergency. Besides, it is not observable that the builders of the new San Francisco have paid no homage to art, added no item of cost for the sake of beauty, unless we except the lofty pile of the Huckster-in-Chief. Individual millions have been expended in adding mere beauty to the utility of the new San Francisco. Can it be that, collectively, the city is too poor to do what individuals have done twenty times over? The presumption is on the side of being able to afford a civic center that will make San Francisco the model city of America.

Unpleasant Publicity.

The government has been offered $260,000, far more than the amount of penalties involved in the smuggling of certain fine dresses through the custom house at New York, on condition that investigations be dropped and the government rest content with more than the making good of its losses. The report also has it that Collector Loeb has said: "No, we want the smugglers." It is to be hoped that Collector Loeb will stick to that policy until every guilty person, high or low, rich or poor, has been brought to book and justice done. If rich women have been smuggling, or have knowingly been the beneficiaries of smuggling, let them stand at the bar of justice and take such medicine as would be given them were they unheard of in society. Desire for even handed justice does not spring from any feeling of resentment toward the rich. The scoundrelly rich are making the status of the reputable rich difficult and they may easily make it dangerous, dangerous to the rich and dangerous to the poor. For this reason, if for no other, rich and poor should stand at the bar of justice as they stand at the brink of the grave—equally dependent upon character and mercy for their salvation.

The Income Tax Again.

When protection came to be the American policy there was freedom of competition within the tariff walls. There is such freedom no longer. This makes a difference wide, vast, deep, resulting in as much extortion as protection. To tax incomes is to tax the power-holding class for, in this country, property holds the power. To tax consumption is to tax the burden-bearing class, with the result that those least able bear the greatest proportionate burden. The burden-bearing element in social life never yet won a victory over a united power-holding element. The nearest they ever came to it was in the enactment of the income tax law attached to the Wilson tariff bill of 1894, which the Supreme Court of the United States first sanctioned and then, after a new rallying of the forces of property against the forces of humanity, pronounced unconstitutional. There are evidences that the justness of an income tax is dividing the power-holding social element on an issue of good conscience. If this be so, or when it shall become so, an income tax will be a part of the law of this land and cost of living will be greatly lessened where that burden now rests heaviest. It is unfortunate for the movement that Senator Bailey of Texas should be its sponsor. That leadership suggests more of politics than of conscience as an inspiring motive and victory cannot be won on that line. It is not, however, proposed to tax incomes in America as in Japan, from 15 to 68 per cent, the latter per cent. reaching incomes of $50,000 or over. Two or three per cent will do.

How Were They Made?

The San Francisco Star comes to the defense of the sanctity of the appellate judiciary. It is a terrible thing when people lose confidence in their higher courts of justice. It is a more terrible thing when they continue to repose confidence in those courts after they have become unworthy of it. The issue requires clear thinking and calm, and it involves an understanding of how those judges became judges. Judge W. P. Lawlor, before whom Louis Glass was tried and convicted, is a judge because of the imperative mandate of the people. There is not a judge betwixt him and the chief justice of the state who holds his position by any such mandate. They got their places by due process of politics, and not otherwise. Chief Justice Beatty and Superior Judge Lawlor got theirs by emphatic expression of the will of the people—the source of law. Moreover, Judge W. P. Lawlor is a wiser and safer judge of law and fact than stands between him and the Chief Justice. Our courts, if they are to be respected, if they are to do the habitations of sanctity, must be reputedly constituted and be presided over by men publicly known to be worthy of exalted station, and this can only come about through a non-partisan selection of judicial candidates. It can never come about through nomination by the political bureau of a corporation that is the greatest litigant before courts that it has itself constituted. The sooner the people face this state of facts in fearlessness and truth the sooner will our courts be entitled to that reverential consideration which all good citizens will wish to accord them, but while little men strain at gnats and swallow camels that rich wrong may go unwhipped, little reverence will be shown courts over which such men preside.

NATIONAL OBLIGATIONS.

When the United States went to war with Spain it was to put an end to a condition in Cuba that had long been intolerable. The civilized world justified that war on moral grounds. Turkey has been misgoverned for generations. It has been impossible for the people of Turkey to be happy or prosperous under a form of government that belonged to a by-gone age and under a character of government that was a travesty on any government at all. Civilized Europe has been recreant to obligations to common humanity that it has not joined in putting an end to so intolerable a condition. Central America is no better governed than Turkey. The atrocities there committed year after year and generation after generation have been as little bearable as those in Cuba under the Spanish regime. Our government is recreant to its obligations to humanity that it does not stretch forth its puissant hand and put a stop to such doings and an end to such conditions. The situation in Santo Domingo and Hayti is no better than in Central America. Our nation has obligations there also that have been long overdue. The legalists will aver that Uncle Sam has no right to meddle in the affairs of Guatemala or Salvador, Honduras, Santo Domingo or Hayti. Like Pontius Pilate they would have Uncle Sam wash his hands of these distracted countries and disclaim jurisdiction. The moralist will say, "go to now, and do your duty in these countries as you did it toward Cuba." And the God of nations will pronounce, "Well done."

WHICH WAY SHALL WE TAKE?

An incident occurred last week at Valardena, Mex., not devoid of interest. A village priest headed a religious procession and the mayor attempted to stop it, such processions being unlawful in that free country. Trouble arose between the authorities and the procession and a riot resulted. Troops were telegraphed for and arrived by special train. The governor of the state of Coahuila took charge and ordered many of the rioters shot at sunrise and many more who escaped to the mountains hunted down and slain like wild beasts. That is the Mexican way of establishing justice in such cases, and it has the merit of being non-reversible on appeal.

At Ada, Oklahoma, between midnight and dawn on Monday, 200 men stormed the jail in which four white men, charged with the assassination of a reputable citizen, were being held, took them, set an adjacent barn and hanged them until they were dead. Two of those hanged were rich cattlemen and report has it that they had boasted that they would never be brought to trial. They were right. Their trial was dispensed with. That is the Oklahoma way of dealing out justice in such cases.

For more than three years as brave and self denying an effort as was ever made to establish justice by due process of law has been making to convict men possessed of predatory millions of high crimes and misdemeanors. Their guilt is so notorious that it is not denied even by their close friends and is denied in court only pro-forma, yet not one among the number of them has slept a night in state prison and it does not now seem very likely that any one of them ever will. The onerousness of the burden of expense, the strained and multiplied difficulties of securing impartial juries where the press has been corrupted by the prodigal uses of money, the deadened condition of a moral perception that would hedge a rich rascal about with defensive armor not to be shared with a poor malefactor, the narrow and technical and over critical attitude of courts of appeal toward procedures—all these have so broken down efforts to establish justice by orderly processes that good citizenship stands appalled before the power of a wealth that is rapacious rather than predatory. That is the San Francisco way of establishing justice.

J. Whittaker Wright was a British promoter, financier, man of affairs. He held his head high. Noble Lords were his associates, fellow conspirators, dupes. He transgressed the law of England. All the influences that would naturally dread scandal and side with rich raciality arrayed themselves on his side, but in vain. British justice reached out for him, reached its hand across the Atlantic and gripped him in New York, brought him home, promptly convicted him and sentenced him to a term in prison. The only way he could beat British justice was to take an appeal to the Court of the Most High, and this he did with a pellet of cyanide of potassium which he smuggled into his mouth just before he was to start to prison.

Here now are four forms of justice. We must choose of these which we shall have for our form. The issue is not to be sidestepped or very long delayed. The San Francisco way is only a stepping stone to the Oklahoma way of dealing out justice, and the Oklahoma way is only a stepping stone to the Mexican way, where men's lives are taken because some dictator orders them taken by being shot out of them at sunrise.

If we would avoid the Mexican method we must install the British. British justice and American had the same origin. Their ways parted a century ago and their divergence has become greater year by year. American justice took the direction of exalting the lawyer and belittling the trial judge. British justice exalted the trial judge—the impartial arbiter who stands face to face with the facts—and made the lawyer keep his place as an inferior officer of the court. American criminal legislation has all been in the interest of the defendant, with the result that the innocent, together with the guilty who have wealth or influence, escape punishment with almost equal certainty. British justice may not make the escape of the innocent so absolutely certain as with us, but the escape of the guilty is practically impossible. British legislation has not been permitted to blight the judicial arm of government. In America judicial positions are largely filled by a combination between the powers of great, rapacious corporations and the tenderloin, the one taking courts of appeal as its share of political spoil, the other the courts of police. In Britain judicial positions are filled by the Lord Chancellor or the British Ministry.

To make American justice more like British and less like Mexican justice is the purpose of the League of Justice, which every law-abiding citizen should join.

MR. SBARBORO'S REMEDY.

It is with genuine satisfaction that we call the attention of our readers to an article, elsewhere in this issue, from the pen of Mr. Andrea Sbarboro and directed to a dispassionate consideration of what may best be done to mitigate the evils of intemperance in this country. The article is well written, candid and deserves a calm-tempered consideration of thoughtful persons.

But it cannot be taken as the final word upon the subject. It was the beer mug and not the whisky bottle that was put to the lips of inebriate Germany to make it drunken. Beer drinking Germany has found the issue of temperance of so much consequence as to demand governmental investigation and consideration. In that Fatherland a man is valued by his government, first, as a possible soldier and, second, as an industrial asset, and it was because of the palpable impairment of the value of the individual man as soldier and artisan that the German government has taken cognizance of the issue. It has been reported, with what truth this paper is unable to say, that the German Emperor himself has become a teetotaler as an exemplar for the Fatherland.

In France the drinking of absinthe has become a source of national alarm. While the phylloxera was devastating the vineyards of France, and curtailing the production of honest wines, dishonest wines were concocted from drugs and from that day to this, notwithstanding the rehabilitation of the grape, temperance has come to be very much of an issue even in France.

As to Italy the writer of this is unable to speak advisedly, further than to say that, throughout California, what is commonly known as "Dago Red" is believed by peace officers to be at the bottom of the many cutting scrapes that take place wherever groups of Italians are employed.

We are not inclined to agree with Mr. Sbarboro that alcoholic stimulants are indispensable to good health and a sound digestion. We think that the millions of Americans who touch not, taste not and handle not, prove the contrary to be true; but we do agree with him that the world has always found use for alcoholic beverages and is likely always to find use for them. Our quest is to find the way in which they can be used with least harm.

Mr. Sbarboro's answer to that question is: "In the home." It would be a bold man who would advise the introduction of wine into a home where its presence had never been known before. The teetotaler is and always will be the only person who occupies an absolutely safe position, but fifty-one persons will never prevent forty-nine from using liquors if they want them, and finding ways of buying them if they would use them, and our contention is that, whatever liquor is sold, should be sold under the surveillance of the law and not otherwise.

It cannot seriously be questioned that the family liquor store, where no drinking is allowed on the premises, and the cafe, where liquors are sold and drank only with meals, are safer dispensaries than the American saloon, from which treating is inseparable and bad politics as certainly a concomitant as bad liquors. Mr. Sbarboro would rid society of this pest gradually, would amputate the gangrened arm an inch at a time. Our judgment is that the saloon should be voted out of existence as Fresno has voted it out, leaving in its place something better—the cafe and the family liquor store—and not something worse, the "joint," the "bootlegger" and the "blind pig."

Nevertheless, Mr. Sbarboro's article finely and temperately presents a view of a pressing subject that well merits thoughtful consideration.

Action and Reaction in Turkey.

To many persons the news from Turkey reads like Greek. If an explanation of the situation, from one who does not understand it any too well himself, will afford any aid to the reader he is welcome to all he can get out of this resume.

The party of the first part is old Abdul Hamid, the crafty, unscrupulous, power loving Sultan who, despite his sixty-seven years and feeble constitution, clings to life and to the throne with astonishing tenacity. During the third of a century in which he has reigned he and his people have lived in an atmosphere of intrigue, assassination, plotting and counter-plotting. His reign has been cruel, tyrannical and murderous, and he has fairly earned the appellation of the "great assassin." His supreme ambition has been to bring all Mohammedan peoples under one government—his government—and to reestablish in his own line of descent the caliphate, that is, the right to rule Mohammedanism, as well as Mohammedans, as the divine successor of Mohammed the Great, the founder of the faith of Islamism. As a step toward this consuming ambition of his life Abdul Hamid, thirty years ago or so, suspended a constitution constructed on something like modern lines, and has ruled as an autocrat. The government he gave was rotten in its administration and taxation has so eaten up the substance of the people that all are involved in almost a universal poverty.

Over against this policy there has been a "Young Turkish" movement, not in the hands of young men, as the name would suggest, but in the hands of men who want to see Turkey rejuvenated, made young, and on the lines of modern constitutionalism in Europe. The men behind this movement are, first of all, Turks and Mohammedans. They want Mohammedanism to be the state religion, but are willing to give other religions such toleration as will not be inconsistent with Mohammedan supremacy. They, too, want to see all Mohammedan peoples brought under Turkish government and the head of the government made the head of the church, but their prime consideration is for good government and material prosperity. Ahmed Riza is the leading spirit in this movement, but the power wielded by the Young Turks is in the hands of a self-constituted Committee of Union, an oligarchy or cabal of ambitious and determined men.

A third element is the reactionary, fanatical Mohammedan, militant followers of the ancient prophet. They are one with Abdul Hamid and whenever it is the pleasure of the "great assassin" to have them sally forth to slay Christian Armenians they are ready to respond. The army is full of them and there can be no question that the recent overthrow of the Young Turks in the government was brought about by Abdul himself by his customary use of this fanatical element, and his coup d'etat nearly succeeded.

A fourth element in the Turkish situation, and the one that has the strongest claim upon our sympathy, is the liberal element, the element that stands with the Young Turks for a constitutional government, but goes farther than that organization in demanding equality in government for all Turkish races with the Turks themselves and equal opportunities for all regions with special privileges for none, not even for Mohammedanism. For some reason, better understood in Turkey than outside of it, this liberal element, which stood by the Young Turks last August, has forsaken them in the recent crisis and either stood alone or with Abdul Hamid, presumably because the Young Turks seemed determined to make the government of Turkey by the Turks for the Turks. An issue second in importance only to equal rights for all, as viewed by the liberals, has been home rule for the vilayets, or Turkish provinces, such as our American states enjoy. The Young Turks, on the other hand, stand for a centralization of power at Constantinople and, as with Great Britain, in the hands of parliament.

The latest turn of events is that the Young Turks have marched on Constantinople at the head of so much of the army as stood with them last August. Unless the Sultan makes such terms with them as he can, or must, and so restores order, the army is likely to be divided against itself on politico-religious lines and civil war will result. It looks at this moment as though the crafty old assassin were in a position to force a compromise, keep his throne and do some more waiting for the day when the reactionaries can more firmly establish themselves. After which the "Great Assassin" will be a greater assassin than ever.

An Important Conference.

On Friday last a delegation of workmen, headed by Samuel Gompers, had a heart to heart talk with President Taft lasting fully two hours. They took up with him such issues as the right of injunction; the eight-hour labor law, which they wish to see extended to all contracts for doing government work as well as for work done by government; the danger of the destruction of all labor organizations under unfriendly construction of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has already provoked many indictments of labor leaders in the South; competition of convict with free labor and the extension and better enforcement of laws against child labor. The conference was very frank and friendly and the President promised to make such further investigations along certain lines as were needful, but he made clear to his visitors that what he had said in his letter of acceptance, and his inaugural address, touching the right of injunction, was final and could be relied on as constituting his policy in that regard.

The Philippine Tariff Issue.

The President has, during the past week, made it clear to Congress what his views are regarding the Philippine tariff. It is clear from what has developed that he is not in favor of holding those islands merely that they may be plucked, a policy toward a colony that the American Tea Party made odious long ago. "What is best for the Philippines" is just as much to be considered as what is best for the United States regarding the Philippines. Congress seems inclined toward a jug-handled free trade with the Philippines, a free trade that will admit our goods to their markets free, without furnishing any revenue for the support of Philippine government, while admitting only certain Philippine commodities to our markets free and some of these to only a limited extent. It may well be that free trade with the islands is not best for them or for us, but it cannot be questioned that fair trade is the least that American sense of justice will stand for with its dependencies.

The latest theory of defense in the graft cases appears to be that, although there was bribery, and although Ruef got the money from Calhoun and passed it on through Gallagher to the supervisors, nevertheless, inasmuch as the money got to its intended destination in advance of any promise to give it, the defendant cannot be convicted of having made any "offer" to bribe.

The Deeper Significance : : : of Living : : :

There are whole sects the ruling passion of whose lives is to keep themselves unspotted from the world. They withdraw from it as far as they may and continue to live in it. They take no part in its political life, wash their hands of its public affairs and reduce their social responsibilities to a minimum. Only in commerce and industry do they make their influence felt, and in these activities they are not unfrequently strangely regardless of the risks of being bespattered with earth. This attitude of mind is the essence of selfishness.

We often see a man with dinner pail in hand swinging off toward home with a stride that tells against distance, but at whom we must look twice to determine whether he be black or white. When at length he reaches his bar of soap and basin of water, in which he splatters and sloshes like old Joshua Whitcomb at the wash-bench by the kitchen door down at Swansea, he comes out every inch a white man, none the worse from having been spotted in the shop or smudged by the forge.

The Men's League of the First Congregational Church of Oakland probably consists of the best 200-man group of the citizenry of that city that comes regularly together by any species of natural selection. Mayor Mott gave them particular fits one evening last week for their neglect of civic duties. He charged that, of the immortal element in Oakland civic life, not to exceed 10 per cent. failed of voting at every election while 50 per cent. of the so-called best citizens could not be counted on to get to the polls by anything short of a violent hand upon their shoulders. It was protested that this was unjust to that body of men, but when a call was made for all those who voted at the last city election to stand up it was plain to all that half those present had not voted. A few more guests from that of Oakland and a few had not acquired citizenship, and yet, making due allowances for this, it was evident that practically half of those present had kept themselves unspotted from politics at the cost of subjecting their home city to the risk of becoming infected as political leprosy had made it in past years.

It is true that in those commandments commonly known as the Decalogue there are nine "shalt-nots" to only four "shalts," but the shalts are of the most positive and uncompromising character. Thou shalt have no other God than the one living God. Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Work the other six days—good, stiff aggressive work, from Monday morning until Saturday night. Honor thy father and thy mother, positively, not merely refrain from dishonoring them. It is any wonder that, to the children of Israel, the mountain seemed to smoke when they saw this job cut out for them! They foresaw that it would be comparatively easy to refrain from doing bad things, but to go forth and produce results of positive righteousness—that takes vim.

Who that is worthy to live can be content to go through life with the minus sign (—) ever in front of him, indicative of his character and his status in the social whole? There are such persons. They submerge from everything they touch. There is always less than there was after they have been alike to the bank, the church, the breakfast table. They carry no burdens that they can shrink. They dare not wrestle with hard problems for the same reason that a boy in his Sunday best dare not wrestle with another "kid" lest he get spots on his trousers. There is scarcely a serious civic or social evil to-day that does not owe its continued existence to the moral inertia of the self-emacipated politician, the politician who serves as ballast instead of able seamen on the ship of state. They bear a similar relation to affairs that the dapper clerk, with milk-white linen and dainty tie, bears to commerce and industry—spotless but cheap. They are Pontius Pilates washing their hands of the country's blood while graft and greed are dragging its institutions off to be crucified.

ORIGINAL THINKING A LOST ART

By ELMER ELLSWORTH CAREY.

During the progress of a lecture in a southern city, the speaker stated that originality and initiative in thought had practically disappeared, and that probably not one in his audience did his own thinking. A gentleman arose and took issue with the lecturer; he protested that he did his own thinking. The lecturer asked what church he belonged to; asked about his politics, his opinions, and shortly drew from the gentleman the facts that he was a Baptist because his parents were, having been trained in the tenets of that church; he was a Democrat, all his relations being Democrats, and he had heard democratic doctrine from boyhood, and certain journals gave him inspiration as to his beliefs on current affairs. His likes and dislikes in dietary matters were fixed in youth by the ignorant negress who cooked in his father's kitchen; he belonged to several lodges, societies, etc., because his associates and friends belonged; he went to the theater because the play was well spoken of by the press or his friends; he allowed his tailor to select his styles in clothing; his doctor furnished all his ideas as to health; certain books gave him ideas on philosophy, art, etc. In fine, it was demonstrated very clearly, that the gentleman, although an attorney of standing, was passing through life without doing any original thinking; he didn't even decide on his clothing, his amusements; his food was suggested by another; the barber who selected his collars and ties; his automobile was selected by a friend; some broker directed his investments. The lawyer supposed he was a free agent, selecting, choosing, judging and thinking. In the last analysis he was an automaton. He was an echo of certain opinions and beliefs; he was a mirror which reflected certain thoughts; he was a phonograph which gave out only that which it received.

The power of original thought is very rare; we move in droves actuated by the "spirit of the crowd." Thousands of men are seen daily, all dressed exactly the same, they move with a common impulse; their business habits are almost identical; their pleasures are similar; their opinions vary but little; they obtain ideas and plans by imitation; by watching others. A thousand or ten thousand insects in a swarm will rise and fall in perfect harmony; the swarm moves here and there as though one thought animated each one of the thousand of separate units. The swarm seems to have a consciousness apart from that of the individual.

Do we not see this same "crowd consciousness" in the masses? In the case of women, especially regarding styles, the lack of individuality is strikingly noticeable. No woman has anything to do in originating the styles she wears, but she would feel ostracized could she not move with the masses regarding the kaleidoscopic changes of the fashions. In her social life, customs, habits, dress, methods of thought, pleasures and fads, woman is swayed by the feminine crowd. Originality is dead, for an original woman is treated as an outcast by her sister. Woman, more than man, is a slave to habit, inconvenient custom, usage; and as woman is dependent for the necessities of life, she must conform to the crowd or suffer social disbarment with financial disadvantages.

For these reasons a woman with independent ideas, original thoughts and free from the bondages of custom is almost unknown. There is some excuse for this state of affairs, as woman can never be free socially and intellectually till she is free economically.

There is no particular excuse why men should follow the "calf path"; originality and initiative are in demand in business life, and without inventive faculties and power to originate, a man or firm can hardly hope to rise above mediocrity.

The habit of original thinking is a most valuable one to young men, and our schools and colleges should give more attention to developing the power of thought. To-day when a young man leaves college, he has a big conceit, a pair of turned-up trousers, a knowledge of tobacco brands and card games, a lot of memorized facts and a stock of ideas absorbed by imitation, but little of the real ground work of success, little of the mental foundation upon which to build a name and establish a career. He has been too long with the crowd to develop a strong intellectuality. Still the young man with the turned-up pantaloons and the discriminating knowledge of tobacco, may not be altogether to blame. There is a tradition in the land that as soon as any college professor shows symptoms of having been inoculated by the thought germ, he is discharged for fear the malady may be "catching."

If any lady feels that her sex has been maligned by my remarks, the editor will be glad to give her an opportunity to enter testimony in rebuttal, only please be brief.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Vacaville, Cal., April 11, 1909.

Publishers The California Weekly,

Dear Sirs:—Your disinterested attitude reminds me of the days when Harper's Weekly was at its best, under the leadership of George William Curtis.

In my opinion The Saturday Evening Post is not making good. A million a week circulation is paralyzing the editorial page of that paper. Hold out for the 1,000,000 mark before losing your grip.

Yours truly,

L. J. HARRISON.

We have been many times advised to cut down our editorial and other solid matter in order to make room for more such stuff as makes the Post so entertaining, and if the purpose of The California Weekly were primarily to entertain we should do it, but it was not especially for that purpose that it entered the journalistic world. It was that it might help to make things better than they are. As for a million subscribers, well, ten thousand would look good to us just now for a starter, and with our paper permanently going into 10,000 cultivated California homes the influence for good of The California Weekly would be commensurate with that of Harper's Weekly in its palmiest days and under the master hand of George William Curtis. The way to help in bringing this about is to tell your friends all about The California Weekly and send us their names and addresses that we may talk to them, too.

Palo Alto, Cal., April 14, 1909.

Editor of The California Weekly:

Dear Sir: I have read your paper from its beginning with ever increasing interest and satisfaction. If you maintain a paper which shall always stand for what is just and right and of good repute you will confer a blessing upon the long-suffering reading public of California.

I sentimentally approve of your political attitude and the sentiments set forth in your department devoted to the "Deeper Significance of Living."

Sincerely yours,

F. E. PERHAM.

We can definitely promise that The California Weekly will stand for what is just and right as it is given to its staff to know what is just and right, but the success of the enterprise depends upon reaching that "long suffering reading public of California." Those interested in our success can help us mightily by telling their friends all about The California Weekly and impressing upon their minds the need for supporting such a paper with their subscriptions if they want California to have such a paper. Only in this way can the sufferings of the long-suffering public be mitigated.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not put a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

WHEN THE HOUNDS OF SPRING.

By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,

The mother of months in meadow or plain
Fills the shadows and windy places

With hiss of leaves and mellow of rain;
And the brown bright nightingale amorous

Is half assuaged for Ithylus,
For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,

The tongueless vigil, and all the pain.

Come with bows bent and with emptying of quivers,

Maiden most perfect, lady of light,
With a noise of winds and many rivers,

With a clamor of waters, and with might;
Bind on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,

Over the splendor and speed of thy feet!
For the faint east quickens, the wan west

shivers,
Round the feet of the day and the feet of the night.

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to
her,

Fold our hands round her knees and cling!
O that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her,

Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring!

For the stars and the winds are unto her
As rainment, as songs of the harp player;

For the risen star and the fallen cling to her,
And the southwest wind and the west wind sing.

For winter's rains and ruins are over,
And all the season of snows and sins!

The days dividing lover and lover,
The light that loseth, the night that wins;

And time remembers its grief forgotten
And frosts are slain and flowers begotten,

And in green underwood and cover
Blossom by blossom the spring begins.

The ivy falls with a Bacchanal's care
Over her eyebrows shading her eyes;

The wild vine slipping down leaves bare
Her bright breast shortening into sighs;

The wild vine slips with the weight of its leaves,

But the berried ivy catches and cleaves
To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare.

The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies.

SWINBURNE'S CAREER.

The death of Algernon Charles Swinburne, the poet, has impressed the literary world with a sense of profound loss, not merely of a great poet, but of the last living link connecting the present with the great Victorian group of poets. The New York Sun recently printed the following account of his life and art:

He was born on April 5, 1837, in London, so that at the time of his death he had just entered upon his seventy-third year.

Swinburne was the son of Admiral Charles Henry Swinburne and the daughter of the third Earl of Ashburnham. His father owned a beautiful place on the Isle of Wight, where the poet spent much of his boyhood.

Neither at Eton nor at Oxford did young Swinburne especially distinguish himself as a scholar, though he became known as an ardent student of things that interested him peculiarly. He went in 1856 to Balliol College, Oxford, where he speedily became intimate in a literary set that included such young men as John Nichol, T. H. Green, R. V. Dacey and James Bryce, the present British Ambassador to the United States. He did not take a degree at Oxford, leaving in 1860.

It was shortly after this that he published at his own expense his first volume of poetry, "The Queen Mother," and "Rosamund," two dramas in the Shakespearean style, thus early showing the influence of the Elizabethan dramatists which was destined so long to keep its hold upon him. He had before this made the acquaintance of such growing figures as Rossetti, Burne-Jones and William Morris. His appearance at this time seems to have made a vivid impression upon a number of beholders, who took the trouble to record it. Standing scarcely five feet two inches, he was slight of frame and lean of flesh. But there was a strong individuality about him. His complexion was startlingly pale, his then slender, his features refined, and his manner both shy and proud.

Yet Swinburne had a sound constitution and led a vigorous life. He was a powerful swimmer and dearly loved a long walk, especially if it rained in torrents. To the last day of his life he scorned to carry an umbrella or to wear an overcoat, and it was only in the latest years of his old age that he reconciled himself to wearing gloves, and then only in the bitterest winter weather.

His conversational powers were uncommon from his early youth and at Oxford he was noted for the keenness of his wit, though he never seems to have had much sense of humor. In his later years he is said to have been very fond of reading his own poetry.

After he left Oxford he made a tour of the continent, forming there the acquaintance of Walter Savage Landor, from whom he no doubt acquired certain of those republican sentiments which were supposed to have inspired "A Song in Time of Order." At a much later period in the poet's life a certain leaning toward republicanism appeared to find expression in a poem in which many persons thought they perceived an invitation to the nihilists to make away with the Czar of Russia. In the House of Commons this poem caused inquiry to be made as to whether the poet were to be prosecuted for inciting murder, to which the speaker replied that the House had "no control over the poet Swinburne."

The two plays which were the poet's first pretentious publications, made at a time just before he went to live at Chelsea with Rossetti and George Meredith, did not attract much attention, but his "Atalanta in Calydon," published four years later, made such a stir that he was hailed as a new poetical star of the first magnitude. It had certain faults of style which to the end were characteristic of the poet, but his criticisms, for all these faults, were quick to recognize the quality of the new writer.

Mary Queen of Scots, for years an inspiring figure to Swinburne, furnished the inspiration for "Chastelard," which followed "Atalanta." In "Chastelard" appeared the first symptoms of his poetical eroticism, and it was the signal for a critical onslaught as violently condemnatory as the comment on "Atalanta" had been eulogistic. The poet vigorously defended himself, but for years the critical uproar was considerable and the confluent personal gossip amazing. Meaning "Swallowtail" and "Faustina" and "Dolores," and all England read them first and then committed them to memory and quoted them in season and out. So great was the shock when "Laus Veneris, and Other Poems and Ballads" appeared that the British publisher suppressed the first edition. There have been many editions since.

It was about now that the poet went to London to live and passed much time with William Morris, Theodore Watts-Dunton, Whistler, Burne-Jones and Rossetti, coming thus strongly under the influence of the pre-Raphaelite movement. The long struggle for liberty then going on in Italy also excited his intense sympathy, and "A Song of Italy" and "Songs Before Sunrise" were the results.

The second of the Mary Stuart plays, "Bothwell," he published in 1874 and the previously offended critics gave it a large measure of approval; they had withheld it from him, his lyrics. In "Erechtheus" there was exhibited much of the Greek spirit that had marked the earlier "Atalanta." About this time he turned his attention to prose and published a critical study of Shakespeare, together with an essay on William Blake. "Songs of Springtimes" came next, followed by "Mary Stuart," the third of the trilogy dealing with the unfortunate Queen of Scots. There followed the long narrative poem called "Tristram of Lyonesse," "The Century of Roundels," "A Midsummer Holiday," a collection of ballads, a tragic poem of the Venice of the Middle Ages called "Marino Faliero" and another tragedy, "Leoline." A number of prose works came late in the poet's life, among them being a novel called "Love's Cross Currents," 1905, which did not excite much comment. His last years Swinburne passed at Putney, where he lived with the friend of his youth, the critic, Theodore Watts-Dunton.

Many traditions exist of the poet's eccentricities. He was exceedingly nervous and quick tempered; moreover, his singular lack of sense of humor occasionally betrayed him into absurd performances, and he excited much merriment by his extraordinary behavior on the occasion of a public dinner to which he brought a footstool, upon which he insisted on sitting literally at the feet of Robert Browning.

NEW VERSES OF SHELLEY POEM.

Three additional verses of Shelley's poem "St. Irvyne" have been discovered in a three-page letter in his handwriting, recently sold in London. They come between section four and five, and are as follows:

For there a youth with dark'ned brow,
His long lost love is heard to mourn:
He vents his swelling bosom's woe.

Ah! when will hours like these return?

O'er this torn soul, o'er this frail form,
Let least the fiends of tortured love,
Let hover dire fate's terrific storm;

I would the pangs of death to prove.

Ah! why do prating priests suppose
That God can give the wretch relief?
Can stop the bosom's burning woes,
Or calm the tide of frantic grief?

ACTING AND THE SOUL.

By Mm. Helena Modjeska.

It is the keeping your inside that is the fountain of life. I have kept my ideals. I have not lost my faith in humanity. I haven't forgotten how to enjoy and be glad.

I cannot play a part at all unless I can feel the part. I do not work the wards of hospitals to study death in its terrors.

My success is due to my earnestness. Then, besides, though I know it is out of fashion to be poetical, there are still germs of poetry in my soul, and I am a religious woman.

There are certain characters that cannot be portrayed by a woman who does not believe in God.

The first essential for a successful actress is a soul; after that a pretty face, a winning voice, an attractive personality; but soul first.

MODJESKA.

By Richard Watson Gilder.

There are four sisters known to mortals well,
Whose names are Joy and Sorrow, Death and Love;

The last it was who did my footsteps move
To where the other deep-eyed sisters dwell.
To-night, when I was in the painted curtain fell,
These one by one, before my eyes did rove
Through the brave mimic world that Shakespeare weave.

Lady, thy art, thy passion, were the spell
That held me, and still holds; for thou dost show

With those most high each in his sovereign art—
Shakespeare supreme, and Tuscan Angelo—
Great art and passion are one. Thine too the part

To prove, that still for him the laurels grow
Who reaches through the mind to pluck the heart.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Two More Planets In Our System.

Time was when it required less than a scientist to name all the planets that danced a stately minuet about the sun, but times have changed since then, and now no man may foreknow how many may have been added to the list—between the shades of eve and the next flush of dawn. The latest such additions have been announced by M. Gaillot, a noted French astronomer, and their number is two. According to Gaillot, one of these planets, never to be seen by mortal eye, is in the region occupied by the constellation Gemini. Its distance from the sun he estimates at about forty-five times that of the sun from the earth, or, approximately, 4,050,000,000 miles. The other planet is still farther from the earth, such as the figures already have passed all human comprehension, we need not stop vaguely to dream of its distance from us. When one pauses to reflect that these inconceivably tremendous distances are included within our solar system, and that that system is as a grain of sand on the beach of the universe—well, one does not pause to reflect concerning it, for one cannot.

A Hold-Over Dinner.

Doubtless the most remarkable dinner ever eaten by man recently was consumed in St. Petersburg by a party of noted European scientists, Professor Otto Herz, of the Imperial Russian Academy of Science, being their host. Note this menu, and judge if the foregoing assertion be justifiable: Steak from a mammoth which lived perhaps 20,000 years ago; bread from wheat which was placed in the Egyptian pyramids something like 5,000 years ago; wine, mellowed by more than 2,000 years of age, which was found in the ruins of ancient Corinth. The table furnishings were in keeping with the edibles, consisting of tablecloths taken from the tomb of a daughter of one of the Pharaohs, stone knives and bone forks once used by the cave-dwellers of Denmark, and clay cups and other dishes from prehistoric times. The body of the mammoth which furnished the piece de resistance of the meal was found on the top of the Bjijudi mountains in Siberia. As it had been frozen and entombed in ice since the hour of its death, which doubtless resulted from a flood, its meat was found to be fresh and sweet. This suggested the unique dinner, and the rest was comparatively easy. Professor Amelieneau of the Egyptian national museum furnished the wheat, and Professor Henle, director of the French archaeological school in Greece, supplied the wine. A rare and wonderful repast, but probably there are people who would prefer a beefsteak that had not been dead so long.

King Edward As Professional Man.

It is a rather curious and not generally understood fact that King Edward of Great Britain would be entitled to practice almost any profession—if he could find people who would be willing to have him practice on them. He is a lawyer, having been called to both the English and Irish bars; but who would care to have him try a suit for him, provided the factor of "pull" were obliterated? He is a physician, being a member of the Royal College of Physicians, and a surgeon, having been admitted to the Royal College of Surgeons; but who would have him treat his case of typhoid or remove his unruly vermiform appendix? He even is a clergyman, being a prebendary of St. David's cathedral, Wales; but where is the soul which would trust itself to his cure? Apparently dentistry still remains uncaptured, but perhaps that is because it has not been assaulted. Think of these learned professions opening their doors, with profound salaams the while, to a man who knows naught of their lore, solely because he was born to a throne, and decide for yourself if it be not a queer world.

Airships As War Vessels.

It was apprehension caused by Germany's activity in building warships that caused the present British furor for a like activity in Great Britain, and now comes a correspondent of the London Times and adds to that apprehension, or endeavors to do so, by calling attention to the possibilities involved in Germany's rapid construction of dirigibles of the Zeppelin type. His warning is poor-pooled to some extent, and yet some facts to which he calls attention might seem worthy of rather serious consideration. According to him, Germany will, in 1912, at the present rate of construction, have twenty-four mammoth Zeppelin ships, each one capable of over-sea excursions, and speedier than any naval vessel. As each could carry a ton or more of explosives, it is suggested that they would make short work of a navy of Dreadnaughts. To offset this condition England has nothing, or practically nothing, to offer. She has taken little active interest in airships and could not, at present, say the Times writer, build more than one airship while Germany was building five, and even the one would be of inferior quality. The striking feature in the controversy, whether on the side of the alarmist or of the poor-poolist, is its implied recognition of the atmosphere, rather than sea or land, as the possible scene of man's future warfare.

Railway Across South America.

Little has been said in this part of the world concerning the railway now in process of construction across South America, and yet the enterprise will be of great import to the people south of Panama, and of indirect importance to those north of it. The railway will connect Valparaiso and Buenos Aires. The journey between the two cities will be accomplished in thirty-eight hours, whereas the journey by water around Cape Horn now requires ten days and the overland journey much longer. South America has been lethargic in its development, but there are signs that this condition is undergoing a change for the better.

Divorce In England.

While many Americans are advocating more stringent divorce laws, the British judicial committee, which was recently appointed to inquire into the divorce law in effect over there, has made recommendations which, if they should become law, would make divorces more readily obtainable than they now are. These recommendations include one for the establishment of provincial divorce courts and also suggestions for cheapening the procedure. As at present there is but one divorce court, and that is situated in London, and hence is often inaccessible to other than wealthy people, the recommendations may be considered to look rather to securing justice in divorce proceedings than to facilitating them, but, of course, it follows that there would be a decided increase in the number of divorces.

CALIFORNIA POLITICAL GOSSIP.

The Thompson Senator Thompson's High School Law School bill was an orderly codification of the mass of high school legislation which had been growing up in chaotic shape for a good many years. Besides the advantage of having this portion of our educational legislation clearly codified, other benefits have been secured; for example, it is made possible for two or more cities or towns to join forces by consolidating their high schools; it is understood that Pacific Grove and Monterey, and possibly other municipalities which are contiguous to one another, will do this, and thereby obtain better, if not cheaper, schools. Again, the act contains some provisions relating to test-books, and it is probable that henceforth the prohibition of changes of books oftener than once in four years will have to be observed, thus stopping a perennial cause of complaint. The new act, taken with certain supplementary legislation in the Penal Code, makes it a misdemeanor for any teacher to refuse to use the legally adopted text-books, as many teachers in the past have been known to do, and it is also a misdemeanor for any teacher to urge, or even suggest to a pupil to buy a book not in the official series. So that teachers who fail to watch out may find themselves in jail.

Another section of the law which may or may not be wise makes the tuition expenses of pupils attending high schools when they do not live in the district a county charge. That is to say, principals must report the number of such pupils, and the county supervisors must levy a sufficient tax on the territory outside of high school districts to meet the cost of tuition.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Back In a Vale I Know.

Oh, to be lolling back in a vale I know,
Where days are a hymn of praising and nights are an anthem low,
Where the baby-blue-eyes nestle and drowsing
poppies nod,
And hills are a mighty trestle on a highway up to God,
Where the glory of stars is nearer than here
in the city's roar,
And the vision of souls is clearer than e'er it has been before;
To be resting, ay, and giving no thought to the
ebb and flow
Of tides in the sea of living, far back in a vale
I know.

Oh, to be resting, resting afar from the city's strife,
The clamor and roar divesting the soul of the peace of life,
For the world is a-worn by hurry, its spirit
benumbed by care
And the clutch of a ghoulous worry lest coffers of Greed be bare;

But list to the mountains' story, afar from the restless rout:
"Better one day of glory than aeons of fear and doubt."

I hear it; 'tis more than seeming, the voice of the hills, and so
I fain would be resting, dreaming, far back in a vale I know.

Up-to-Date Definitions.

Technicality—The shuffling sand on which Justice stands—when she doesn't fall down.

The Jury—Twelve of the defendant's peers—sometimes, great care being taken that they shall be no more than that.

The Judge—The gentleman whose legal opinions not improbably will be reversed.

The Verdict—Something the law promises as a basis from which an appeal may be taken.

The Sentence—Something else provided for the same purpose.

Higher Court—One which points out to the amazed populace how little the lower court knows about law; also useful when the defendant, by having money, proves that he is not guilty.

Still Higher Court—Useful when the ordinary higher court has overlooked an opportunity to order a new trial.

Highest Court—Established with power to reverse anything except God's decrees, and occasional affects that temporarily.

Ignorance of the Law—Something that excuses no man, unless he has been admitted to the bar.

Penitentiary—A place of incarceration for friend-forsaken or poverty-stricken criminals.

Justice—A poor, old girl whose eyes have been blinded so long that some who are of little faith begin to doubt that ever she will see again.

The Most Beautiful Thing In Life.

The most beautiful thing in life, what is it?
Here, where the glory of the sunlight is about us and the tender blue of the skies is above us;
here, where the clamorous noises are hushed,
let us sit down together and try to decide.

It is not so easy to do. The eternal wonder of the mountains, cloud-reaching, with daintiest lace-work of shimmering waterfalls, and at their feet the cool green of far-reaching meadows spanned by multi-colored blossoms —is not this the most beautiful thing in a beautiful world? If you urge that it is I shall not wonder, and yet I cannot quite agree with you.

The infinite majesty of the ocean, now weak-ing its Titanic wrath on heaving crags that confine it and again murmuring a lullaby to the sun-kissed beach it woos with coy advance and reluctant retreat; here is beauty overpowered by grandeur, and yet I have seen that which surpasses it.

Maidenhood, with the spirit of purity enveloping it like a halo, and in its eyes the dream of that glorifying love which shall come to hover the mist-dlad hills of time. Beautiful, and more than beautiful, yet let us look farther.

Youth, with untried ambition and unshattered faith, confident in itself, sure that it shall win success from the reluctant hand of the years, as yet unknowing the hope that buries hope, the faith that crucifies faith; if you tell me that this is most beautiful of all I shall not hold it strange, and yet I have seen that which was infinitely more beautiful and sweet.

Ay, for sometimes I have seen a mother as she held her babe against her breast and looked down upon it as it nestled there, and that look, no master artist has succeeded in transferring it to his canvas, in no poet's song has the ineffable sweetness of it found perfect expression, no mighty musician has written even faintest reflection of it in undying melody. It is such look as heaven knows, perhaps, but earth sees it nowhere save in an adoring mother's eyes.

And this look—the look of inexpressible tenderness and yearning that a mother bestows upon her little one—this is the most beautiful thing in life.

It Interferes With Biz.

Now why should we mind for a crime or so,

If it interferes with biz?

Or heed if the knaves unbranded go,

If it interferes with biz?

If a briber has gold, as a briber must,

Lest slander and libel then raise their dust

Till Justice is buried and damned, we'll trust,

For it interferes with biz.

If a traitor would sell his country and God,

Don't interfere with biz,

But think of his wealth and airy nod,

Lest you interfere with biz.

Let the low-born varlet your Justice know,

The higher-up laugh in its face—"he's hot!"

For right and its god to the deuce should go

If they interfere with biz.

Somewhere, I have heard, is a Judgment Bar

Which interferes with biz.

There weighed in one scale all mortals are,

For that is the High Court's biz,

And, brother, my brother, if right we flout,

Let wrong step in lest a dollar step out,

That High, High Court, I have scarcely a doubt

Will interfere with our biz.

The Opinions of Rufus

The earth is the Lord's an' the fullness thereof, but my faith won't 'low me to b'lieve He's much to do with sub-lettin' some parts of it.

Even a prize fighter's on the ladder of evolution, an' jest one more step up on it an' he may be a pedigreed bulldog that some folks
'll respect.

Facts can't be changed by pretty words.
You might name your cat Adelina Patti, but I'll bet the neighbors would git their guns jest the same when she sung.

I know some folks whose relegion would be a good deal improved, I should think, if they wasn't any days between Sundays.

Their salvation in a sense of humor. They say Old Nick's hardest job is makin' up his mind what to do with folks that have one.
"Drat 'em!" he says, "What is one to do with a fellow that finds somethin' to laugh at in the hottest place I've got in my conservatory?"

It's sad to do a wicked thing, but, oh, my brethren an' sisters, how much sadder it is to git ketcht at it.

I'm sick of hearin' ants called examples fer man's sake. Ef I was to pick up a house, carry it twenty-seven blocks, try to scale the Call building with it, then drop it an' go huntin' fer the Examiner building at the corner of Third an' Market, you wouldn't call me an example. You'd say I was plum crazy, an' you'd be right. But that would be like what an ant does ev'ry day.

Honesty is the best policy—until a higher court gits a whack at the case on appeal.
After that it don't matter so much.

He laughs best who laughs first, fer heeily appreciates the joke. 'Bout half the other chumps laugh 'cause they saw somebody else doing so.

How the Martians Caught On.

Professor W. H. Pickering of Harvard says that men soon may communicate with Mars by means of flashes from gigantic mirrors.

The Martians saw the flashes,

But they couldn't read their light,

For it's one thing to see flashes,

Quite another to read them right,

But a sentence was deciphered,

To the Martians' joyful yell,

And the tale of how they did it

Is the story that I tell.

The mighty Earth astronomer

A charming wife had

Who often sent a message,

For she made it quite a fad,

And all the Mars astronomers

Would think and think and think,

Then say, "Well, drat this message, for

It puts us on the blink."

For, be it here or be it there,

'Mid Earth's or Martian scenes,

No man may ever, ever know

Just what a woman means.

It chanced one day a woman came,

A Martian woman she,

Who said, "Now let me try to solve

The thing that puzzles thee."

They laughed at her, they chortled too,

They jeered at her distress;

Said they: "The thing man cannot solve

No woman e'er could guess."

But, while they scoffed, the flashes came,

She watched, with drooping head,

"She is a beauty!" the men remarked,

"Six words," was what she said.

Oh, then she stood, with flashing eye

And head erect, elate:

"Why, any fool should read those words:

"Say, is my hat on straight?"

Ah, little matters time and space;

Sho little heeds their claim;

For, here on Earth, or there on Mars,

Dear woman's just the same.

A Tariff Dialogue.

"why Congress didn't keep the proposed tariff

"Dum yew pectectionists!" said Uncle K.

the downright people. 'Dont yew know that stockin's would have gone up an' stayed

"That's jest it, that's jest it," Uncle Bildad gleefully remarked. "Then we'd hev saved the price o' garses, wouldn't we?"

Uncle Bildad chuckled, but Uncle K. Vort never smiled at all.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

Have you ever noticed the difference between the regular newsboys who sell the daily paper on the streets and the once-a-week newsboys who sell The Saturday Evening Post? It is more than a difference in clothes, though the Post boys are usually better dressed. It is a difference in manner, a difference that wins many sales for the weekly that are creditable rather to the manner of the boy than the merit of his wares. It is the difference between the amateur spirit and the professional spirit.

The newsboy has the professional attitude. His eye is keen for gain; his interest in his patron ceases instantly upon a sale; it ceases more than instantly upon the failure to make a sale. It is an attitude that breeds an air of restlessness, alertness, shrewdness, and a professional indifference to the personal element of vending.

The weekly salesboy's manner is wholly different. A sale is more than a business transaction; it is an act calling for an expression of appreciation. The boy rarely omits a "Thank you" in return for your nickel. His manner is that of a schoolboy working for the success of a school entertainment to raise funds for the gymnasium; it is personal, friendly, half in the spirit of a novel adventure. It is the manner and the point of view of the amateur.

And the amateur spirit never loses its appealing quality. It draws bigger crowds, of better disposition toward the performance at more money for less return than any professional effort can. A college football game will attract more people than a deciding game of a championship series of the national baseball league. Perhaps the amateur spirit calls to man's joy in youth, freedom, irresponsibility—primal passions of primitive origin that still surge in the blood.

The writer climbs frequently to a favored spot near the Presidio, far up on the heights overlooking the bay, where one may see the Golden Gate, Tamalpais, all the bay around to Alcatraz and across to the blue hills beyond Angel Island. Wealthy folk have homes here overlooking all these beauties, but a few vacant lots remain where we less favored ones may stand an hour and look. And we note that the least favored ones come oftenest here. The freemen make a point of exercising their horses on the street that leads here, and slow them to a walk to gaze with those of us who are afoot. The carriages of the rich roll past us, the well-dressed within them chattering, heedless of the wonders that we see, but the cabmen all turn on the box to look. And of those who come oftenest afoot, the out-at-heels or plainly clad are the majority. The love of natural beauty, one would think, is commonest among the poor.

Speaking of the Presidio, any one who wants fresh inspiration of his love of country should be on the parade-ground near sunset of Thursdays, to see "retreat," and watch the soldiers on the side-lines doff their hats as the colors pass, and to feel the thrill of pride that answers to the sunset gun when Old Glory flutters from its staff and the band plays "The Star-Spangled Banner." Not all forms and ceremonies are empty show: the human heart responds to certain things that awaken the imagination to the glory of the past; and "retreat" subtly and powerfully links the mind with the long roll-call of mighty men and deeds that made our country great.

THE SABBATH.

By Henry Vaughan.

[Henry Vaughan was born in Wales in 1621, and therefore called "the Sibrarian"; he was active as a physician and poet in England and was also known for certain religious writings. He died April 23, 1693. His biography was written by a kindred poet-spirit, Henry Francis Lyte.]

Bright shadows of true rest, some shoots of bliss;

Heaven once a week;

The next world's gladness preposset in this;

A day to seek;

Eternity in time, the steps by which
We climb above all ages; lamps that light
Man through his heap of dark days and the rich
And full redemption of the whole week's night!

The pulleys unto headlong man; time's bower,
The narrow way;

Transplanted paradise; God's walking home;

The cool o' the day!

The creature's jubilee; God's parle with dust;
Heaven here; man on those hills of myrrh and flow'ers;

Angels descending; the returns of trust;
A gleam of glory after six days showers.

THE BIBLE IN SCOTCH.

The Rev. William Wye Smith, of St. Catharines, Ontario, Canada, has rendered the New Testament into the broad Scotch dialect, and his version has found immediate favor with many an old Calvinist. His reason for the translation is:

"Whiles thar has been a chance o' makin the meanin plainer; whiles a Scots phrase o' uncommonness or wondrous pith could come in. And at a' times, ahint the pen that was movin, was a puir but leal Scots heart, fu' o' prayer that this small effort micht be accepted o' the dear Maister—and, survivin' a' the misca'in o' the pernickety and the fashionable—micht bring the memory o' a worthy tongue, and the better knowledge o' a Blessed Saviour, to this ane and that ane, as they micht chance to read it."

SEA KINGS.

The sea foam made us,
The sea wind weighed us,
And found us true and sturdy, so she tossed us to the waves.

The long swell swung us,
The spirit it thrung us
Across the marching breakers, as they sang their battle staves.

The mermaids sought us
And wisely taught us
The roadways of the ocean that the starry heavens show.

The moon hung o'er us
And set before us
The great law of the waters, how the tideways
ebb and flow.

The sea birds knew us
And wheeling threw us
A softly dappled feather for the wings upon our helm.

The deep sea called us,
The ships installed us,
And we followed, followed boldly, and the wide world was our realm!

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

San Francisco Party Factions The approaching municipal election in San Francisco is causing attention to focus on the factional differences that have severed every one of the parties in local affairs. These divisions are all from the same source: boss rule in the party. The "regulars" are those to whom it is natural to "take program" that is devised in the boss's office and then "passed down the line." The other faction is composed of the men who resent boss rule, and stand out for democratic methods of determining policies and selecting candidates by free discussion and majority vote. Naturally the regulars have certain strategic advantages: they act in mass under one man's orders, and their leaders have all the strength that comes from the ability to deliver the mass en bloc. The democratic faction, from its very nature, tends to wide divergence of ideas and lack of unity in action. However, when the insurgents do unite on a policy that appeals to the conscience of the majority of its individual members, they have the advantage of a clearer vision and more intelligent purpose than the herded vote of the regulars.

The Split of Republicans The factions of the Republican party in San Francisco are the regulars and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. The regular wing is largely controlled by John C. Lynch, the former United States collector of internal revenue. Lynch learned practical politics in San Bernardino county, from which he went to the state legislature. At Sacramento he trained consistently with the machine, and was rewarded by various political positions secured through machine influences. He resigned the collectorship to practice professional politics in San Francisco under the tutelage of the same influences. His chief lieutenant is Timothy Sullivan, whose principal business is politics, with an electrical business as a sideline. Sullivan is the local boss of the Thirty-ninth Assembly District, which is in San Francisco. He is also a member of the Republican county committee.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is active in San Francisco politics as the demagogue, and reform branch of the Republican party. It includes such men as Rolla V. Watt, Rudolph Spreckels, Byron Mauzy, C. H. Bentley, and Supervisor C. A. Murdock. The League failed to defeat the organization at the last campaign in San Francisco, but its success was sufficient to justify its activities. Readers of this paper are familiar with the profound effect that the League had upon the character of the last legislature.

The Gavin McNabocrats The regulars in the Democratic party in San Francisco are led and delivered by Gavin McNab, the former boss of the state Democracy. McNab's control of the state organization was wrested from him by Theodore A. Bell, but he has retained his power in city politics. His faction of the Democratic party is legally recognized as being the Democratic party in San Francisco. It is informally recognized as being of the machine type, boss-managed, and never out of rapport with the Southern Pacific political bureau.

Independent Democrats The anti-machine Democrats are organized into the San Francisco Democratic Club, which includes in its membership Walter MacArthur, the editor of the "Sevens" Journal and a leader of the conservative union labor people; Matt I. Sullivan, of the League of Justice; ex-Superior Judge Jerry Sullivan, Matt Sullivan's brother; Harry Sullivan, son of Jerry Sullivan; R. P. Troy, and Jerry Mahoney. The Democratic Club has failed times past to oust McNab from control of the party machinery, but the club's strength is recognized as a potent factor in any possible coalition of reform forces to back, for instance, the graft prosecution.

The Labor "Bloc" and Independents The union labor people in San Francisco are divided in their union allegiance between the San Francisco Labor Council and the Building Trades Council. Some years ago the unions engaged in the building trades quarreled with their brother unionists in the American Federation of Labor and withdrew from the Federation, forming a separate organization. Of late years, while they have retained their organization as distinct from the other unions, they have again affiliated with the American Federation. The Labor Council represents all the unions besides those engaged in the building trades, and is, in spirit at least, more closely representative of the American Federation. The Labor Council and the Building Trades Council are quite distinct in San Francisco, and trades unionists diverge politically at about the same point where they diverge as unionists.

McCarthy vs. P. H. McCarthy is the president of the Building Trades Council, and is the political leader of its membership. The Building Trades Council is of the "regular" type, politically, and McCarthy's political control is not contested. His organization is very compact, so that, while the membership of the Building Trades Council is considerably less than that of the San Francisco Labor Council, it is more nearly a political unit and its power in the Labor Party in San Francisco is correspondingly great.

The Other Labor Leaders The secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council is Andrew J. Gallagher. He, and John J. Kelly, president of the council, are political leaders of great influence. Michael Casey, formerly president, and still a member of the Board of Public Works, is, after McCarthy, probably the leader of the strongest labor faction. Andrew Furuseth, of the Water-Front Federation, is leader of a conservative minority faction. The chief rivalry, however, is between McCarthy and Casey, and one of the most significant facts of the hour is the probability that they have settled their differences for the present and will unite all the labor factions upon one ticket to be supported unanimously by labor at the next election.

The Gubernatorial Bee In the Gillett Bonnet To his personal friends in San Francisco and elsewhere

Governor Gillett has said that he is not a candidate for re-election, and no doubt he thinks so, at least sometimes; but when was there ever a governor of California who did not shape his policy with a view of realizing that remote possibility, or, as some politicians say, impossibility, of succeeding himself? Governor Gillett, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding, is hoping to be struck by that kind of lightning which has not struck any governor since old John Bigler, more than half a century ago. To be elected in 1910 is the one supreme ambition of a California governor, all the more cherished because realization is so difficult, and though the sensible governor will strive to put the darling wish out of his mind, it will always come back to tantalize and bedevil him. You can depend upon it that Governor Gillett now and then wakes up in the night and wonders whether there really is a chance. He may decide there is none, and so turn over and resolve to go to sleep thinking about a future law practice in San Francisco, but the spectre of his ambition refuses to be away at such bidding.

The Gage Lesson Not to Be Repeated While the politicians, who are not the sort of men who are looking for miracles to happen, do not give much importance to the second-term proposition, they are inclined to think the governor, as an outcome of the last legislative winter, has improved his position before the people and is now more popular than he has been before since his election. He has been fortunate in not having put up to him for approval many measures in which the railroad organization has interests strongly adverse to the public interests, and by disapproving some bad bills, such as the Johnson change of venue bill, he has scored several credits. It is quite possible that the bonds of the alliance between the governor and the organization have been considerably loosened, and one reason may be that the governor has a shrewd suspicion that the organization, after having once made him governor, does not care to undertake the task a second time, seeing how near it came to failure on the first occasion. It is true that the organization nearly broke itself to pieces in trying to renominate Governor Gage, but he had rendered such services to the railroad that it could not in ordinary decency decline to make an effort which was recognized from the first as being a forlorn hope, if not absolutely hopeless. Mr. Harrin will not do for Gillett what he attempted to do for Gage. Instead, he will look around for some other plausible man with whom to fool the voters—some man who looks like an independent citizen but who can be easily "reached."

His Instincts Right, When Governor Associations Unfortunate Gillett appointed three new Superior judges for Los Angeles the general verdict upon his selections was that they appeared to be intended to pay the political debts of Walter Parker, or somebody else belonging to the organization, rather than to improve the character of the bench. But when William S. Wells was appointed to the new judgeship in Alameda county it was regarded as a creditable selection. So, too, the appointments of Judge Sturtevant in San Francisco, made a year or more since, and Judge Wood of Amador county were unobjectionable. Governor Gillett is a lawyer, who has stood well in his profession, and if organization politics did not interfere now and then his judicial appointments would be uniformly good. But when the governor named M. C. Chapman, a criminal lawyer, whose politics are much the same as the kind of law he practices, to be a director of the Institution for the Deaf and Blind, he did about as bad as he could have done.

"Surely you must know what my constant visits here mean," said the young politician, who was about to propose. "Not at all," she replied, "as you are a politician, I naturally supposed they were 'entirely without significance'."

MEN WHO DO THINGS

EDWIN T. EARL

What Rudolph Spreckels is and has been to San Francisco Edwin T. Earl is and has been to Los Angeles. Both are standing for right things and standing hard.

Edwin T. Earl is built from the ground up. He is a self-made man financially and in every other way. He has a keenness of mind that pierces through all subtleties and a resolution that gives unshaken nerve energy to whatever he undertakes.

He is also blessed with a breadth of mind that gives him an interest beyond his financial investments and beyond his mere duties as a citizen of the city of his choice. For instance, and excited the cupidty, of the Armours with the result that they finally bought out his business and he retired. Among the evidences of wealth and credit turned over to him in payment for his fruit handling business was the Los Angeles Express, very much of an elephant if not always spotlessly a white elephant. It was a money loser. It had not had a moral purpose and its influence in Southern California affairs might easily have been over estimated. Mr. Earl had no particular liking for journalism, but the paper was on his hands and its success became a matter of pride with him.

EDWIN T. EARL.

he is founder of the Earl Lectureship at Berkeley, the interest on the foundation fund bringing to our coast, yearly, one of the most thoughtful men of the world of ethics and religion that he may deliver a course of stimulating and edifying addresses. This year Ambassador James Bryce was the lecturer and he left behind him influences for good that will long survive either the Ambassador himself or the founder of the lecture course.

Mr. Earl made his fortune in marketing California fruit products. He organized and put in operation a commercial mechanism for picking, icing, shipping across the semi-arid West and distributing over the East the fresh fruits of California so perfect that there were few communities east of the Rocky Mountains that he did not reach, few jaded appetites for fruit that he did not quicken into a keen relish and few would-be consumers that he did not find means to supply.

His success in this activity attracted the at-

Up to that time no sort of opposition to General Otis and the Los Angeles Times had been able to command a hearing or a livelihood. The Times charged so low a rate for advertising per thousand of circulation that no other paper, held down to the same per thousand rate, could, with its smaller circulation, earn enough to keep it alive. Mr. Earl soon saw the logic of the situation. He surrounded himself with a lot of bright men, got out a corking good paper, put the street sale price down to one cent, and—lost money hand over fist; but the Express got a subscription list that enabled it to do business on a pro rata per thousand circulation rate against the Times, and now the paper is a money-maker, plenty able to give the Times a Rowland for its Oliver any day in the week, except Sunday, for it is only a six-day paper.

But it was not merely the making of a good paper of the Los Angeles Express that made the Express a success and its owner a power in Los Angeles and Southern California. The thing which, more than any other, made it and its owner was the willingness of the owner to take the unpopular side of a hopeless cause,

A RATIONAL WAY TO TEMPERANCE

By ANDREA SEABORO.

Our country is at the present time afflicted with two great evils; one is drunkenness and the other is prohibition. Unless some rational, fair way be found by which these two great evils may both be removed from our midst, we are in danger of drifting into another civil war.

In a recent number, the California Weekly, in calling attention to this grave question, very sensibly said, "Nevertheless, those who place themselves in opposition both to the saloon and to prohibition are under obligation to point to a better way of dealing with the condition that does not yield to theory. . . . In order to be entertained, suggestions must possess the grace of common sense, must advance a workable plan, a plan that can be made to appeal to men of average intelligence and it must not leave human nature out of consideration. The subject is before the house. What is your pleasure, gentlemen?"

Mr. Editor, with your permission I am going to try to solve this grave problem in a fair, rational, sensible and practical manner.

The evil of drunkenness is sometimes fostered by unscrupulous saloon keepers, some of whom run their places of business against the law and against decency, and partly by foolish persons who have given up their appetite. On the other hand, prohibition is frequently fomented by equally unscrupulous leaders who work under the cloak of the Christian religion and prayer, aided in many cases by a designing class of politicians who hope to float into office on top of the wave of prohibition.

These merciless people would trample under their feet the sacred personal rights of the free American citizen and ruin without any scruples of conscience or Christian charity, thousands employed in the ultimate work of winning the soil for the production of grain, hops and grapes by which to earn an honest living for themselves and families.

A Mild Stimulant Human Necessity.

Man is so constituted that he requires some stimulant to assist his digestion and invigorate his system. Beverages containing alcohol have been used by all people from time immemorial, and will continue to be used, notwithstanding all the laws which can be made against them by man, until the end of time.

Drunkenness has also existed, more or less, for many centuries, but the real drunkenness which causes so much misery to mankind is a comparatively modern evil, and we know that in some countries it exists to excess, whilst in others it is almost unknown.

A few months ago I traversed Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Germany, France and Spain, where every man, woman and child uses light wine at their meals and I saw practically no intoxication. When I reached England, one of the first items I read in the London Times was that, during the year, two hundred and seventy thousand persons were arrested for drunkenness in that country, nearly half of whom were women.

Light Wines the Solution.

Here then have the true solution of the great problem before us. Educate the American people to the use of light wines in moderation at their table and they will soon become as sober as are the residents of France, Italy and Spain.

This can be done gradually without destroying any property or throwing thousands of families on the charity of the world. It appears that the people who use wine at their table have no desire to imbibe any stronger intoxicating beverage between their meals. Thus the ill-conducted, undesirable saloon will gradually lose its business, the proprietors, instead of being ruthlessly closed up, will have time to reform or find another occupation, probably become engaged in the production and distribution of the health-giving, non-intoxicating wine instead of the strong, intoxicating liquor and, in this way, the sacred rights of the American people will not be interfered with.

The proprietors of decent saloons themselves desire that they should be strictly regulated, and that no one be permitted to sell alcoholic beverages to minors or to persons who are nearing the point of intoxication, under penalty, for the first offense, of having their licenses removed for thirty days and, on conviction for the second offense, that the license be permanently revoked.

Penalize Drunkenness.

I hold that it is unreasonable under any circumstances to punish the innocent for the guilty. Why deprive millions of people who enjoy a stimulant before their meals because a few hundred depraved men lose control of themselves and drink to such excess as to become drunkards? If the minister who preaches prohibition really desires to remove the curse of drunkenness, let him advocate the reformation of the drunkard by reasonable punishment, as is done in the suppression of other transgressions of the law. Let the drunkard be condemned for the first offense to thirty days in jail; and for the second offense, sixty days, and for every offense thereafter, add thirty additional days. In order that the honest man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow should not pay a part of his earnings to sustain a drunken sot idly in jail, let him be made to work on cleaning the streets in the city and repairing the roads in the country; and if the culprit has a family, let the community support the wife and children with the earnings of the drunkard's labor. In this way, I confidently believe that wherever it is vigorously carried out, in six months there will not be a drunkard. The former drunkard would be reformed. He would become either a good sober husband and father with his family or be working on the streets for the community which he had offended.

I have said above that in the wine-drinking countries of the world, where every man, woman and child uses wine at their meals, intoxication is almost unknown. To forcibly impress upon the American people the truth of this assertion, during my recent visit to Europe, I made it my business to call upon the American Ambassador at Rome, Italy, and the United States consuls of the principal cities of the wine-producing countries, from whom I obtained official letters, showing the conditions that prevail there and proving that there is a remedy for the removal of drunkenness if we will only follow the example of such enlightened countries as Italy and France. Fearing that you may not have space to publish these letters in full, I am quoting significant extracts from a few of the most striking letters addressed to me.

Testimony of Americans Abroad.

The Hon. Lloyd C. Griscom, our American Ambassador at Rome, writes: "I have pleasure in stating that during my residence in Italy I have seen very few cases of drunkenness. The people as a whole are accustomed to drink wine at their meals, which prevents them from having a craving for stronger intoxicants."

Our American Consul at Naples, Hon. C. S. Crowninshield, says: "In this great city of 600,000 inhabitants no saloon sees a person the worse for drink. Wine is taken freely among all classes; most workmen drink from a pint to a quart every day, but there is almost no use of strong liquor. I have lived nearly eight years in Italy, and have seen very few drunken men during that time."

The Hon. James E. Dunning, our Consul at Milan, did not hesitate to give similar testimony. He writes: "In the four years that I have been stationed here, I have seen but two cases of intoxication in the streets of Milan; both of these were on holidays, and in each case exhibited anything more than a slightly accentuated good nature. It would be entirely within my conception of the truth to say that drunkenness is unknown in Milan."

The Hon. James A. Smith, Consul General, who ranks after the American Ambassador, and is from Vermont, the state in which some cities do not allow wine or liquor to be sold, says, under a doctor's prescription by the drug stores, says: "I do not hesitate to say that a ten years' experience in this country, and a careful observation of the people, have convinced me that drunkenness is exceedingly rare. So much so is this the case that I do not remember to have seen a dozen Italians who were obviously intoxicated during all the time I have lived in Italy. This condition prevails in spite of the fact that the very large majority of the Italians habitually drink the light wines of the country at their meals. Accustomed to wine from very early childhood, the Italians use it moderately as a mildly stimulating beverage. So used I cannot discover that it produces harmful results."

The Hon. William Henry Bishop, our American Consul at Palermo, a fine old gentleman of long experience in the consular service who has the reputation of weighing every word he says or writes, remarks: "The use of native wines would seem to fill the needs felt by many for light stimulating, or fortifying beverage, and in Sicily, while the people do doubt have their faults, it is a pleasure to witness their general temperate habits. Even the usual place where drinks are publicly sold is most often a pasticceria, cake-shop or a pleasant cafe, which the most respectable persons, including ladies and children, may freely enter. There are no screens put up; there is no concealment of the interior or the inmates, for nothing takes place there requiring concealment. The drinking saloon in an offensive sense can hardly be said to exist at all."

Wine the Universal Drink.

Our American Consul at Florence, Hon. Jerome H. Quirk, writes: "Wine is almost universally used by all classes. At the Gambrius, a popular cafe, hundreds gather in the evening, men, women and children, drink the light wines and beer of the country, and spend the evening in a pleasant manner and without disorder; and many of the lunch baskets prepared for little children attending school are provided with a small flask of wine." This city has given to the world more great men than any other city on the face of the globe.

Our American Consul, the Hon. Carl W. Schmidt, in a letter from Kohl, Baden, says: "The wine flask is quite as familiar a feature of the table in Alsace-Lorraine as the water bottle is in the United States. . . . At hotels and boarding houses half a pint of wine is usually supplied without any extra charge. In the cafes and restaurants between meals in the evening, wine is constantly drunk, costing only nineteen cents a quart. It is a matter of common knowledge that the people of Alsace-Lorraine are a careful, industrious and particularly sober community. The spectacle of a person overcome by liquor is so unusual as to excite amusement."

In Spain the conditions are practically the same, according to the Hon. R. M. Bartlemann, our American Consul at Madrid, who writes: "The drinking of wine here at meals is universal, and, like France and Italy, there is practically no drunkenness."

The Hon. Solomon Berliner, our American Consul at Teneriffe, Canary Islands, writes: "During my nine years here I have not seen more than a dozen under the influence of wine or liquor. . . . All saloons, cafes, restaurants and hotels are open Sunday and every other day; other business is prohibited on Sundays. . . . In this country, on account of the food not having enough substance, and the greater part of the inhabitants being 'ametics,' the doctors recommend wine to be taken with all meals, more especially foreigners. The children receive wine with their food. Of course, this mixed with water according to the age of the children."

Thomas Jefferson's Belief In Wine.

The beneficial use of wine as a temperance beverage is not only emphasized by these disinterested United States Consuls living in the great wine-producing and wine-consuming countries, but there are many other Americans who believe that if wine were universally drunk in the United States, the evil of drunkenness would promptly disappear. George Washington, the father of our country, always had his cellar stocked with wine. Thomas Jefferson, who had been Minister to France and had observed the salutary effect of wine, in one of his addresses to Congress, said: "I rejoice as a moralist at the prospect of a reduction of duties on wine by our national legislature. It is an error to view a tax on that article as merely a tax on the rich. It is the prohibition of its use on the middle classes, and a condemnation to them of the poison of spirits. No nation is drunken where wine is cheap, and none sober where dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as its common beverage."

The Rev. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, the well-known reformer, who has studied the question carefully, says: "Judging from what I see in this country, and from what I know of conditions of things in Europe, which I have visited twenty-five times, I am decidedly of the opinion that the more wine is produced in this country and the more freely it is transported from state to state, the less whisky will be used, and the smaller the amount of drunkenness."

The Hon. W. W. Morrow, Judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, is also of the opinion that the use of wine at table should be encouraged. "Wine may, of course, be had in the saloon, but it is not the cause of the intemperance," he writes, "and is not the attraction that makes the saloon the rendezvous of vice. The use of light table wines at meals has been found by long experience to promote health and sobriety and prevent ill health and drunkenness."

Regrets Abolition of Canteen.

Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans, who has just been visiting San Francisco, has always been a strong advocate for the canteen for both the army and navy, and, according to a letter received from his secretary while he was convalescing at Paso Robles, The Admiral feels certain that there would be less drunkenness in both services if the men were allowed their ration as of old.

To come nearer home, let me quote the words of Dr. Martin Regensburger, President of the Board of Health of California. He says: "If the people of our country were educated from boyhood up to drink wine, alcoholism would be a rare disease, as has been proven in the wine drinking countries. It is the forbidden fruit that tempts. In my experience, in families where the wine flows freely, drunkards are the exception, whereas many of the offspring of teetotalers and wine abhorers who have not tasted alcoholies until they almost have grown to be men become drunkards."

William Gladstone, England's great Chancellor, reduced the duty upon light French wine for the purpose of encouraging the English people to drink this mild beverage in preference to strong intoxicating liquors. But the reduction was not sufficient to permit the great masses to use wine at their meals and as grapes can be grown only in hot houses in England, the solution of their great liquor problem is going to be very much more difficult than in the United States.

Contrast of England and Continent.

This thought was impressed upon my mind forcibly while I was crossing the English Channel. On one side I could see from the decks of the steamer the wine growing countries containing over two hundred million inhabitants (all wine consumers) where drunkenness is practically unknown, and on the other side the non-wine drinking countries of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales where, with a population of only 34,000,000, there were 270,000 persons arrested for drunkenness in one year, 120,000 of whom were women. I am sorry to say. Which is our country going to represent after such an example? A wine drinking country or a non-wine drinking country?

The American people are quick to adopt every novel innovation that will contribute to their health, happiness and prosperity. If a physician in Rome, London, Paris or Berlin discovers a new medical remedy, it is immediately introduced by our medical men; if some new servicable machinery is invented in Eu-

IT was remarkable how, regularly for ten straight years, and until the hand of death began to lay heavily upon the charter membership, the little group of founders of the Galoot Club came together every Thursday evening in the whist room. The rain never descended in such torrents, the fog never rolled in so thick, and the wind never blew so hard as to keep them away, and it was a point of honor with all of them to permit no personal engagements to interfere with that appointment. Their passion was not for whist, but for each other's society. They were good men and true and over that card table, with the pasteboards face down for an hour at a time, were formulated policies relating to the public good that seldom failed of fulfillment, albeit they were conservative policies and took on none of the attributes of promotion and boom. They held the community steadfast in sober courses of action with the result that, though taxes were kept low, the citizens received a dollar of value for every dollar of taxes paid. What a little group of determined, capable men can do to make a community better or worse is beyond calculation. The relation of their personal romances took place only when nothing more important came up for consideration.

"Doctor," demanded the Professor late one evening, when other matters had been disposed of, "you once said that you had told your wife all about all of your little romances save one. That of course was saved for us. Let's have it to-night."

Well, if you say so, I suppose I must, but it has ever been far from my intention to tell it to any one except my wife, and that only on the Day of Judgment, when I throw myself upon his mercy.

I had lately come out from the East and settled in a small town in the Middle West. There are a thousand just such towns scattered through the great Mississippi valley, so the name of the place does not much matter. I had received as good a medical education as the schools of those days could give, had seen hospital practice and was, if anything, more in love with my profession than with the girl who had left behind me. My bent was for interior medicines rather than for surgery and I looked forward to establishing a good family practice. My means were limited. It was hard scratching, but I kept up appearances and kept out of debt.

The strong man of the community was the banker, who also owned the principal general store, and a number of farms and held mortgages on a lot more. His only children were a spoiled son and a beautiful, robust, what you would call buxom, daughter, just home from school, and the undisputed belle of the community. There was not an ambitious young man in the county who did not cherish at least some hope of winning her favor, and she was the life of the social community. I had met her, but had not run after her, having no anchor to which I could attach my feet. If I had felt myself free it might have been different.

The town had no sewerage system as yet and earth closets were obvious adjuncts to every home. There had been a few cases of typhoid in the town, but none of them had fallen to my care and only a few of them had survived the treatment of the other physicians. Perhaps it was a fly that came through the window, having been spawned in the vault of an outhouse, that had rested an instant on a strawberry as Florence raised it to her mouth. I have seen as much in a dream. Anyhow that robust girl was taken down with typhoid.

I was sent for. She would have it so, and insisted that the calomel, quinine, morphia and whisky, which the old fashioned physician was sure to prescribe, could do her no good and she loved life too well to trust herself to him. The father protested, the mother scolded, the brother made fun of her, but they all yielded because she always had her own way anyhow and because she was so desperately anxious about her and wisely felt that lack of confidence in her physician might tell against her in the coming struggle.

I went. The diagnosis had been accurate enough and the type of fever was virulent that year. The whole community was profoundly concerned. On every person's lips, night and morning, was the query: "How's Florence getting along?" I was told a hundred times that my future was made if I saved her and lost if I didn't, which so angered me that I could scarcely treat people civilly. It was not of my future, but of hers, I was thinking. She was too full of vigorous, pulsating life to make it tolerable to think of her dying.

And yet I was not thinking of her future either, at least not beyond being resolved that she should have a future if care and nursing could accomplish it. To my mind her body was a laboratory in which some strikingly interesting phenomena were being worked out under my observation. The rest of my practice went by the boards. There were no trained nurses in those days, so I was nurse and physician, too. I fought for her life inch by inch. I invented contrivances of my own for unsmothering her in a labyrinth of small rubber hose through which went a steady stream of cold water to keep the temperature down. When, after months of struggle, she began to move about and paralysis still kept its blight upon her, I massaged her limbs from hip to the tips of her dainty toes as I would have she been a man and so worked the stiffened members back into suppleness and elasticity.

With what absolute abandon did this buoyant, wilful, headstrong girl submit herself to my ministrations! I can see her great, confident, antelope eyes looking at me now in such utter confidence as only an infant is expected to repose in its mother. She wasted to a skeleton and I carried her in my arms as I might have carried a child, and yet, in health, she was taller than most women and well proportioned without being stout. It was half a year before she was herself again.

When her father handed me a check for a thousand dollars I tore it into fragments and blew the bits into the wind before his face. "Money cannot pay for that kind of service," I said, "besides, she has taught me how to deal with typhoid," and I turned on my heel and walked away. He then made sure that I would claim the life I had saved, and the whole community was of the same opinion. No thought had been farther from my mind. To me she had been only a remarkably interesting case for my hands, which I had needed to try my skill to its fullest. To her I had been her savior to a life she loved, loved passionately, with a love wholly of this world, and she had grown to love me as she loved her life.

No one not in the practice of medicine, or the profession of the ministry, knows the temptation that women constantly throw at the feet of physicians and clergymen. I have wished a thousand times that Protestants might have confessionals where morbid women might unburden themselves to the relief of these two burden bearing professions. Many a physician is paid round fees for no other service than that of making love to women who are not ill and whose only malady is that of a lack of some sort in their marital relations. They never tell us the truth, but they seem to feel better after they have unconsumed a lot of falsehood to us, and their husbands promptly pay the bills. Nothing makes me sicker than that, and the reputation I have acquired of being cold and unfeeling is due to nothing else so much as my refusal to stomach such doses.

But whatever the state of my own mind was I could not blind myself to the state of hers. My practice increased by leaps and bounds and gave me more to do than I could well handle. I went into society little, only occasionally with her, and my mind was absorbed in my practice. Had I been free it might have been different. I felt as much then but my troth had been plighted and, honorable man that I was, I felt that it must needs be unshaken. I would have despised anyone who, without good cause, had broken an engagement, as heartily as one who had been false to marriage vows. I told Florence of my engagement, thinking that that would put out of her heart whatever might be in it, but the only result was that she hated the woman she had not seen and resolved to get me away from her at every hazard.

I shall not forget her fine outburst of scorn when I showed her the photograph of my wife. "There," she exclaimed, "she is!" "There are twenty such in every town, comely, likable, too inert to be disagreeable, a model wife for an ordinary matter-of-fact man, cherishing no ideals and content to replenish a stupid world with stupid progeny. You are not an ordinary man, you are a man of a thousand, one out of many thousands, and if you were to marry a woman your equal in intelligence and aspirations, you would give the world a family that would be factors in the world. There are enough human tabbagages and cauliflower heads to go around, but I can do better by you and by those that are to bear your name than that woman can and for you to prefer her to me merely because you met her first, is a sin and a shame."

How her eyes flashed, and her breast heaved as she spoke. Her blunt frankness stunned me, and yet stirred a spirit of resentment within me, and I snatched the photograph from her and walked away.

I was now abundantly able to build a home, go back to the city and marry and settle down, but I did not dare to bring my wife to that town while Florence remained in that frame of mind. I could see that Florence was desperate and I did not know what she might or might not undertake to do. I pitied her from the bottom of my heart, but she seemed so selfish in her desire to possess me that my soul revolted at the love she proffered without the smallest advance having been consciously made on my part. She not only asked but implored me to make her my wife. She freely declared that the other two should never take such liberties with her person as I had taken as her physician and nurse and that if I did not marry her she would live single until she died. I pool-poohed the idea but she remained unshaken in it.

I was at my wits' end to know what to do. I had the cream of the practice of the town and county. The fondest hopes I had dared to entertain had been realized and more than realized, if only this infatuation of Florence for me, for I could not regard it as anything more, were not for the fact that she loved me and hers, not to speak of the happiness of the woman who had promised to be my wife. I set myself to the task of treating her mind as I had treated her body, but to less purpose. Though we had long walked and talked together I could not make her see the unreasonableness and injustice of her point of view. She went right on holding up to me the plans she had made for our future. Her father would give us half his fortune if we needed it and we could remove to the principal city of the state and there I could set up my office. She would buy a fine home, go into society and fetch to my offices the cream of the practice. She opened out before me a vista of honor, reputation, and a broadened sphere of usefulness that, under other circumstances, I might have proven alluring, but while I pitied her from the bottom of my heart my own resolution remained as unshaken as hers.

It was after such a walk and talk one evening that a boy brought me a note from Florence. "My love for you is so terrific that it verges on hate. At this moment I feel as though I never want to see your face again." She has not. Worn out with overwork and worry about Florence I had sent for an old classmate of mine, who had determined to make a change of location, to come and take care of my practice while I went to Europe for a rest and half a year of special study. He came that night and I left on the night train East. He has my practice still. On my return from Europe I married the girl to whom my troth was plighted and we came here and have been here ever since. I have not dared to return East even for a visit.

Through my former classmate I have kept track of Florence. She remained single as she declared that she would. She went into her father's office, mastered his business to the minutest details and is reputed to be the best business woman in his state. She lives in the old house alone, carries on the business left by her father and turns over the greater part of the profits to her renegade brother and his spendthrift family to squander in giddy gadding about the world, while she slaves like a hired hand, virtually a woman Shylock.

And now comes the strangest part of it all. The blight of her life rests like a mountain on my spirit. I love her. I love her as she loved me. My heart did not go out to her until more than a year after I had married my wife. It spread through me like an infection. I never go to sleep without looking again into those antelope eyes that looked into my own so trustingly while she and I fought for her life. I never look into the face of my wife without hearing Florence's voice declaring that "there are twenty such in every town," and knowing that it is true. I never look into the face of one of my children without seeing the brand of mediocrity burned into the tissue, and I think of what a wife and what children we should have had if I had married Florence. If ever marriages are made in heaven then the soul of Florence and my soul were mated together forever, and somewhere, some time, they will enter into their own.

As I have said, had I been free, my love for Florence would have found itself sooner, but my faith was plighted, my honor was involved. I kept the faith with the result that I have lived a lie for thirty years and must go on living it to the end in spite of the fact that there is not a man in which I do not long to go and throw myself at the feet of Florence and beg her forgiveness for my not being the scoundrel she wanted me to become. I stood steadfast then. I am standing steadfast now. Did I do right then? Am I doing right now? I blame Florence because her love was utterly selfish. Is there any other kind that is worth while? I have hurled those questions at my God ten thousand times and I shall do it again at the last day, for I want to know if I did right or wrong and no one else but God himself can tell me to my satisfaction.

"You are too deep for me, Doc," declared the newspaper man.

"A highly important contribution to the working out of my matrimonial philosophy," remarked the Professor.

ORIGINALS OF WHITAKER'S CHARACTERS.

Herman Whitaker, whose novel, "The Planter," a story of the Tehuantepec rubber plantations, has just been published by the Harpers, tells many an interesting story of his tropical experiences. It seems that one Gaudaloupe, the mandator on one plantation at which Mr. Whitaker stayed, was somewhat of a character, and the novelist informed him that he was to be one of the characters in his story. "He never failed to question me each day as to the things I had done in the story," says Mr. Whitaker. "When, one morning, I informed him that I had killed him off, he expressed great surprise.

"Porque, señor, porque?"

"Because you are a bad man, Gaudaloupe. Which was perfectly true.

"I, señor?" he questioned, greatly surprised.

"Si, Gaudaloupe, you are bad. Think of how many men you have killed according to your own count.

"He thought for a while, then looked up with a humorous smile. 'Oh, well! Did I put up a good fight?'

"You bet you did, Gaudaloupe."

"Whereupon the eyebrows and shoulders went up in a shrug. 'Bueno! Bueno! Then it ees all right.'

Senator Beveridge tells this story: An orator was addressing an assemblage of people. He recounted the people's wrongs. Then he passionately cried: "Where are America's great men? Why don't they take up the cudgel in our defense? In the face of manifold wrongs, why do they remain silent, cold, immovable?" "Because they're all cast in bronze!" shouted a cynic in the rear.—Baltimore American.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's sense of the ridiculous has always been a saving grace, leading her to avoid grandiloquence. On one occasion a lady at Newport, trying to get a fine sentiment out of her, said, one moonlit evening on a vine-hung veranda: "Mrs. Howe, do say something lovely about my piazza?" Whereupon everyone listened for the reply. In her delicately cultivated voice Mrs. Howe responded: "I think it is a bully piazza!"—New York Herald.

Automobile Notes.

During a test of a Rambler motor fire truck in Pomona, Cal., the machine carried nine men and a load of 1,500 pounds of pig iron at a speed of forty miles an hour, although the specifications called for a speed of only twenty-five miles with a load of 3,000 pounds. The men carried in the test comprised the Pomona Board of Trustees and Fire Commission. The truck is equipped with a body for carrying chemical tanks and 800 feet of water hose. It is proposed to buy a duplicate of the machine in the near future so that the first can be driven direct to a fire with the chemical apparatus, while the second stops to connect a line of hose with the fire hydrant.

Roads down the valley to the raisin city were found to be in excellent condition last week by Frank B. Dickson, Jr., of the Studebaker Bros.' company. Mr. Dickson says that persons who are contemplating attending the raisin city fete at Fresno and who have auto-

The writing of the first chapter of this year's Glidden tour was begun last Monday week when the pathfinder car, a Studebaker E-M-F '30," left Detroit, Mich.

if need be, and fight all the way to his own defeat without flinching and without being frightened half to death by a bad balance sheet at the end of the month. These things he did when he thought the public welfare demanded it with the result that the people listened when his paper talked and took its own seriously and frankly into their confidence.

Without this popular backing it may be doubted if the city government of Los Angeles could have purified itself as it recently did. Mr. Earl became confident that vice was being officially protected, in Los Angeles, and mulcted. His paper said so. It warned the public of the situation and it warned the public officers and the grand jury. The public officers and grand jury found nothing tangible, nothing that indictments could rest on, and nothing seemed likely to be done about the infamy.

Meantime those attacked began to file libel suits against the Express and its owner and these suits kept piling up until the damages claimed aggregated $650,000. They are now not so large as they were. The District Attorney and grand jury failing to understand Mr. Earl himself got busy. Those libel suits began to look big to him, too, but our law permits the truth of such charges to be proven, if proven, to be a complete defense. Mr. Earl's hunt therefore was for the truth in so tangible a way that it could be used as evidence.

Now again we have what Mr. Calhoun so deprecates—private persons mixing in public affairs. Mr. Earl put detectives on the trail of the official malefactors with the result that Chief of Police Kern resigned his office after a hint had been given of what was in store for him, Mr. Earl's desire being to shield the city from public scandal if he could clean it without scandal. Mayor Harper likewise received a hint but ignored it. A second time a hint was dropped when he was picked up if he felt so disposed and, this time, he called at the office of Mr. Earl, was confronted with the evidence obtained, resigned the mayoralty, jumped into his automobile and skipped out for the rural districts, a dishonored, broken and distracted man. He and his friends could keep still and so the story got out in all its details.

Vice had first been centralized by police compulsion in buildings controlled by the vice-dealing syndicate, and then were forced to pay the syndicate enormous rents for the building occupied.

All of which goes to show that Mr. Edwin T. Earl has a clear title to enter The California Weekly's galaxy of California men "Who Do Things That Are Worth While." He knows the value of doing as well as the next man, and does not throw them at birds; but his career since the Los Angeles Express fell into his hands shows that he knows the value of character as well as that of dollars and is capable of placing character above dollars whenever a collision of values becomes necessary. It is that particular type of man in which our state and our time stand in greatest need.

rope, our engineers are not long in using it to advantage here, if a new wider and less explosive or gun be manufactured, with which to deprive thousands of soldiers of their lives, our government immediately takes steps to secure the destructive powder or the bloody infernal machine for our army and navy; as soon as the French way of fashion is seen riding in the Bois de Boulogne in Paris with a new style of hat, presto, the mode is flashed by wire across the ocean and be that hat in the shape of a saucerpan or coal scuttle, in an incredibly short time, we see the American lady in New York, Boston, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco, displaying the identical creation!

Ever since the first pilgrims landed in the Mayflower at Plymouth Rock, we have been introducing ideas from every section of the world in the moral, social and commercial development of our country. But, unfortunately, there are some important customs which we have failed to adopt—wine drinking, for example. And yet we have proof galore that the general use of wine at meals is conducive to temperance and happiness.

American and French Restaurants.

Go into an American restaurant in San Francisco and you will find the guests devouring their food hurriedly, eating half baked bread and drinking dyspepsia-producing ice water, probably too busy with their newspaper to waste much time talking to their companion. They are serious looking men, with long faces and appearing as sanctimonious as if they were in church or at a funeral. Not a word escapes their lips unless it be to talk "shop" to their neighbor.

Then go to a French or an Italian restaurant and you will find the guests with smiles on their faces, cracking a joke or perhaps discussing the voice of the prima donna or the grace of the first danseuse at last night's opera. They all have before them well cooked and deliciously seasoned viands, with the baked bread, and invariably a bottle of red or white wine. By the hubbub in the room and their smiling faces you can see that they are all as sober as a judge and as happy as school children.

Now, Mr. Editor, you ask for a practical solution of the evil of drunkenness. My answer is, encourage the use of wine in the American home. Let every man, woman and child be taught the benefit of its adoption as a delicious, non-intoxicating beverage.

This is to encourage the grace of common sense and is a plan that ought to appeal to men of average intelligence and does not "leave human nature out of consideration." It is not an experiment, for it has been in use in the grape-growing sections of Europe from time immemorial, and as a result, drunkenness is practically unknown.

A Great Productive Industry.

Now, it has been shown that when the demand will justify, the states of California, New Mexico, Ohio, Missouri, Virginia, New Jersey, Michigan, and many other states of the Union, especially in the South and Southwest, where grapes are grown, can produce just as much wine, of as good quality, and as cheap as that now produced by the European countries. And, as the grape vine thrives along the mountains and hillides where few other products can be profitably grown, we have within our reach the power of developing a new agricultural industry which will furnish annually a revenue of $600,000,000, almost enough money to pay the ordinary expenses of running the government of the United States, and bringing millions of acres of waste land into production which will give remunerative employment to several millions of happy vineyardists, turn our mountains, now even fit for sheep ranges, into luxuriant vineyards, erect numerous wineries and thus create new towns and cities throughout the states of the Union.

Now, Mr. Editor, I think I have given you a "workable plan"—a plan that will remove the "evil of drunkenness" from our midst and save the viticultural industry the most important in our country. Let the people of the United States give it a trial and they will soon find that history will repeat itself, that the same conditions of sobriety that prevail in the wine-drinking countries of Europe will be promptly duplicated here.

American people, it is up to you!

Criminal Proceedings.

The sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Having read the above paragraph once will the reader kindly read it over again just to notice its simplicity and directness, the reasonableness of the provisions made for the protection of those falsely accused of the commission of crime? What more could such a person reasonably ask than for a speedy trial rather than rotting in jail for a year or so, or thousands in other countries have done without being tried at all; that the trial shall be public in order that all the world may know how fairly it was conducted and that no mean advantage of innocence was taken; that the jury shall be impartial—that is, disposed to judge equitably between the accused and the state; that the trial shall take place where the crime was committed, not off in some far corner of the Union; that the defendant shall be informed of the nature of the charge against him so that he can prepare himself with the needful witnesses and a proper line of defense; that the witnesses against him shall give their testimony before him openly and not sneakily behind his back; that witnesses on his own side of the case shall be forced to come to court and give their testimony and not selfishly stay away and suffer him to be punished because it was of no concern to them and, finally, in the event of the accused being too poor to hire an attorney, the public shall hire, or the court instruct, some one to aid him in the conduct of his defense? What more could reasonably be asked than these constitutional rights of the American citizen set forth in this amendment, which the people demanded for their protection? Does it not all seem very simple and direct and easily understood?

And yet the interpretation of those simple clauses has furnished opportunity for thousands of lawyers to hammer and hack at the obvious meanings of words, for judges, more learned in the subtleties of disquisition than wise in their knowledge of good and evil, to potter over the crossing of t's and dotting of i's while justice has been dragged through muck and mire at the tail end of chariots proudly driven by criminal captains of industry and past-masters of financial legerdemain. Of all departments of government there is none other that falls so far short of making good as the Department of Criminal Justice, and this is about equally true whether reference be had to national or state administration.

In some respects the sixth amendment was unfortunately drawn. It declares that the accused shall "enjoy the right," to a speedy trial, but it does not say that the government shall "enjoy the right" to force the defendant to a speedy trial, that there shall not be delays and continuances until the witnesses for the people shall have died or moved beyond the jurisdiction of the court and public interest has lost sight of public wrongs sustained. The delays of the criminal law have become a national disgrace.

And what constitutes an impartial jury? We, of San Francisco, have just seen three full months devoted to an attempt to secure the impaneling of one such jury, during which 2370 citizens were summoned into court out of which considerable army to select thirteen impartial men. Is impartiality so rare a quality that only one citizen in each 200 is capable of it, or has an artificial and technical system of jurisprudence whittled at the meanings of words until that which was once obvious to ordinary understandings is now inscrutable even to the most learned?

What of the "right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation?" It would seem that if a man were charged with murder, arson, robbery, bribery or graft it should be easy enough to so state the nature of the accusation, as fully to advise the accused of the nature of the offense of which he stands charged, but the adroitness of professional sophistry, and the attenuated discriminations of a technical judiciary, have made of the wording of indictments so fine an art that the mastery of it has been accomplished by perhaps one attorney in the thousand. Indictments are so far removed from being models of written expression as to read, to the untrained, like meaningless jargon.

This sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was designed to safeguard innocence against the power of the politically strong to oppress, and if the judiciary had held it to that sole function all would have been well; but under the guise of protecting all men in the full enjoyment of "their constitutional rights," it has come to pass that those able to avail themselves of the services of maladroit attorneys, no matter what the character of their crimes or the degree of their guilt, are able to purchase immunity from human punishment with the same certainty (if not facility) that, in a former age, criminals were able to buy churchly indulgences, at so much per, for the commission of offenses against the moral law. Unless there shall be one and the same law, and one and the same administration of that law, whether it have to deal with the rich or the poor, the humble or the great, our civilization must be written down a failure and a better form of government than the one our fathers founded must take its place. This makes the administration of justice in the United States the supreme concern of the People of the United States, and demands of them a trained and consecrated citizenship.

BROADENING.

By Charles J. Woodbury.

Mary may not have been of all
Immaculate of mothers.
May be the flash that blinded Paul
Has blinded more good brothers.
Perhaps from Patmos what John saw
Was but a passing panic
Of sea and sky disturbed by law,
A spectacle volcanic.
What if within Messiah lurked
Some flaw that found correction?
What if there were no wonders worked;
And if no resurrection?
Yet dreams and gleams as high as these Come, blessing and unsealing.
To those who seek the verities
And follow their revealing.
And Heaven is his who now on earth
Gives Heaven or tries to give it.
There is no faith of better worth;
And good believers live it.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Gathering of the Clans.

It is encouraging to note that the forces of civic righteousness, in the Republican party in San Francisco, are getting together to stand for right things in the government of this city. This paper entertains a sense of disappointment that the rallying of the clans is not to be under the Lincoln-Roosevelt banner. There are not two other names connected with modern American history that stand for so much of value to the American people as these two, and the skirmishes fought, lost and won, under that banner make a part of California history for which California has no call to be ashamed. That movement had arrayed against it every unwholesome political and corporate influence in the state and if it did not make out to whip them all it was because not all of the voters were made to understand the essential quality of the issue. Nevertheless, the name under which the task in San Francisco is to be undertaken is relatively unimportant. The important thing is the task itself. The soul of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement was the emancipation of California from corporate control. No movement that has not that for its central purpose will prove worth the powder it will burn. Corporate influence makes for bad government, bad political and commercial morals, the overthrow of popular government and the setting up in its place of government by a purse-proud, oppressive feudalism. Proof of this is to be found in the fact that there is not one Herrinized political worker, officeholder, judge on the bench, whose influence is not thrown against the graft prosecution and in favor of shielding rich rascality from punishment. The struggle for good government must be fought out on the Lincoln-Roosevelt line of action, whatever the banner carried, if it takes forty years to win the victory.

Ho! For Hetch-Hetchy.

Governor Gillett did a good deed when he signed the bill permitting the formation of a water district, composed of more than one city, and placed in that district the power of eminent domain. With an abundant supply of pure water the future of the bay cities must depend upon themselves, not upon untoward conditions over which they have no control. If the graft prosecutions result in no other good they will at least render it tolerably safe for municipalities to undertake large enterprises without fear of serious loss from grafting. Even if no malefactor of them all goes to prison not one of them, and no one like them, will wish to undergo a similar experience. If the Hetch-Hetchy water system can be developed without making millionaires of half a dozen uncommon thieves it will be a profitable enterprise to undertake. The way seems to be clear. Ho! for Hetch-Hetchy.

The Road to Eureka.

Deferred hopes never made hearts sicker than those of Eureka, Humboldt county. They have longed for a railroad to the outer world and have longed long, but it came not. It is to be hoped for their sake, and the sake of our good coast counties to the north, that President Ripley's assurance of the speedy completion of the missing railroad link will not vanish into hot air. It is a difficult section for railroad building, but in our day nothing is impossible in engineering if financing can do its part. Eureka has sent out some good human and other timber in past years. It may do still better when facilities for getting out are improved.

The Pleasures of the Populace.

It was a wise school teacher who said: "Give me control of the play of my pupils and I will guarantee control of the school." A wise supervision of the pleasures of the people of a city will make that city easily governed. New York City has just constituted a Recreation Commission, with committees to investigate and report on theaters, nickelodeons, dance halls and out-of-door recreations, not with the view of closing them up, but with the purpose of making them more attractive, wholesome and cheap, in the belief that recreation and amusement are necessary to the welfare of the people. The movement of the Musicians' Union in San Francisco to have Sunday concerts in a number of the parks is a good one. There should be such concerts of evenings, too, and at public expense if the thing be possible. It will lessen the demands for better policing as certainly as well equipped playgrounds lessen juvenile delinquency, and that fact is now beyond the domain of argument. There is no better way in which the earnings of all may be shared with the many than in providing wholesome diversions and in seeing to it that unwholesome diversions are placed under ban, albeit with a large liberality in discriminating between that which is wholesome and that which is not. All attempts to smother, instead of direct, the instinct for diversion, will result in harm and no good.

The Raising Day Triumph.

Fresno raisin dealers and growers have made shift to call a good deal of attention to their product. Their raisin day is a success—for the day and, let us hope, for days that are to come. They have a good and honest product. It deserves to be more largely consumed than it is, and yet the general tendency will be to offset every added pound of raisins consumed with a pound of prunes left unsold. The great Mississippi Valley is the vortex into which the raisin and the prune are poured. Whichever of these is cheapest gets the call of the market and, if both are dear, the market turns to dried apples and even to pumpkins evaporated or carefully kept through the winter. Where the quantity of any product cannot be absolutely controlled the study must be how to get that product to the consumer at the lowest price, not the dearest, for the mouths of the millions—which constitute the market—have to convenience their appetites to what they can afford to eat. Whatever the price of raisins to growers may have been, to consumers that price has been extortionate, even here in California.

Making Enemies For Protection.

Investigations, through the consular service, have shown that representations made to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, by the protected industries, as to the cost of labor in European countries, were grossly inaccurate. They represented that the labor cost of production abroad was much less than it is with the evident purpose of securing a higher protective duty than is needed in order to equalize the cost of production in this country. This denouement emphasizes the need for a permanent tariff commission to do the investigating.

His Redeeming Qualification.

Senator Aldrich is probably not the ablest man in the United States Senate. Since Elihu Root came into that body Aldrich cannot dispute the primacy of ability with him, but he is the most powerful senator in that body and is likely to remain so for some time, even with Root as a factor. He comes from the pocket borough of Rhode Island, where politics is conducted on almost a strictly cash basis, and he has now represented that borough twenty-eight years. During that time he has done at least one honest thing: He has sought to know the business of the government down to the smallest detail and he does know it better than any other member of the Senate. If he does wrong it is not because he does not know right from wrong, but because of an inherent preference for the wrong.

Why Oakland Rejoices.

The commuter is a good deal of an affliction to both San Francisco and Oakland. He can't vote in San Francisco because he lives in Oakland, but he cannot take much of an interest in Oakland affairs because he spends all day in San Francisco. However, the commuter is not without patriotism. He loves both cities and is loyal to them both, in proof of which it may be stated that recent efforts to increase the membership of Oakland Board of Trade have resulted in adding 1,728 new names to the roll, a due proportion of them, without a doubt, being commuters.

ARE OUR UNIVERSITIES DANGEROUS?

The Cosmopolitan Magazine has discovered a mar's nest. Through the efficacy of Mr. Harold Bolce the college professors of the country have been caught in the acts of "up-heaving ancient foundations," shattering cherished faiths, overturning institutions without which humanity has so far been unable to get on and doing many other things all and sundry of which make against the peace and dignity of the nation and the quietude of the people. Mr. Bolce seems likely to become the vortex of a ten-day sensation.

There is no question that there is "something doing," at our universities, that there are many college professors out with hammers in search of images that they may whack them. There is considerable whacking done and now and again a professorial rocket shoots up into the sky leaving in its trail a string of startling phrases which, taken by themselves, have an evil look and an odor not like the attar of roses; but as the rocket vanishes and cometh down, no man knowing or caring where, so it is with the greater part of these professional luminaries. They do not stay lighted.

Nevertheless there is a deal of hard and painstaking work being done in our universities with no other purpose than to get at the truth. If now and then a truth-seeker cackles too soon (or when no egg has been laid) the harm is not serious. It is sufficient that in our universities, as nowhere else, men are seeking if haply they may find that which is to come. Were as nowhere else the mind is freed of shackles and good faith guides the hand of intelligent effort.

Nor need we fear that error, once launched in a university, will go forth to practice piracy upon the high seas of thought and influence. No idea either good or bad can stick up its head at a university without having something thrown at it. Every utterance of every professor is mercilessly criticised by every other professor in the institution. If fares are sown with the good wheat they are uprooted even at the cost of pulling up the wheat, and without stopping to say: By your leave. If the utilitarian idea promises to reduce culture to that which is commercially useful the teachers of belles-lettres come to the rescue with an insistence that nothing useful should be taught and that only the ecstasies of life are its realities.

Let us have no fear for our universities, even though they harbor some whom much learning has made mad. The eternal verities are not to be shaken by madmen and anything that is shaken by them is not a verity. The only thing we need to dread is lack of a free forum and a fair fight in the realm of a painstaking investigation and a trained and accurate thinking. As for the multitude, the saving grace of common sense, denied to many learned minds, will preserve it from serious harm. So long as we can trust the upright-ness of university instruction we can safely leave its rightness to the test of time. It is only when great interests or an unrequited passion of the public mind, begin to fetter or corrupt the integrity of instruction that the public need fear for the universities or the quality of instruction they impart.

"IT IS THE LAW."

It is related that when Jesus of Nazareth healed the paralytic at the pool of Bethesda, and the happy man went bounding away carrying his bed on his back, he was arrested before he got half way home for carrying his bed on the Sabbath day. It puts no strain upon the imagination to conceive with what cold indifference the court looked upon the man's exuberance of spirits as he meted out to him the prescribed penalty with the remark: "It is the law."

When the factory system began to establish itself on the running streams of the Atlantic Coast, and dye stuffs began to be turned into them to the discomfiture of the shad, suits were brought by the farmer folk living on the banks of the streams in defense of their piscatorial rights. The courts upheld them. When it was objected that the weaving of cloths for the clothing of the naked meant vastly more to the public than the right of a bank owner to sit and doze at one end of a fishing tackle with a mudworm at the other, the honorable courts looked gravely over their spectacles, shook their sage heads and said: "It is the law," and for fifty years the factory system had to fight for its life against the river shad and the judicial fossil, but it finally won its victory.

Under the Common Law admiralty courts took cognizance of offenses rising on rivers so far as the tide ebb and flowed. Above the tide lands the local courts on the banks of the streams took such cognizance. When navigation of the great lakes began to be a fact the issue arose as to whether offenses taking place thereon should come under the jurisdiction of admiralty courts or of local district or county courts nearest to where the offense took place. Learned judges looked at the subject over their gold-rimmed spectacles, but through the microscope of long established definition and precedent. They saw the absurdity of local courts undertaking to assert jurisdiction over those inland seas, yet as the tides did not ebb and flow thereon they shook their pates for half a century, ruefully denying admiralty jurisdiction, saying: "It is the law."

When water began to be taken from the streams of California for irrigation, and the bank owner asserted his right to the "full flow of the water undiminished in quantity and unpolluted in quality" the courts saw that the strict enforcement of that principle condemned the fairest portions of California to remain desert wastes to the end of time, but again they adjusted the judicial spectacles to their fossilized noses and ordained that it should be the right of the last man on the stream to hear the rivers sing lullabys to the bay of San Francisco while the fertile valleys were left to be the playgrounds of whirlwinds. "It is the law," they said, "and we are helpless in the matter."

To be sure, they changed the position of the Boss of the River from the last man on the stream to the first man, and judicial influence forced upon the state an unworkable, self-bankrupting irrigation district law as a means of getting around a technicality; but in spite of mitigating concessions grudgingly made to common sense by the courts, irrigation litigation has cost California more than all the irrigation works it has constructed and the end of that cost is not yet.

When it was discovered, through the patriotic efforts of brave and self-denying citizens, that the government of San Francisco had become a hotbed of moral leprosy, and franchises worth hundreds of thousands, even millions, could be had for thousands expended in bribery—when the facts were brought out so clearly that the accused themselves had not the face to deny them—and men were convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors, higher courts set the culprits free, or turned them back to the starting point to begin their journey to state prison all over again, for the alleged reason that not all the stations enroute had been stopped at, not all the procedures had been observed: "It is the law," they say, as they wash their hands of responsibility for a palpable miscarriage of justice, a miscarriage that they would not themselves have the face to deny.

California has suffered from drought, it has suffered from the rapacities of a great and greedy transportation company, it has suffered from pestilence and it has suffered from being placed by nature far from the markets for its products, but no one of these causes of suffering, handicap and hardship has equaled the burden of having to carry on its back the weight of a narrow, technical, word-serving, spirit-losing judiciary. It takes not one step forward that is not forced upon it by a pressure from without that should have moved mountains.

It is characteristic of the small mind to get into a groove and follow it. It is characteristic of the broad mind, the mind of a Marshall, to blaze new paths through the wilderness in advance of human progress, and one such brain upon the Supreme Bench of California, during the last third of a century, would have been worth more to California, almost, than Abraham Lincoln was worth to the nation. The superlative need of our state at this time is for one great and broad judicial emancipator from the innumerable "small minds" with which Lilliputians have bound our great state to the dead world of judicial formalism.

"It is the law," is no sound excuse. The law is what our courts, rather than our legislatures, have made it or have permitted it to be made without protest. "No error—in the record of a criminal case, carried to a court of appeals, should lead to the reversal of the judgment unless it affirmatively appears that, but for the error, a different verdict would have been reached." So says William Howard Taft, a man whose preeminence as statesman and jurist entitles him to be heard with such attention as to give to no member of the California judiciary justification for breaking silence. Judged by that standard not one of the appellate decisions, in re the graft cases, could or would have been rendered and, if that rule had been applied, "manufacturers of great wealth" would now be in San Quentin prison where they so richly deserve to sojourn, at least for a season. The trouble is that our big men are at the bar and not on the bench. Until that condition is somehow reversed, California cannot hope for the cheap, speedy and certain establishment of justice, and that condition cannot be reversed so long as judicial positions are mainly filled from the political bargain counter of a great corporation.

A MISUSED WORD.

The tariff issue has brought into the foreground a school of publicists who demand that there shall be economy in public expenditure and, coupled with this demand, is the assertion that the administration of President Roosevelt was extravagant. The question before the house is, What do these people mean by economy in expenditure? Do they mean merely that the taxpayers shall receive a dollar in value for every dollar expended, or do they mean that the dollars expended shall be reduced to the lowest terms? If economy means going without things that the country ought to have and can afford. The California Weekly is against it. If it means a careful account-keeping of all the money that comes into Uncle Sam's coffers, and a scrutiny of what goes out with the purpose of knowing that Uncle Sam gets his money's worth we are for it. Let us understand what we are talking about.

Public taxation should go to the limit where it verges upon, but does not inflict injury to, the productive power of the people. This continent of ours is a raw farm needing improvement. Improvements should be made as rapidly as increase of wealth will allow. The waterways need to be improved and many rivers canalized. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of swamp lands that should be reclaimed to settlement. The semi-arid West needs to be brought under irrigation. Uncle Sam should own his own postoffice buildings in every second-class office in the country. Harbors need to be dredged and protected with breakwaters. We want as good a navy as any power except Great Britain, as good coast defenses as are necessary to our protection, the rehabilitation of deforested areas and a further spread of expert research in such directions as will stimulate private enterprises and show the way to the highroad of industrial success. All these things the American people need just as fast as they can afford them and no faster.

If possible they should have these things without voting bonds for them. If they can be paid for out of current income so much the better. If the farmer can improve his farm out of the proceeds of the farm work he should not borrow money to do the improving, and what is true of a single farm is true of Uncle Sam who owns all the farms in America.

We should not suffer this cry for economy to stop progress or relieve stored up wealth from the necessity of bearing an income tax, and there are reasons for surmising that the clamor for economy has that eventuality for an inspiring motive. Let it be repeated, economy is good if it be taken to mean opposition to waste. It is bad if it be taken to mean a cessation in government activities along wholesome lines of internal improvement and external defense. If we keep these distinctions clear in our minds we shall avoid being betrayed into the wrong camp.

Putting Away Childish Things.

No one who visited the House of Representatives at Washington while in session was ever afterward able to conceive of that house as a deliberative body. It has always been a go-as-you-please, catch-as-catch-can pandemonium. The quality of statesmanship sent there is so absurd that the statesmen themselves refuse to accord each other the courtesy of a hearing. Not even men in the hundred can command so much as the patient endurance of the others. It will not be so after December. The desks are to be taken out and benches brought in, after the manner of the British Parliament. Having no conveniences for letter writing and lounging it is expected that members will either absent themselves entirely or sit and listen respectfully. There will be sessions only when there is business to be transacted and something akin to order will come out of that chaos. We got our parliamentary idea from Britain in the first instance and the more nearly we follow the British parliamentary pattern the better will the idea get on.

A Government Train.

A bill has been introduced in Congress asking an appropriation of $60,000 for the purchase of a special train for the President and his suite in order that he may go about the country with facility and in a style befitting his station. Why not? He needs to see much at first hand, to know the country whose laws he is to execute. Unfortunately, during his pilgrimages, he is more likely to meet men who love the limelight than those who constitute the spinal column of citizenship, but there are compensating advantages. It is worth a great deal to the country to have the people see the President, to look into his face and measure him up. Our government tends toward incorporeality. There is not much to which the citizen can point and say: "This is the government." The President is coming to be the popular personification of government, largely for the reason that legislatures and courts are coming to be the corporate personifications of government. Therefore the people should have every facility for seeing and knowing what of government they have left. Not only should the President have a special train and a yacht to go about with, but an aeroplane as soon as they get to working more definitely, if he wants one.

Eucalyptus.

When the Wright Irrigation District law was enacted it was soon evident that many district enterprises were launched with the purpose of voting and selling bonds rather than irrigating land. When the furor for vineyard and orchard investment struck the state it was soon manifest, to the cost of confiding investors, that the purpose of many fruit enterprises was to sell, or to plant lands at so much per acre, and not to grow grapes or fruits. There are intimations that similar purposes, wide of the mark of growing eucalyptus trees for timber, may be characterizing some eucalyptus enterprises now being promoted. It is not the purpose of The California Weekly to take these enterprises up individually and pass upon their wisdom or their sincerity. That would require a larger effort than we are able to put forth; but it was with the view of laying before the investing public the foundation facts regarding eucalyptus, its production and probable profitability, that arrangements have been made with a gentleman connected with the United States Forest Service for the preparation of a short series of articles dealing with the subject. After that, "caveat emptores." We commend these articles to our brethren of the interior press as being thoroughly dependable in sincerity as well as in the best ascertained knowledge up to date.

The Cup of Misery.

Only in the Book of Life will all the atrocities and agonies attending recent events in Turkey be fully written down. But this is known to a certainty: Turkey has forfeited the right to exist as an independent nationality. It is not fit to survive, and especially is this true of the scheming old scoundrel, Abdul Hamid, who has inflicted upon his people every misery that flesh and spirit can be called upon to endure. The Young Turks seem to have the upper hand, but there is as yet no guaranty that the cohorts of Islam may not march on Constantinople from Asia Minor. If they do it would be a good time for Europe to intervene and close out so much of the Ottoman empire as clings to the soil of Europe. It is not fit to exist anywhere, but less fit in Europe than anywhere. The issue will depend upon whether or not the "Most Christian" nations of Europe are as pagan as the most pagan nation on the earth. As for Abdul Hamid, the best disposition that can be made of him will be to fasten a cannon ball to each of his legs, take him out into the Bosphorus and drop him overboard to keep company with many a troublesome Turkish statesman he has sent on before. First diplomatist of Europe, as he is and has been, he will be a prolific source of difficulty so long as he is above ground.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"What our country needs," declared a Stanford professor, lately lecturing at Berkeley, "is more men who dare to be patient and clean thought at the expense of being poor. That is a thought that will bear thinking over."

There is a kind of poverty of which every person should be ashamed. This is the poverty of sloth, the poverty of a low standard of industrial efficiency, the poverty of eating, drinking and being merry regardless of the future. These kinds of poverty are born of lack of moral courage. The saying that it is no sin to be poor is only half true, or, to state it more exactly, is true less than half the time. It is a sin to be poor where sin is the cause of poverty, as it frequently is.

But there is a kind of poverty, or relative poverty—it is seldom absolute—that is glorious. It is a poverty that comes of a refusal to pay too much for wealth, a poverty that refuses to grow rich by coercing the lives of children into dollars through a wage slavery, a poverty due to a refusal to put the cup to the lips of inebriety at the cost of manhood groveling in the mire, a poverty that would be the price of debauching the moral standards of a people, a poverty endured because it could not withstand the competition of extortion practiced by a rival actuated by an unbridled lust for gain, a poverty that is the price of abstinence from graft, chicanery, autocratic pressure. All these forms of poverty are riches beyond the capacity of accountants to compute, and our cities, states and country have need of more persons who dare to be poor rather than purchase riches at the prices here suggested.

It was the same speaker referred to above, Prof. Bert Estes Howard, who declared that we Americans are gaining the world but losing our own souls. The latter statement may be questioned. It is to be doubted if we are gaining the world. We have been shipping the fertility of our soil to the rest of the world to its gain and our loss. We have stripped our mountains and hillsides of their forests and washed our soil coverings into the sea. The generation that settled our valleys and prairies outlived the virginity of their fertility, and yet they must somehow feed humanity until the end of time.

It may be doubted, too, if there be a crevice in the universe through which a human soul may lose itself from the ken of the Almighty, however much it might wish to be hidden under a mountain or lost through a crack; but it cannot be doubted that millions of Americans have paid more dearly for wealth than they could afford, even though they succeeded in getting it, who are ordered on a hurried or so, who throw themselves into the striving, ever did.

It is to be doubted if those who are brave enough to be poor need be very poor. There is no reason why any man of good, fair efficiency may not get on in the world without sapping the blood of childhood, overworking women, debauching men, wronging the city he lives in or overcharging any person, firm or corporation for any service performed. There are thousands who have become affluent and hundreds of thousands who have acquired competency without ever coming into possession of the dollar that they have not fairly earned, and they have accomplished these results without paying too much for them. They have not only not lost their souls in so doing, but have found them, have built them up and made them strong, for it is in the work to which we devote our lives that we fashion our souls.

Nevertheless, our country has need for robust men and women, "Who dare to be patient and clean thought at the expense of being poor." Our country has need also of more persons who not only dare to be poor themselves but dare to demand that others shall share their comparative poverty with them.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Moral: Build Better Buildings.

After investigations covering a period of three or four months, scientific experts appear to be arriving at the conclusion that the Italian residents of Messina and vicinity were in no slight degree responsible for the terrible disaster that overtook them. Among these is Frank A. Perret, formerly honorary assistant at the Royal Vesuvian observatory. As the result of his observations on the scene, he reports that the great destruction of buildings, and consequent fearful destruction of life, was due in large degree to the faulty construction of most of the buildings. Everywhere, he says, is the evidence that they were largely composed of rubble loosely held together by plaster—a building material which is more successful as a deathtrap than as a shock-defying structure. Better constructed buildings stood the shock very well. In connection with his report, Mr. Perret issues a warning that the country adjacent to Messina is certain to be visited by earthquakes hereafter, and unless structures are better built the disaster of 1908 may be repeated at any time. All of which may as well be read and noted with intelligent interest right here in California.

At Work Among the Hittites.

It has been a long, long time since the Hittites, of Biblical note, lived, did their deeds and passed from the ways, and almost from the memory, of men, and yet the German oriental society may, in a sense, be said to be holding daily communication with them. At Boghaz Kewin, in Asia Minor, Khitta, the capital of the Hittites, has been unearthed by representatives of the society. And so it has come to pass that, after many centuries of concealment under the dust and refuse of ages, articles this all but forgotten people manufactured are taken in German hands and the things they wrote are read by German eyes. Most of the writings are in the Babylonian language, but some are written in Hittite. Among these is a Babylonian version of the treaty of Rameses II with the Hittite king, which was entered into after the battle of Kadesh, and it is anxiously awaited by oriental scholars, as it may, in some degree, overturn ancient history.

Cowardice Defeated the Sultan.

Now that the Sultan of Turkey apparently is "down and out," it is of interest to note that one of his leading generals attributes his defeat to cowardice. Mahmoud Mukhtar Pasha, who commanded the first army corps in Constantinople, maintains this view in the following language: "If the minister of war had taken proper steps immediately, the movement easily could have been nipped in the bud, without bloodshed. I was informed too late, and when I reached my headquarters I found it surrounded by a mob of thousands of excited people. I immediately collected the troops that had not yet become disaffected and with four battalions of infantry, three regiments of cavalry, one battery of artillery and a machine-gun division, I was able through repeated attacks to disperse the people. It would have been child's play to crush this movement at the start if authority had been given me to proclaim a state of siege, but the ministry and parliament were too cowardly. I was forbidden to take energetic measures, and hence the movement became an avalanche." All of which may be true, or it may be only the outcry of one disaffected. Nor does it really matter greatly; however it came to pass, the point on which the civilized world congratulates itself is that this murderous old ruffian is at last de-throned.

To Harbor Airships.

Now that airships have come to stay, the question which agitates many inventors concerns the manner in which they shall be harbored. Heretofore airships have been housed in a long, low structure subject to the serious objection that great inconvenience was experienced in getting them out and in. But now comes F. W. Ilges, a German inventor, with a plan which is not unlikely to be generally adopted. Its simplicity is so extreme as to be almost amusing, yet it is but another illustration of that simplicity which scores. Mr. Ilges' suggestion is that an excavation, wide and deep enough to hold the ship, be made in the earth. Into this the vessel would glide, and then a frame of wood or aluminum, covered with sailcloth, would be drawn over it by hand. It looks right as well as simple, but why had no one thought of it before?

English Law to Protect Children.

That which is known as "the children act of 1908" now is in effect in Great Britain, and, as a consequence, the children are more thoroughly protected than they have been. Briefly, it provides, That tobacco shall not be sold to any person apparently under the age of sixteen years, that every child under the age of seven placed out to nurse for more than forty-eight hours must be registered with the local authorities by the foster parent; that foster parents shall not insure the life of a young child, and insurance companies are forbidden to receive such insurance. The act strengthens prior laws dealing with cruelty to children and increases punishments therefor. It attempted to forbid the presence of any child under fourteen years in a licensed barroom, but an error in its construction has been seized upon by liquor-dealers to defeat it. The mistake occurred in defining a barroom as a place used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor." It should have read "sale or consumption," and the publicans, as ready in England as elsewhere to avail themselves of any defect in a righteous law, are contending that the act does not apply to a place where intoxicants are consumed, but not sold—the liquor can be sold in the next house. Notwithstanding this error, the act is doing good work.

The Awakening of China.

China, lethargic through many centuries' at last is awakening, and one of the first symptoms is its determination to have a navy in line with modern armament. The Regent has decided that the conditions which prevailed during the war with Japan in 1894 shall no longer exist, and to this end Duke Tsai has been ordered to raise funds for naval organization on a liberal scale. The Chinese of the Straits Settlements have sent word from Singapore that they will contribute 3,000,000 ounces of silver to such a fund. Prince Su is to be sent on a trip around the world to study foreign naval methods. Most significant of all, perhaps, the Wai-wu-pu has been instructed to confer with the British minister to China concerning a possible retrocession of Wei-hai-wei, now held as a British naval station, to China. So it will be seen that a modern navy for China is imminent, the sleeping dragon will awake, and—what then?

Swiss Watch Industry Ebbing.

There was a time—and it was not so long ago—when, in order to establish the fact that a watch was a good one, it was deemed necessary to demonstrate that it was entitled to bear the label, "Made in Switzerland." That time is past, and the timepiece industry is languishing even in Geneva, its former home. It is competition by the artisans of Germany, France, and particularly of the United States, which has brought about this result. When it came to pass that an equally good timepiece could be made for less money here than there, the Swiss tide began to ebb, and machinery accomplished this result. How hard the Swiss manufacturers have been hit may be judged by the fact that, whereas in the palmy days they paid their artisans from $10 to $15 a week—that their best wages seem scant enough to us—they now pay them but $6 or $7. He who once proudly wore a Swiss watch now, with equal pride, wears the American article, unless he chances to be afflicted with Europomania, when he wears one made in France or Germany; and that which advertised Geneva to the world advertises it no more.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

Obit April 23, 1909.

Charles Warren Stoddard, poet—in prose and metre both—was distinguished beyond the common lot of literary men who rank below the scale of genius—distinguished in two respects: in the devotion he inspired amongst his friends; and in his success in opening up to the world a new locale, a new background of literary impression, for he was the literary discoverer of the South Seas, their most sensitive and ardent admirer and their most successful interpreter.

His literary fame will undoubtedly rest upon his "South Sea Idyls," and that part of his verse that sings the haunting fascination of the tropic isles, their languorous delight, their solitary isolation, the beauty of their palm grove beach and azure sea. These are the things that sought his soul, and these his prose and verse sent out in wonderfully picturesque and vivid form to please an unfamiliar world. The "Idyls" found instant favor; they appealed to all the romantic sentiment that lingers in the adult mind with reminiscences of Robinson Crusoe, and the sense of mystery and ease and remoteness and soft dolce far niente that the dweller in the temperate zones ascribes to the tropics. And they did more than simply appease a momentary curiosity: they have a lasting quality that was observed by Robert Louis Stevenson, his friend, who wrote in '86: "I was re-reading some of your 'South Sea Idyls' the other day; some of the chapters are very good indeed; some pages as good as they can be." High praise, from a sound critic, who also knew the subject and the art.

None of Stoddard's later work ever quite redeemed the promise of this first. It was good—some of his verse has the simplicity and music and color of high song. But probably no other subject quite so much appealed to him. Again and again he reverts to it in his poetry, and then he is at his best, as in the "Wind and Wave" and "The Cock." It is a pity that he

California owes him honor and gratitude for his work with local scenes for its background. His mission studies did much to carry the fame of the state for historical interest and native beauty to the older world. And both San Francisco and the little world owe him much for two things: his long identification with the Bohemian Club and his friendly aid to Stevenson. As a Bohemian—in clubdom and in the wider sense of the word—he was famous as a leading exponent of its spirit.

But his friendship for Stevenson was a vital service to literature. When "R. L. S." first visited San Francisco, a very lonely and discouraged exile from his own country, Stoddard was one of the three really intimate friends he made here, and from Stoddard he borrowed books and in his company found encouragement and sympathy that strengthened him mightily for the work that made him later a great name in bookland. Stoddard's quaint lodgings in an old home on a hillside here are described in Stevenson's "The Wrecker" in the chapter entitled "Faces on the City Front."

This genius for friendship persisted in him to the last. Men who scoffed at his work have frequently described how they fell, upon meeting him, at once and irrevocably under the spell of a magnetic personality, a wonderful speaking voice and a rare charm of manner. Perhaps his closest friend for the longest time was Ina Coolbrith, the poetess, who knew him for thirty years and was his intimate to the end.

WIND AND WAVE.

O, when I hear at sea
The water on our lee,
I fancy that I hear the wind
That combs my hemlock tree:

But when beneath that tree
I listen eager, why
I seem to hear the rushing wave
I hear far out at sea.

THE COCOA TREE.

Cast on the water by a careless hand,
Day after day the winds persuaded me:
Onward I drifted till a coral tree
Stayed me among its branches, where the sand
Gathered about me, and I slowly grew,
Fed by the constant sun and the inconstant dew.

The sea-birds build their nests against my root,
And eye my slender body's horny case.
Widowed within this solitary place,
Into the thankless sea I cast my life;
Joyless I thrive, for no man may partake
Of all the store I bear and harvest for his sake.

No more I heed the kisses of the morn;
The harsh winds rob me of the life they gave;
I watch my altered shadow in the wave,
And hourly droop and nod my crest forlorn.
While my fibres stiffen and grow numb,
Beckoning the tardy ships—the ships that never come!

THE PLOT OF "CHANTICLER."

Probably no play has ever been talked or written of so much before its production as "Chanticleer," to adopt Rostand's old French spelling of the word, and such details of it as are known may be interesting. Its five acts are prefaced by a prologue which is said to be a work of high art in itself.

One of the actors steps before the curtain and announces in polished verse that this is a play by animals. But the animals are timid, he says; they must wait until the men have gone away. Then, looking through the curtain, he declares, "The men have disappeared, the play can begin."

The story is concerned with the conceit of the Cock. He is already a personage of great consequence, but he wishes to increase his reputation among the birds. He therefore makes the announcement that the sun cannot rise without him. His bluff succeeds. Every morning there is fresh proof that the Cock's boast is true, for dawn is invariably heralded by him.

The proud rooster falls in love with a guinea fowl, driven to him for protection by the guns of sportsmen. They flee together to a nearby forest, and she, with feminine curiosity, tries to extract his secret. Whence comes this mighty power of calling up the sun?

It is, in a way, another case of Samson and Delilah. The Cock boasts of and explains his power, but one day sleeping overlong, he fails to salute the morn. The sun rises as usual. The result is that the Cock loses much prestige, being regarded as a humbug, and, as a moral, pretentiousness is punished.

One of the daintiest and most amusing incidents in the play is said to be the plot of the night birds. They hold a tea party. As there is danger of being interrupted at 5 o'clock in the morning, the hour is changed to 5 o'clock in the morning, and then they conspire against his Majesty the Cock.

The last act concludes with a line spoken by the dog, who tells his friends the birds that a man is coming, upon which the feathered company disperses.

RUSKIN'S ESTIMATE OF DICKENS.

Of the death of Dickens, whom he greatly admired, Ruskin wrote to Professor Norton: "I know you would deeply feel the death of Dickens. It is frightful to me—among the blows struck by the fates at worthy men, while a mischievous ones have ceaseless strength. The literary loss is infinite—the political one I care less for than you do. Dickens was a pure modernist—a leader of the steam whistle party par excellence—and he had no understanding of any power of antiquity except a sort of jackdaw sentiment for cathedral towers. He knew nothing of the nobler power of superstition—was essentially a stage manager, and used everything for effect on the pit. His Christmas meant mistletoe and pudding—neither resurrection from dead, nor rising of new stars, nor teaching of wise men, nor shepherds."

THE WIND'S SONG.

By Evelyn Day.

(For The California Weekly.)

I am the lord of the sea,
Master of lands am I;
I tear from its earth-banks a tree,
Aloft I ride to the sky—
I—the wind!

I wander through grass-covered hills—
Dear to the mountains am I;
I toss red leaves to the rills
Aloft I ride to the sky—
I—the wind!

I drive the sea-foam before me
Lord of the mists am I;
The waves and the sea-cliffs adore me,
Aloft I ride to the sky—
I—the wind!

I chase white foam o'er the sands
Playful and wanton am I,
I cry over long prairie lands,
Aloft I ride to the sky—
I—the wind!

Who, who has ever beheld me,
Except the great Lord on high!
I have neither parents nor kindred,
But mighty, mighty am I—
A mighty, blustering wanderer,
A glorious vagabond I!
I—the wind!

THE ELIOT FIVE-FOOT CLASSICS.

Announcement has been made of the titles of some of the twenty-five volumes of masterpieces designed by President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University for his "five-foot library," which, he declares, will make a complete equipment for the education of the average man, if read with care and understanding.

The entire twenty-five volumes will be published early in July under the designation of the "Eliot Edition of Representative Masterpieces." Of this number six have been edited to date, these being Penn's Soliloquies, one volume containing Robert Burns' complete works, one volume containing Shakespeare's leading dramas and light comedies, one volume containing three works of old Scottish ballads, one volume of histories of biblical times and one volume containing two books on Quakerism.

William A. Neilson, professor of English literature at Harvard, and a close personal friend of President Eliot, is engaged in the work of editing the works for the publishers, who will be F. F. Collier & Sons of New York.

Miss Marcia Craft, a native of California, is winning laurels as a grand opera singer in Germany. She is about to return to America, and will appear in California this summer in concert.

Col. Alexander K. McClure of Philadelphia, one of the best known journalists of America, though eighty-two years old, recently visited the South and spoke before the board of trade in several cities. He is a veteran of the civil war, was for thirty years editor of the Philadelphia Times, and always a force in Republican national politics.

Gabriel d'Annunzio, the Italian dramatist, works only at night, arising at five in the afternoon, beginning work at seven, and working until nine in the morning, with a dinner of two eggs at two a. m. He wrote "Phedro" in seventeen days and "Pieta" in fifteen days.

Sir William S. Gilbert, the librettist of the famous Gilbert and Sullivan operas, is at work on the book of a new comic opera.

HOW CAN WE PEOPLE CALIFORNIA?

By ELMER ELLSWORTH CAREY.

If the farmer can thrive in spite of the ice-bound winters of Manitoba and Winnipeg; if he can exist on the blizzard-swept plains of the Dakotas, Montana, Wisconsin and Minnesota; if he can find life tolerable in the cyclone cellars of Kansas and Nebraska; if he can eke out a precarious existence amid the stones and stumps of New England; and if, throughout the East, he finds life worth living during the furnace-like heat of summer and the long hibernation of Arctic-like winter, what would he think of a home in California where spring is perpetual and the most fertile soil on earth pours forth golden treasures every day in the year? I can answer the question. The dwellers on the plains of Manitoba, and the blizzard-swept acres of Wisconsin, and the rock-ribbed New England farms know nothing definitely of California and its attractions; they know nothing of our five-acre farms which are as profitable as forty acres of Connecticut rock holes; they know nothing of our great state as a home and haven where the bounties of lavish Nature may be enjoyed perennially and where sleet, snow, blizzards and cyclone cellars are but a memory.

There are in the East tens of thousands of dissatisfied farmers who are needed within our boundaries. But an insignificant portion come to this state.

What is the reason?

Why does not the eastern farmer come to California?

What can be done to induce him to come? I will briefly indicate some of the reasons why he does not come, and then suggest a plan to interest him in a California home.

It is quite true that attempts are being made to advertise this state in the East; but these attempts are not made by those who understand the science of advertising; our promoters and friends are not acquainted with the psychological processes that govern the human mind; the art of creating a Desire is unknown to them. Our friends are not acquainted with the mental calibre of the average eastern farmer, or how to cultivate the proper mental conditions which precede emigration. In the first place, this state does not need capital. Money never built up the West or laid the foundations for a great state. No American Commonwealth was founded on money; rather all were founded by the ax and the plow and a good strong arm and heart.

This state does not need capitalists; it has no particular use for millionaires; it has enough of its own, who, with a few shining exceptions, are ever a drag and an obstruction. Millionaires and progress will not mix. Millionaires have been put to some use around Los Angeles, where they have laid out orange groves and fine boulevards and spacious villas. But these things are not of any particular benefit to the state. They do not fill our vacant acres with vine-clad cottages, and we need those vine-clad cottages and the attendant crop of roses and youngsters.

Advertising the bank clearings and the number and value of building permits is of little use. We want settlers. The kind of people we want have no need for safe deposit vaults and they are not interested in building permits. We want tillers of the soil. We want people to cultivate small farms. We want chicken ranches, vegetable farms and fruit orchards; in one word we want the land settled. We do not want manufacturers for we have no population to supply employees. Manufacturers will follow population; they can't precede it. We can't get labor to pick our prunes. We want farmers to come, so that the children can pick the neighbors' fruit. Advertising our daily temperature in the East makes no impression on the prospective settler. All such methods never touch the main issue; they create no Desire for a home in the Golden State.

In our advertising we have overlooked the man with a hoe. We talk about the land of sunshine and flowers—glittering generalities—but the man on the chicken ranch a few miles from Milwaukee has no definite idea of this state. I have talked with him. This man on the little truck farm near Joliet, Illinois, frozen six months in the year, has been overlooked. He has told me so. California is as far away as Patagonia; he knows California is a place where they found gold; California is a concrete proposition; California as a home for him; the real California, with its wealth of opportunities, has never been presented to him. He has been overlooked. He sees no vivid picture of that little California home with an acre or two and the chickens and the cow in the alfalfa and the glorious radiance of the setting sun tinting the crimson tomatoes. This picture of a little farm about two miles from Santa Rosa, near the Sebastopol road, has never been painted for him. Had it been, he would be occupying it.

We have been shooting over the mark. We never touched him. We never used the right kind of ammunition. Our efforts have been scattered; we know not how to concentrate and get results. We couldn't "close the contract."

A man born and raised in a certain locality near Paw Paw, Michigan, surrounded by friends, relatives and neighbors, will not frantically pack his trunk and madly flee to California because some transportation company sings in two or three colors,

"Seventy-two hours

To the Land of Flowers."

The transportation company has little knowledge of human nature or it would use different bait. The transportation company never talked with the man near Milwaukee or Joliet or Paw Paw.

The simple reason why the eastern farmer does not come is because we have not offered him the right kind of attraction; and he has not even heard of the attraction we have offered. Our glowing descriptions never have reached him. The rank and file of the people of the East have been overlooked. Again, a farmer down in Ohio, near Columbus, read of California and was interested. He said to his wife one evening, "Suppose we move to California." After a minute's consideration, she replied:

"John, it is very nice to talk about moving to California; but what will we do when we get there? Where will we settle? Where will you find a farm? California is a big state, over seven hundred miles long and you know nothing about the land there; you know nothing of the various localities. How can you select a farm in a strange country when you know nothing of local conditions? You have no friends or friends you would not know or to what to believe. Real estate men will tell you anything to make a commission. John, don't you think it would be a wild goose chase to start to California without knowing where you were going, or what you were going to do or where you would settle? Seems to me it would be a leap in the dark."

These expressions of that farmer's wife are the expressions of thousands of wives; just put yourself in the farmer's place and think it over from his standpoint. You will see one reason why there is not a wild stampede for the Golden State. The farmer has no definite, objective point; there is no localized magnet to draw him.

The populating of a state is a business; it must be conducted scientifically; it must conform to a well thought-out plan, embracing all the conditions and providing for all contingencies, and recognizing all the laws governing the migration of large bodies of people. It can be no haphazard plan must take note of the actual conditions in the East; the personal equation must be provided for; the wife must be convinced; the campaign cannot succeed unless all the elements are considered. The moving of large numbers of people to a strange land cannot be done by colored posters and handbills; you can sell soap by means of lithographs, but you cannot draw people 3,000 miles by means of colored pictures and paeans of praise for our glorious climate, and right here is the corner-stone of our troubles; we have tried to advertise a state in the same manner as we would advertise shaving soap, or a country fair or a circus.

Such methods will never fill our wailing valleys or dot our foothills with farm houses. At least they have not so far, for our valleys are still waiting, and our foothills are not yet dotted with the farm houses.

And yet there is a man up in New Hampshire on eighty acres where he has struggled for twenty years with adverse conditions in a heart-breaking struggle to keep the wolf and

CLAY, FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH STS.
OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

He Walked a Lowly Way.

He walked a lowly way:
For him no white, bright height of earthly fame,
No idle jaunt in days devoid of care,
No store of gold to win the fools' acclaim,
No crown or robe that mortal might may wear.
Nay, all the fates conspired that he should be
To humble circumstance a constant prey,
And so, in paths that none but love might see,
He walked a lowly way.

He walked a lowly way

Yet ever at his feet fair blossoms grew,
Such as the sweet, rich soil of love doth yield.
And in their fragrance calmest peace he knew,
And smiled at all the bodeful fates revealed.
Wee hands reached out to bless him where he stood,
And sweet Love cried, "Let me thy love repay,"
And so he held that life to him was good,
And walked a lowly way.

He walked a lowly way.

He saw the legions dumb of woe or guilt,
And, lo, his eyes were wet by pity's rain;
Saw those who fell in pitfalls man had built,
And reached a hand to lift them up again;
And so it came that he of discord made
The wondrous song that Love doth sing for aye,
And blessing reached him from the pits of shade
Along his lowly way.

He walked a lowly way.

Ay, lowly in the sight of men who dare
To judge by tinsel trophies of life's need,
Yet, when death came, their voice was like a prayer
Who sighed, "He served me in my bitter need,"
And who shall doubt a hidden door swung wide,
As to a victor in the earthly fray,
What time he passed unto the other side
Along a lowly way.

Rev. Vaughan On Religion and Rats.

Rev. W. E. Vaughan, a clergyman who is said to be the editor of a sectarian paper published in Oakland, is wandering from California and it should be noted with gratification that recently he had gotten as far away as Atlanta, Georgia. In the course of an address there, he is reported as using the following language: "Irreligion is rampant among the colleges of California and something must be done to save the students from the devil. I should venture to state there are more saloons in California than there are Methodists, and yet we are going to turn the west over to northern ministers. We should as well turn it over to the devil." Again in the course of the address, he is reported as saying that "amongst the 7,000 students in the colleges of California there isn't enough religion to save a rat, if a rat were subject for salvation."

It must at once be conceded that Rev. Vaughan is better qualified to discuss some phases of his subject than are most of us. For instance, how sadly little, as compared with his knowledge, the generality of people know concerning the amount of religion that would be required to save a rat! And, again, how regretfully must we admit that his knowledge of the ways, works and personal characteristics of the devil leaves ours out of sight! He is in his own field there, and the rest of us comparatively grope.

But, even thus handicapped, there are some of us who enjoy a considerable personal acquaintance with students in the universities and colleges of California, and we know they are a long way from being so universally irreligious as this wandering shepherd would suggest. Many of them belong to churches, as do a large proportion of their professors (whatever that may prove) and they support both young men's and young women's Christian Associations.

The fact of the case is that the students of California, like those of other states, are composed of good, bad and indifferent, religious and irreligious, and he who proclaims there is naught but evil among them is an infamous villifier. Rev. Vaughan should confine his oratory to the subject of religion and salvation for rats, for, in so doing, he will not so rapidly acquire a reputation as a vicious slanderer.

The Automobile at Bourbon Camp.

The day was calm an' peaceful, an' the citizens the same
Which at Bourbon Camp had gathered for a friendly little game.
The sun was gaily shinin' an' a-smilin' through the leaves,
An' Bill Boggs was also smilin', with three aces up his sleeves.
Oh, they wan't a thing a-breakin' of the silence an' the hush,
An' the western sky was painted like my hand—a royal flush.
When there come frum up the canyon half a yell an' half a shriek,
Like the torched soul that's askin' which 'll be the iceman's week.

"Lawd of love!" said Hiram Bottle, "That's ole Gabrel's horn, I claim."
An' he's caught me playin' poker, with a hand that is a shame.
Won't somebody ask the blessin'? Now I lay—"
"He stopped right there,
For there come a hon-less waggin whoopin down the thoroughfare,
Not a hoss, an' not a critter, not a thing on earth to pull.
Says Long Bill before he fainted, "Beats four aces or a full!"
Never stopped a single minute; just a streak of red an' smel'
Madly hustlin' down the canyon an' pursuin' of its yell.

So it come an' went. The seasons still to Bourbon come an' go,
An' the hills are shaped in purple 'gainst the western afterglow,
But the joy of poker's flitted, an' the players' faces wan.
Fer when someone mentions Gabrel, then the argument is on.
"Gabe be blowed!" says Hiram Bottle, "Twas Elisher's chariot."
"Twas Ole Nick," says Bijah Podger, "foamin' 'er his medder lot!"
An' we all our oives have promised that we'll sinless live, an' pure,
For no more that yellin' waggin, it is goin' to git us sure.

The Opinions of Rufus.

All mankind is divided into two classes: Them that wouldn't tell a lie under any circumstances, an' them that still livin'.

Educatin' some boys an' girls I've seen seems to me too much like sowin' the Mojave desert with the idee of gittin' a good crop.

I alters hesitate sorn 'bout heavin' a rock at the devil, fer I've noticed he has considerable many infoerential friends round our neighborhood.

It takes a mighty bright man to git along much if he ain't ever joined the You-tickle-me-an'-I'll-tickle-you society.

The Hebrews traveled in the barren wilderness forty years, an' the Republican party was 'bout forty years goin' frum Lincoln to Roosevelt. How hist'ry does repeat itself.

Blowin' your own bugle ain't allers so successful. The rooster cackles the loudest, but he don't make anybody b'lieve he laid the egg.

Love laughs at locksmiths, but it often heaves a deep sigh when it thinks of the butcher an' baker.

Seems to me 'tain't es much what you b'lieve es how hard you b'lieve it that counts in this world.

It's wuss than useless to teach a boy that heaven's a place where good folks set 'round in marble paws an' play harps when what he wants is to git out on the diamond an' play ball.

Faith without works is dead, an' works without faith is a horse on a treadmill.

What Delayed the Judgment.

Political rumor has it that John P. Irish has been requested to hand in his resignation as naval officer. Returned scouts report that Mr. Irish has been observed in an attitude as of deep thinking, but no noise like a resignation has been heard in his immediate vicinity. All of which naturally and gracefully leads up to—
I dreamed a dream. The Judgment Day was here;

At least, the day announced was come at last.

And Gabrel's bugle blast resounded clear, And doubting ghosts in long processions passed.

That awful day To which the years Have gone their way

Thatough smiles and tears; And yet we know, for so the record run, It still must wait till man's last deed is done.

The peoples came, and still the bugle blew The blast of hope, the wail of evil dread.

There came a pause, and longer yet it grew, While waiting stood the ranks of living-dead.

A spirit spoke: "What seems to clog? Has something broke, Or slipped a cog?"

Sighed Gabriel then, his eyes with tears ashine, "I'm waiting for John Irish to resign."

Shade of Henley, Listen to This!

A correspondent of the Modesto News is heard as follows:

"May I commend to you a poem from one inured at Sing Sing? The whole poem I have not, but two stanzas stick:

"Up from the hell that harbors me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods there be
For my unconquered soul.

"It matters not how straight the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul."

Great shade of William Ernest Henley, may you never, never know! Out of the anguish and travail of your mighty, fate-defying soul that poem was born, and now, save for a mutilated first line and one or two minor barbarisms, it is credited verbatim—so far as the quotation goes—to an inmate of a penitentiary! The verses belong to Henley, an Englishman whose life was a tragedy and whose gift to the world was his tremendous, death-disdaining poem, "Invictus."

Law and Common Sense.

"Law is based upon common sense," said the distinguished attorney.

"But supposing you haven't your pick, shovel and dynamite, how are you going to dig down to it?" the interested listener inquired.

"Don't talk so. As I was saying, law is based upon common sense, as—as—well, as the ocean is based upon land, for instance."

"Your simile is good," was the response. "The trouble in both cases is that man has not as yet been able to devise an apparatus in which he can get down deep enough to find the foundation."

Whereupon the lawyer disgustfully turned away and filed another bill of exceptions.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

My dear Mr. Pillsbury:

I desire to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 23rd inst. If I had had any special criticism to make which I thought would have helped you I would have given it to you before. I am not dissatisfied in any way with the attitude or policy of The California Weekly, and I premise what follows with the statement that I do not feel that it should abuse anybody or thing more vigorously than it does. My criticism is rather as to its style. It strikes me as not sufficiently virile or bright. I read it regularly and read it with interest, but my personal interest in it is so great and its views accord so with my own views as to matters, that I am not an average reader. I do not believe the average reader is very much attracted by it.

I know this is all very indefinite, but it is about the best that I can do.

Respectfully,

A. SHAREHOLDER.

San Francisco, April 26, 1909.

Hearing that the writer of the foregoing letter was not wholly satisfied with The California Weekly the editor wrote to him asking a frank and unsparring criticism. The reply is given above complete, save the name of the writer, whose disinclination for publicity compels its being withheld. There are three important points made in this communication, each of which deserves frank consideration.

The first is that The California Weekly should not "abuse anybody or thing more vigorously than it does." This implies that it has "abused" some person or thing. It has not done so consciously, but there are wrongs so flagrant, and conditions so intolerable, especially in relation to the establishment of even-handed justice in this commonwealth, that they deserve to be hit as hard as they can be, even "slugged" if the hitter has power to slug. When Christ uttered his "Woe unto you Scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites," no doubt the Scribes and Pharisees complained that they were being abused. The editorial staff of this paper will promise never to use stronger language in denouncing wrong doing and doers than was employed to the same end by the Savior of Men.

The California Weekly is not sufficiently virile or bright. The justness of this criticism is conceded. There are few sparks of genius scintillating through its pages. Its one constant prayer is, however, that heaven may deliver it from being dull. Some say that it is dull, others that it is not. The makers of it are the poorest judges as to that, but they sometimes wonder if its critics have not mistaken "clever" writing or strong and ill-humored sarcasm for virility. All its competitors strain after literary cleverness and sarcasm and so have fixed a standard of expectation by which newer ventures are judged. The Staff of The California Weekly have sought to avoid just those two things and to substitute for them frankness and good humor. This is done in the belief that time will prove it the better way.

Finally, our critic does not believe that the "average reader" is much attracted by The California Weekly. Right again. The average reader is not and never will be much attracted by The California Weekly. It never entered into the calculations of the founders of this enterprise that he would be. California has a population of approximately 1,750,000. Of these probably one-half are, to some degree, readers and 500,000 of them "average" readers. The average reader craves excitement, not instruction. He wants thrills of intellectual interest to chase each other with lightning-like rapidity throughout all the ramifications of his sensory system. It is pleasurable. The tragedies of domestic infelice, the crunching of bones under automobiles, the groans of the dying in wrecks and the starkness of the dead are as ecstatic as tickling a boil where the collar button ought to be; but these are not they who make society what it is. It is the exceptional and not the average reader to whom The California Weekly addresses itself. He is probably one in ten in ratio to the average. That leaves The California Weekly a possible constituency of 50,000 in California. Its present ambition is to find one in five of these. With 10,000 readers, who really want to know what is so and so, and to whom The California Weekly to tell them, this paper will become the most puissant force in the journalism of California, and for the reason that its constituency will be the molders of public sentiment and the doers of things worth while. Whoever helps The Californian Weekly to reach one more exceptional reader, one more reader who will stand for the right when he learns what is right, is a friend to the Weekly in need and deed.

Editors The California Weekly:

Gentlemen: I am sending you herewith another subscription. I take a great interest in The California Weekly and its welfare. As long as you maintain your present moral standard many people will go far out of their way to aid you.

Cordially,

WILLIAM CRANSTON.

Middlefield Road, Palo Alto.

When we fail of maintaining our present moral standard we shall deserve to have people go far out of their way to kick us. It is the failure of the public to go out of its way, either to help or to hinder, that is responsible for the lax journalism so generally deplored. Periodicals conducted primarily as financial enterprises will be only as good as they have got to be to maintain their existences for the reason that the commercial side of the venture constantly tends toward lowering ideals and making compromises with expediency. This has given rise to the thought that an honest paper must be endowed in order to live. A principal mission of The California Weekly is to prove that, after a nursing period has been tided over, an honest paper can live because it is honest and in the expectation that "people will go far out of their way to aid it." On that peg of expectation we hang our future.

POLITICAL GOSSIP.

Who Will Bell The Cat? The recent upheaval in Los Angeles has led to a general desire, if not to a actual determination, to drive Walter F. X. Parker out of politics in that city. That might not be wholly an advantageous thing to do for, if driven from Los Angeles, he might come to San Francisco and John C. Lynch is plenty and to spare. What has galled Los Angeles to the point of taking extreme measures is the public avowal, of what was well enough known before, that Walter Parker was responsible for Harper and his administration. The official representative of the "organization" that never tires of shouting "renegade" at every Republican who asserts his independence of the party boss, has been publicly convicted of throwing overboard an "organization" Republican and putting in office an "organization" Democrat in order to defeat an independent Republican for office. This shows the quality of the Republicanism of the "organization" in so plain a light that no person can longer doubt that it is "organization" first and, afterward, Republican or Democratic as convenience warrants. However, Walter Parker and his injurious functions can best be disposed of by interesting better men in public affairs. Parker is what he is because good men are not always good citizens.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

San Francisco a Republican City? The most significant fact in San Francisco's municipal campaign is that, of the registration to date, 56 per cent is Republican, 22 per cent Democratic, 10 per cent Union Labor. This is said by astute politicians to reflect an undercurrent, silent but powerful, of dissatisfaction amongst laboring men with the political methods of the labor leaders, McCarthy and Casey. Both these men have been juggling candidates and sparring for control in the Labor Party, though they will probably drop their differences in time to combine their factions on one ticket. But a lot of labor men believe that McCarthy and Casey are playing politics rather than making a straightforward effort to get union labor worthily represented, and they are registering as Republicans and Democrats in hope of sounder nominations from those parties. If the "regular" and the independent Republicans unite on a clean ticket, they have apparently a clean sweep in prospect next November.

The Memory of "Tim" Sullivan Several things, however, seem to stand in the way of a united Republican front. The only Republican candidate for the mayoralty nomination who has definitely come out is William H. Crocker, "the retired mill man, not to be confused with William H. Crocker, the active millionaire man at the Woolworth bank," as one man phrased it. Crocker's political manager is "Tim" Sullivan, who, the Lincoln-Roosevelts declare, was a renegade in the last campaign, posing as a reformer for practical purposes only and jumping to the machine at the critical moment. Sullivan was the moving spirit in the one or two unfortunate compromise alliances made by the League in San Francisco during that campaign, and his activities have not been forgotten nor is his identification with a Republican candidate going to help toward a united Republican party next fall.

Independent Republicans Further evidence of this state of affairs is the formation, a couple of weeks ago, of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, with practically the same leaders as the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and some new men besides, representing the reform element of the party in the local campaign. These men have profited by the mistakes of the last campaign, and with an organization of eighteen permanent clubs in the assembly districts are determined to force the machine to put up a clean ticket or be whipped. The new League is formed primarily to represent reform Republicans in the local issues of the city election, but its fundamental principle is the same as that of the old: to cleanse government of the political contamination which has been the bane of the members of the advisory committee that launched the movement have their doubts of the full sympathy of one or two of their fellow members regarding this principle. It is possible that a reorganization of the committee may become necessary as this organization develops.

Labor Politics The Labor candidates for mayor are pretty much in the air. Casey is toying with Andrew J. Gallagher, secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council, on the one hand, and with Frank J. Sullivan, the recent convert from Democracy, on the other. We are informed on credible authority, by the way, that Father Yorkie is responsible for Sullivan's hold play for labor favor. Sullivan is a brother-in-law of James D. Phelan. One of the strong candidates for the labor nomination is Harry I. Mulerevsky, the county clerk, who is especially anxious because he believes he will have the fight of his life if he runs again for his present office. His troubles are increased by the fact that his own deputies are doing everything they can to keep him from getting the nomination for mayor. "Where do we get off if he does?" is their philosophy.

Rejuvenated Good Government League A hopeful sign of the times is the enthusiastic rejuvenescence of the Good Government League. From a moribund condition it has suddenly taken on a great activity; its membership is increasing, and its meetings are largely attended by earnest men of all parties. It will undoubtedly figure strongly in the campaign. It is non-partisan. A great part of the voting on election day will be non-partisan, too, but it seems unavoidable that nominations must be mainly partially made.

McNab's Dilemma An amusing feature of the political complication is McNab's dilemma. He personally favors William H. Crocker for mayor. Crocker is managed by Sullivan, and McNab and Sullivan have that regard for each other that the Kilkenny cats had for one another. A political rapprochement between the two would have to be carried on through the bars of a couple of cages. To further discomfit McNab, he is bound up so tight with Coroner Leland that he can't break loose without a complete rupture, and Leland insists on being a candidate.

The Fattest On Record Of the making, and unmaking, of laws there is no end, and the present governor of California is not very useful as an obstructionist. He has given his approval to about 750 acts of the legislature, about 200 more than two years ago, when he took the easiest ones out of the pile and let the rest go for want of time or inclination to consider them. This time he has been given more time by constitutional amendment and may have felt more inclination to oblige legislators by the fact that there is a campaign ahead. The statute book for 1909 will be the fattest on record, but its tendency ever has been to grow session by session a little faster than the state and certainly faster than any need for legislation. Fortunately most of the acts are entitled acts to repeal or amend other acts and not much really new law is made. If it were otherwise our condition would be deplorable. Legislation is mainly tinkering with mainly tinkers who are doing it, but this is about equally true whether in parliament, congress or legislature.

Appropriations Are Very Heavy However Governor Gillett may deport himself with reference to the subject, he certainly is disposed to give to those who ask—appropriations. His approval of appropriation bills two years ago was a record-breaker, and this year he approves appropriations, including the general appropriation bill for the support of state government, aggregating about $2,000,000 more than two years ago. However, it is not fair to grumble at the aggregate of appropriations and not grumble at appropriations in detail. Further comment will therefore be reserved until the finished schedule is before the public.

Does Not Sound Altogether Sound The reason given by Governor Gillett for refusing to sign the bill specifically extending the power of eminent domain over private water companies, so that their properties may be condemned on behalf of municipalities, does not have the true ring to it. If, as he declares, this measure is necessary for the reason that a court has so held in the Brooklyn case, at least it cannot be worse than unnecessary and that risk is not so serious as to counterbalance the advantage of making assurance doubly sure. The preference of judges for judge-made law rather than for statutory enactment may make the Brooklyn case important in the eyes of the judiciary of California; but should the Spring Valley people find another court holding a contrary doctrine, than which nothing is likely to be easier, how is it to fare with San Francisco? Without wishing to be unduly invidious, attention may properly be called to the fact that Spring Valley is regarded as one of the allied interests of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company which made James N. Gillett governor of California.

If the Same Be True With reference to the other measure, important to San Francisco, which the governor has declined to sign it is to be said that if the facts are as he is reported to have stated them: that the bill allowing a city six months after condemnation proceedings have been concluded in which to vote bonds, sell them and make the payment, made no provision for maintaining the interim, either explicitly or by operation of law, then the measure was defective, deserved not to be signed and the men who drafted it were strangely lacking in foresight. Judgment reserved until the makers of the measure are heard from.

A Municipal Clearing House Mayor Alexander of Los Angeles has inaugurated a system for keeping in rapport with the citizenry that should be productive of good results both to official life and to the citizenry. He has invited all citizens who find anything out of joint in city affairs, any fire-trap menacing life or man-trap menacing public morals, or whatever else concerns the moral and physical well-being of Los Angeles, to sit right down and write to the mayor the full particulars. These letters will be carefully read in the executive office and duly assigned to the proper official for verification and action. The receipt of the communication will be acknowledged and a report from the proper official required after investigation. There is nothing that keeps a public official so attentive to his duties as looking at him. With ten thousand pairs of intelligent, discriminating eyes focused on public affairs in Los Angeles, with postal facilities normal, nothing can go far wrong without being brought up with a short turn. Mayor Alexander is to be commended for this innovation. If now there are ten thousand Angelenos with moral courage enough to sign their own names to their own cause, of complaint, great results are likely to flow from a very simple device. It is right there that the strain is likely to be felt hardest.

Sometimes intelligent people deprecate the bad taste displayed by the public in its choice of reading matter, as indicated by the records of public libraries. The depreciation is justifiable enough, but—query—do not intelligent people owe something to the public in the way of endeavoring to provide it with librarians and assistant librarians who are competent to educate it to higher literary ideals? As it is, such officials sometimes are either incompetent or grossly negligent of their high privilege in the matter. Here is a case in point.

An acquaintance of mine took a friend's card to the Berkeley public library, and said to a person in attendance there:

"I want to get a book for the owner of this card, as he is unable to come. He wants a good book, not trashy, but of genuine merit." Now, here was a chance, was it not, for the library attendant to do a little missionary work in the way of encouraging a taste for good books? Did she eagerly avail herself of it? Not an eager avail that anybody noticed. What she did was to reach out her hand for the book nearest her, make a record of its number and pass it out to the inquirer, with the remark, "This is a good book."

The book thus airily recommended was "The Brass Bowl," and there may be ranker and more rotten bits of alleged literary work, but I hope that no friend of mine will have to read them. It is the old-fashioned dime novel, slightly modernized but not improved, and encased in a pasteboard-and-cloth cover. The "literary taste" to which it would appeal would not be literary taste, but a scarecrow imitation of it.

Yet this fragment from the garbage heap of literature was recommended by an assistant in a public library as "a good book!"

About how long do you fancy it will take the public to be educated up to a fairly correct literary taste by means of this sort of aid on the part of librarians or their assistants? Surely not the work of a library know and love books, and so help others to know and love them?

Ever watch a man getting ready to go to a theater, or a party, or something? If you have, you never again will say that tragedy does not touch the little things of life.

"Mary," he says, after he is that far along in the process, "where's my shirt?"

"Why, I suppose it is in your drawer," Mary responds, at the same time winking covertly at their eldest daughter.

"Oh," says the man. Then he makes a dash for the top bureau drawer, madly paws over the laces and frills contained therein, and at last announces in the tone of hopelessness, "That's her!"

"Did you look in the drawer?"

"Course! What do you suppose I've been doing—running an automobile?"

"Which drawer did you look in?"

"The top drawer."

"Well, the middle drawer is yours, just as it has been for the last ten years."

"Oh-h!" says the man; then he goes to the middle drawer and exhumes the shirt. He remembers that the middle drawer always has been his, but, he says to himself, how is a man whose mind is preoccupied with important matters to remember such things?

Now things progress swimmingly until another crisis is reached. "Where is my collar button?" he demands to know.

"Isn't it in the box?"

"Which box?"

"What in thunder is the jewelry box?"

"It's the box we've always kept jewelry in."

"Oh-h!" A search. "It isn't there."

"Is it on the bureau?"

"No, I've looked there."

"Fetch it in the shirt you took off."

"Well, of all the imbecile suggestions—oh-h!" The man has found the collar-button, but he neglects to mention where.

And so it goes. It might be continued indefinitely, but there is such a thing as over-doing tragedy. As the man remarked to me, "It is an infamous outrage, sir, the way women put things away where no man can hope ever to find them."

I look forward to the day when men who brush against one another daily for years will venture to speak as they pass by and will no longer treat one another as if everybody considered everybody else a suspicious and probably nefarious character. But with that day comes I shall be very certain that Time's mighty drop-curtain is about to be raised on the play known as The Millennium.

UP AND DOWN :: THE STATE ::

To look on the youthful and pleasant face of it, one would not judge that the Chico Enterprise has been old enough to vote during the last nineteen years, but it nevertheless is a fact that, quietly and without fireworks, it celebrated its fortieth birthday anniversary recently. The writer does not know what it has been through all these years, but he feels no hesitancy in saying that it is turning out an excellent newspaper to-day.

Now comes the report that Charles F. Lummis may lose his position as librarian of the Los Angeles public library, it having been charged that he is incompetent. At this distance it is impossible to judge of the merits of the case, but, on general principles, it would seem a pity to see Mr. Lummis go. He is a poseur and is spectacular, but he knows the cream of literature from its skim-milk, and this, an excellent qualification for a librarian, is what many librarians glaringly lack.

Judge J. H. Pryor has sold his interest in the Pasadena News to his partner, Lou F. Chapin, and henceforth the latter will "go it alone" in conducting that newspaper. The News was founded by that sterling man and splendid citizen, the late Walter S. Melick, and it is high praise to say that the fine ideal he placed before it always has been maintained. The citizens of Sebastopol, Sonoma county, are to hold a rose carnival beginning May 12th and lasting three days. Money running into four figures will be used to make the carnival a success.

An Oaklander is likely to give Lakeport a somewhat unique industry. He is taking steps looking to the raising and canning of mushrooms in or near the county capital of "the Switzerland of America."

Speaking of Lake county, it is being fairly flooded with prospective railroads in these days. A Napa and Lakeport line has been under consideration for a time now, running into years; it was thought that the Pieta and Lakeport line was assured, and now a line from Ukiah, via Blue Lakes, Laurel Dell and Upper Lake, to Lakeport, is being much discussed. Sooner or later, from all this agitation, a railroad will materialize, and then how beautiful Lake county will boom!

The average eater of horseradish may not consume a great deal of that comestible, but that a large number of such eaters succeed in stowing away a considerable quantity is indicated by the fact that an Oakland man will devote ten acres of land in Sutter county to raising horseradish and nothing else. It seems that he should be able to supply the world, but as he is the owner of a horseradish factory, he probably knows what he is doing.

The El Dorado Republican and the Placerville Nugget have been consolidated into a single newspaper of which W. S. Kirk will be publisher and J. W. Shanklin editor. It is expected that this union of forces will result in a better newspaper.

Orange-growers from Central to Southern California will be interested in the fact that the Santa Fe henceforth will ship that fruit through to Chicago in nearly a day less time than heretofore. The new Belan cut-off makes this fact possible.

THE EUCALYPTUS IN CALIFORNIA

I. THE VANISHING HARDWOODS.

Written for THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY by GEORGE W. PEAVY, United States Forest Service.

[This is the first of a brief series of articles dealing with the various phases of the question of planting Eucalyptus for profit in California. The writer, as a member of the United States Forest Service, may be trusted as an informed and conservative guide. He describes the opportunity, the dangers, and the methods of the important industry. Subsequent articles will be: "The Plantation," a discussion of varieties, soil, and climatic adaptability, and "The Product," a discussion of the returns from Eucalyptus plantations. The Editor.]

The interest which is being manifested at this time, not only in California, but in other parts of the country as well, concerning the commercial planting of eucalyptus trees, renders a consideration of the merits of the whole matter desirable as well as timely. The proportions of the eucalyptus planting movement are apparent when it is understood that fully one hundred companies are engaged either in planting eucalyptus seedlings, contracting to plant acreage, selling acreage in prospect to plantations, or selling stock in companies whose avowed object is to plant, care for, and harvest the product of eucalyptus plantations. In fact, the eagerness with which the public is putting its savings into the coffers of the promotion companies is conclusive evidence that they have properly gauged the psychological moment from the business viewpoint.

Hardwood Famine in Sixteen Years.

The peculiar conditions attending the movement, which favor the astute promoter, result logically from the reckless destruction of the American forests. Statistics collected by the Forest Service show conclusively that at the present rate of consumption the available hardwood supply of the United States will be exhausted in sixteen years. There has been sharp increases in the values of hardwood stumpage and manufactured hardwood products in the past few years, while a limited supply and no prospective decrease in the demand points to a still greater increase in prices. The natural casting about for substitutes for our native woods has disclosed the fact that the various species of eucalyptus are suited to practically all the uses for which the American hardwoods are employed. The area upon which eucalyptus can be successfully grown is limited by the peculiar temperature and moisture requirements of this genus. The hardwoods native to the United States are so slow in growth that they cannot be relied upon to supply the demands of the market for many years to come, but the eucalyptus under proper conditions can be grown to a size suitable for utilization for non-pulp purposes in from ten to fifteen years. Consequently it can be made to appear that California has a prospective corner on the future hardwood market and that exceptional yields will bring fabulous wealth to the man who invests his money in eucalyptus; at least, such is a very mild version of the story told in some of the extra-optimistic circulars issued by the eucalyptus promotion companies.

Eucalyptus Exacting In Soil and Climate.

Without question, there is a great future for the business of growing eucalyptus in California and fair returns doubtless await the man who plants the trees under correct conditions. Success or failure, however, depends on whether or not a situation for planting has been chosen where all the peculiar requirements of the species used can be met in a high degree. Since the various species are very exacting in their soil, moisture and temperature requirements many pitfalls lie in the way of the inexperienced or ill-advised individual who starts out to grow a crop of Australian gums. To determine just what the conditions are which make for success in the venture in order that the planter or investor may reap a profit rather than a disappointment, and that the people may receive the benefit of a useful commodity produced by the legitimate expenditure of time and money, is the purpose of this series of articles.

A matter of primary consideration in planning for the production of any commodity is whether or not there will be a demand for it, once it is produced. In other words, the question is one of a satisfactory market. No thinking man would enter into a business venture unless he felt a reasonable assurance that there would be a demand for his product and that the material expression of that demand would be a price sufficient to cover his initial outlay with fair interest on the investment. Will there be a certain and profitable hardwood market in the years to come? An examination of market conditions for the past few years points to a conclusive affirmative to this question.

Notable Shrinkage of Hardwood Cut.

The hardwood lumber cut in 1899, according to the census, was 8,634,021 M feet; in 1906 it had fallen to 7,315,491 M feet, a decrease of 15.3 per cent. This decrease took place during a period when American industries forged ahead at an unparalleled pace; when there was the strongest demand ever known for every class of structural material; when the output of pig-iron increased 15 per cent.; that of cement 132 per cent.; and even that of softwood timber 15.6 per cent. That the decrease is due to diminished supply rather than to lessened demand seems to be proved beyond question. During the same period the wholesale price of various classes of hardwood lumber advanced from 25 to 65 per cent. Every kind of hardwood found in sufficient quantities to make it useful has been put on the market, and hardwood timber is now being cut in every state and locality where it exists in quantities large enough to be cut with profit. These conditions could not prevail were the decrease in production due to a falling off in demand.

The most notable shrinkage has been in the leading hardwoods to which the public has been accustomed. One which in 1899 furnished over one-half the entire output of hardwood lumber, fell off 36.5 per cent. Yellow poplar, which in 1899 was second among the hardwoods in quantity produced, fell off 38 per cent. Elm, the great standard in slack coorage, went down 51 per cent.

The Diminishing Hardwood Areas.

The main source of hardwood supply is in the lake states, the lower Mississippi Valley and the Appalachian mountains. The greater part of the area covered by hardwoods in the two first named regions can be more profitably devoted to the production of agricultural crops than to timber. Consequently, the principal part of the timbered area there will pass into the hands of farmers who will clear it and turn it permanently to agricultural use. The Appalachian mountains, however, are non-agricultural. There has been no wholesale tendency to clear them for farming. Profitable farming exists as a rule only on the lower slopes and in the valleys. Many attempts have been made to farm the higher mountains, especially in the southern Appalachians, but the farms have been small and generally unprofitable. After the pioneers' patience has been exhausted, the forest has slowly crept back and reclaimed the land from which it should never have been removed. Besides, the low prices which prevailed until a few years ago rendered it unprofitable to bring the timber down from the higher mountains. These conditions mainly account for the fact that the Appalachians have maintained their hardwood production. At the same time, it is only in the Appalachian portions of the mountains that the cut has held up or increased. The truth is that in the Appalachians, as in other regions, the hardwood lumbermen are working on the remnants. The supply is getting short and the end is coming in sight.

Enormous quantities of hardwood timber are required each year for railroad ties, telephone and other poles, for piles, fence posts, and fuel, and a great amount is wasted in lumbering and manufacturing. The present lumber cut of seven and one-third billion feet represents probably not one-third of the hardwoods used yearly. Twenty-five billion feet is certainly not a high estimate. The largest estimate for standing hardwoods sets the figure at four hundred billion feet. If we are using hardwoods at the rate of twenty-five billion feet annually this would mean a sixteen-year supply.

It is only within the past eight years that the prices have begun to reflect the lessened supply. During that period quarter-sawn oak has advanced from $55 to $80 per thousand feet, hickory from $45 to $65, and yellow poplar from $32.50 to $54. These figures indicate the trend of prices in the other and less important hardwoods.

Great Industries Affected.

Several great industries use hardwood timber mainly or almost exclusively for their material. Notable in this list are hardwood lumber manufacturing, the cooage, furniture and vehicle industries, and the industries engaged in the manufacture of musical instruments, coffins and small wooden ware. All of these would suffer greatly and the largest would fail entirely upon the exhaustion of the hardwood supply. Other industries, such as the manufacture of agricultural implements, freight and passenger cars, boxes and crates, use immense quantities of hardwood, while great amounts are used for home furnishings, railroad ties and telephone and transmission poles.

The situation in brief is this: We have apparently about a sixteen years' supply of hardwood lumber now ready to cut. Of the four great hardwood regions, the Ohio Valley States have been almost completely turned into agricultural states, and the Lake States and the lower Mississippi Valley are rapidly following their example.

In the Appalachian Mountains we have extensive hardwood lands which have been culled and greatly damaged by fires. These are practically all in private hands, and while they contain a large amount of inferior young timber they are receiving little or no protection, and even such young timber as exists is making but slight growth. Even if these over-land be rightly managed they cannot greatly increase their yield of merchantable timber inside of from thirty to forty years.

The inevitable conclusion is that there are lean years close ahead in the use of hardwood timber. There is sure to be a gap between the supply which exists and the supply which will have to be provided. How large that gap will be depends upon how soon and how effectively we begin to make provision for the future supply. The present indications are that in spite of the best we can do there will be a shortage of hardwoods in running time at least in five years. How acute that shortage may become and how serious a check it will put upon the industries concerned cannot now be foretold. That it will strike at the very foundation of some of the country's most important industries is unquestionable. This much is true beyond doubt, that we are dangerously near a hardwood famine and have made no provision against it.

Inadequacy of Substitutes.

The belief is common that the substitution of soft wood, metal, and concrete for hardwood will gradually take place as the supply of the latter is reduced. Already the substitution of metal has made much progress. It has replaced the hardwood in a considerable extent in the manufacture of implements, furniture, and cars, and even in the interior finish of office buildings and in general construction work. Concrete has also come into wide use in construction. Yet, prominent as these materials have become, they are not likely to have reached the demand for hardwood, which, besides being retained for the greater number of its original uses, has also found new ones. There is not now much tendency for saw-woods to replace hardwoods, because they have not the strength or other properties to make them acceptable as substitutes. The replacement of hardwood by other materials is to be welcomed where those materials make for better service and cheaper cost. Where they will not, and experience thus far shows this list to be a large one, the problem of a hardwood shortage must be solved in another way.

There seems to be but one practical solution and that is to maintain permanently, under a proper system of forestry, a sufficient area of hardwood land to produce by growth a large proportion of the hardwood timber which the nation requires. This land cannot be found in the Ohio Valley, the Lake States, or Mississippi Valley for reasons already given. A large part of it, however, will be found in the Appalachian Mountains. On the principle of using the land for its highest purpose they should produce not less than 75 per cent. of the hardwood required in this country. The remaining 25 per cent. will need to be produced elsewhere.

California's Opportunity.

The necessities of many industries give California an opportunity. The state can produce in large quantities and quickly, a commodity for which it appears practically certain there will be a demand sufficiently strong to insure a good financial return. Any one who undertakes the commercial planting of eucalyptus, makes sure that the soil, moisture and temperature conditions are correct for the species employed, in which case who plants under correct conditions, may safely assume that the future will bring him a satisfactory return on his investment. These conditions, and the return which may reasonably be looked for, will be discussed briefly in following articles.

STATE NOTES.

Having been successful in its crusade to drive saloons from Fresno, the anti-saloon league feels encouraged to cope with any situation, and so it is announced that it will turn its forces upon Sacramento. There is the making of a strenuous field for such a contest in the Capital City, and the league already has sent its district superintendent out to investigate it. The outlook is warm, but the league thinks of Fresno and takes heart of courage.

The citizens of Modesto propose to paint that city red, white and blue, figuratively speaking, on the Fourth of July. More than $800 already has been subscribed toward the attainment of that end, and everything indicates that the city will be "a hot time in the old town" on Independence Day.

Redlands is to have a university. Work on the University of Redlands, a Baptist institution, was recently begun, with appropriate public ceremonies.

Rumor recently had it that a workman, in excavating a sewer in Santa Cruz, found a gold nugget worth $64 at a depth of fourteen feet below the surface of the ground. As this is not the summer-resort season the rumor seems worthy of note, even in Santa Cruz.

It is reported, with apparent authority, that work on the construction of the San Diego and Arizona railroad, to run from San Diego to Yuma, will be commenced within the next two weeks. The road will be laid partly in the United States and partly in Mexico.

In the San Juan canyon, in the vicinity of Hollister, a mountain lion which has caused more than seven feet from tip to tip was recently killed by William Bingham, the animal first having been treed by dogs. The killing involves a state bounty of $20 to Mr. Bingham.

It is announced that an electric railroad between Santa Ana and Huntington Beach will be completed and in operation between now and the first of July. The line will be a branch of the Pacific Electric system.

SAFE TO TRUST.

Oakland, charged full from the lodestone, has at last become a magnet. And those who look ahead (an awful lot of time is lost by running around) know it. Investors and even speculators are planting their cash there now. Some of it will fall by the wayside and disappear, and some of it will not be as wisely placed as it might. The California Weekly goes all over the state and is read by those who would like to share in Oakland's appreciating values, but who cannot be there to select, respect and safeguard, and to all such we would say that the writer of this has known Geo. W. Austin, at 1018 Broadway, for over twenty years; and our experience is that strangers are entirely justified in confiding to him their correspondence.*

THERE never was a more unfortunate wretch than am I, lying here, in an age when other men are commencing their enjoyment of life in its prime, ill and helpless, crushed and conscience-stricken, and daily and hourly at the mercy of a woman who hates me.

She is not my wife. She would have been had I not acted the part of an infatuated fool, and I verily believe that I should have been happy with her. It is hard to reconcile such a belief with the existing condition of affairs, for I detest the woman nearly more now less than I have ample reason for doing. Yet there seemed at one time no earthly reason why, as man and wife, we should not have lived contented and comfortable together, with love and sympathy, one for the other, in sickness or in health. As is, she is my nurse. I am dependent on her for food and shelter. I am in her power absolutely, for she has but to say the word, and, invidious as I am, I should be taken from my bed and carried to prison. Yet her heart all the time is full of unrelenting bitterness for me, and I should not kind look or word from her till the hour when I die. She is inexorable as Shylock.

Yet, it is barely three years since Deborah Day and myself were sweethearts. She never was a beauty. Older than me by a year, she could never have claimed to be more than passably good looking, even had it not been that when a child she was afflicted with small-pox, which scarred her face considerably; but she was kind-hearted and amiable, with always a pleasant smile and a winning way. She was by no means anxious to be married. Her mother was dead, and she kept house for her father, who had retired from business, and was a man of considerable means. The house they lived in was his own, with the fine old garden and a few acres adjoining, and they kept two servants, besides a groom who looked after a pony and a gardener. I mention this that the reader may better understand why it was that I (who was spoken of as a handsome young fellow), being but five and twenty, should make advances to such a plain young woman as Deborah.

Being matronly and composed, there were half a dozen girls far better looking from among whom I could have chosen.

I need make no secret of it. My position was not a brilliant one. I assisted my father, who was an architect and surveyor, and my salary was but $450 a year. Mr. Day, who was an elderly man, had but two children, Deborah and her sister Alice, whom I had not yet seen, and who since the mother's death had been living with an aunt in Devonshire. It was fair to assume that at his death the old gentleman's money would be divided between the two daughters, and I frankly admit that, at all events, it was a consideration that weighed not a little with me when I commenced to cultivate an intimacy with Deborah. I wish to do justice to one who now hates me. She gave me but little encouragement. I don't believe that she for a moment suspected me of mercenary motives, but she was a girl of shrewd sense and plain speech, and one day when I tried her with some flatterer's flattery, she just turned and laughed at me.

"You must have a very low opinion of my common sense," she said, "or have a particularly high one of your own wisdom. Anyway, I must ask you not to address me so nonsensically again."

"It will be the same thing," I made answer, "if I do or do not tell you that you have the sweetest face I ever saw, or wish to see. I must always think so."

"Then all I can say is there must be something amiss with your eyesight," she retorted. "I know exactly what my face is like, sir. I do it more than justice, perhaps, when I say it is quite a plain face. But it serves my purpose—which is not," she added, with sudden seriousness, "to bestow it with myself on the first good-looking young fellow who wishes to marry me."

"I am thankful, at all events," said I, "that the objectionable proviso does not apply to me."

"Bah! You know better," returned Deborah, shrugging her shoulders, "but you must be insincere, seemingly."

A SHE SHYLOCK

By JAMES GREENWOOD

(From Ballou's.)

"So, I think, are you, if you will pardon the rudeness of my saying so. No young lady wishes for an ugly husband."

"Rather than a one, than a man who loves himself better than his plain wife, after they are married, and neglects her, as well, perhaps, for another. I should hate him," and her gray eyes flashed, and she clenched her small fists. "God forbid that I should ever be so tried, for I believe I should kill him."

That, of course, was after I had proposed to her. I should not have thought her capable of such a fiery outburst, she who was always so equable in temper and undemonstrative. But I had yet to learn the sort of woman she really was.

Well, our courtship progressed, and honestly and truly I learned to love her. At all events, I thought so. Her frank and generous disposition, her unselfishness, and, more than all, perhaps, her sincere affection for me, made me perfectly happy in the prospect of making her my wife, and her father's consent having been obtained, we should have been married, had not the old gentleman died almost suddenly. That, of course, caused the ceremony to be postponed; and Alice Day, the sister, came from Devonshire to be present at the funeral. As I have already said, I had never seen her previously, and as soon as we met I knew she was my fate. She was three years younger than Deborah, and as beautiful as the other was plain. The electrical feeling of love at first sight was mutual between us, and we were equally conscious of it before we had known each other a week.

I suppose I should take all the blame to myself. At all events, being a man, and considerably the elder of the two, I would, of course, be credited with all of it; but an impartial world knows nothing of the woman I was brought in contact with. Of her artful witchery, and her darning, and her utter heartlessness. She might, had she pleased, have checked me at the first dawning of my baseness toward Deborah. But from our very first exchange of meaningful glances she gave me encouragement, and took malicious delight in robbing her sister of her husband, pledged and promised. Deborah had no suspicion that there was anything wrong. It was arranged that our marriage should be postponed until Christmas, it being then the beginning of November, and Alice was to stay at Greythorn's, as the place was called, and be her sister's bridesmaid. I should tell you that the father's will had been proved, and it showed that he was quite as wealthy as he had been expected. To his daughter Alice he left $25,000, and to Deborah the same amount, with the house and grounds, which probably were worth as much more. Alice resented this division.

"She won't have it all her own way, anyhow," she remarked, spitefully.

This was when one of the two months had elapsed since the father's death, and there was no longer any reason why she should not speak openly to me then. The whole scheme of treachery had been discussed between us, and resolved on. Her money was at her own disposal. It was already banked, and she had her own check book, and could have drawn out every cent of the $25,000 at short notice.

We arranged our plans so cleverly that when the day came for us to take our departure, Alice and I were being married at Bournemouth, while "old Deb," as my beautiful young wife laughingly called her, was probably looking out from the parlor window at Greythorn's, and wondering how much longer Alice would keep the dinner waiting. Next day I wrote Miss Day a long letter, in which I expressed my deep regret for the annoyance and disappointment she would naturally feel at what had happened, at the same time begging her to try and think it was all for the best. I admitted that my behavior toward her was in the highest degree reprehensible, and added, with wanton mockery (my wife was looking approvingly over my shoulder as I wrote), that I was deserving of severe punishment, and should probably receive my due at the hands of a just Providence, in shape of agonies of anxiety and jealousy that inevitably the portion of a man who, in rash haste, marries an exceptionally beautiful woman. My wife added a postscript, imploring her sister's forgiveness, but we received no reply, and after a while we went on to the continent and were happy.

We went to Italy and to Germany, and made a stay at Baden-Baden, where my wife found the fascination of the gaming table irresistible, and we there made the acquaintance of a young man, whose father was a wealthy banker. He was a reckless profligate, and with whom appeared to be unlimited means at his command, lived in magnificent style, and gave balls and parties that must have cost hundreds of dollars. He, too, had a passion for gambling, and his amazing luck was the envy of all the other players. I never played myself, but my wife's constant rearing temptation, and "for good fortune's sake" she almost invariably sat next to the banker's son. Before the end of the season she had lost all her money. I was unaware of it, for she kept the fact from me, and kept on playing, and was highly excited, and, as it were, a good deal extravagant, when one day it came to my knowledge, quite by accident, that she was indebted to young Wilbraham, as I will name him, to the extent of $7,500—not in the way of a gambling debt, but money borrowed. It was not until then that I could cool a little, and I could call to mind many instances of familiarity among them passing the bounds of ordinary friendship. But it never entered my mind to suspect him. Had he been a showy, handsome fellow I might have done so; but Mr. Wilbraham was an under-sized, plain-looking person, with weak eyes, that made it necessary for him to wear green spectacles. He was lame, too, and walked with a stick. I accused her of the uncompromising indiscretion of concealing the debt, and she at first flatly denied it (I had never before known her to tell me an untruth), and afterward on her knees confessed it. At the same time she most solemnly declared that it was an act of pure and disinterested friendship on Wilbraham's part, and that he had never behaved toward her otherwise than as a gentleman. I had no proof to the contrary, and knew not what to do. To make the matter commonly known would have been to expose my handsome young wife's conduct to scandalous comment; but it was impossible for me, as an honorable man, to remain silent and take no action. Had we possibly been married, the easiest way out of it, of course, would have been to repay the borrowed money, and quietly take our departure; but my wife was compelled to own that of the $7,500 the gaming table had absorbed all but $1,250. The one thing, however, I was determined to do, was to return at once to England, where, with the scanty remnant of her wasted fortune and the realized value of my wife's expensive jewelry, we might provide a modest little home, and I could, probably, prevail on my father to renew my employment with him. To this she, with apparent willingness, consented, and even suggested that we might economize our means by slipping away, leaving our serious debts and our somewhat heavy hotel bill unpaid. But the accounts were settled, and, further than that, rather to my surprise, it appeared to me that it really did seriously touch my conscience, on the eve of our departure I sent Mr. Wilbraham an I. O. U. for the sum of $7,500, with an intimation that I would remit the amount as soon as possible after our arrival home. But now I have to tell of how possible it is that beneath a woman's fair exterior there may lurk the spirit of a devil incarnate.

I have no proof that my beautiful wife administered to me a deleterious dose, but all things considered, I think it highly probable that she did so. We were to start from the hotel by an early train in the morning, but on the previous day I was taken seriously ill with excruciating internal pains, and next day could not rise from my bed, and the attack rendered me so weak and prostrate that I was invalided for more than a fortnight. At the end of that time, and while I was in the midst of again preparing to go away, I was arrested for the amount of my indebtedness to Wilbraham! My wife, who had nursed me most assiduously during my illness, wept, and appeared quite overcome with grief. She suggested that she should go to Wilbraham and endeavor to arrange matters, but this, as I need not say, I would by no means allow. So, being unable to pay, I was sent to prison.

I am ignorant of, and, therefore, cannot describe, the legal formalities applying to imprisonment for debt in that part of the country, but at the expiration of six weeks I was let out of jail. I had spent nearly the whole time in the infirmary. The doctor there informed me that I had been poisoned; that I had a narrow escape, and that it was doubtful if I should ever again recover perfect health. How correct his dismal prognostication has since been verified. My wife had not been near me for a fortnight, but that did not alarm me, as the rules of the prison were peculiar as regards visitors; but when, still weak and ill, on regaining my liberty I hastened to her, she was nowhere to be found, and in the course of the day I ascertained, beyond a doubt, that she had gone off with Wilbraham.

I made my way quietly to where Wilbraham and my wife had betaken themselves, with the set determination, if I could catch them together, of shooting both. The opportunity was afforded me before I had been three days on the watch, but I was still ill, and my nerves were shaky, and beside that, no doubt, I was half blind with passion when I saw them sauntering up the quiet avenue together, and heard her laugh. I took deliberate, and as I thought deadly aim, for they both fell, he at once, and she after she had run, screaming, a few yards. I got away easily enough as the shots had not been heard. And when, next morning, I saw the newspapers, it made me furious to read that it was merely fright that had caused the lady to faint and fall; the bullet had not touched her, even. But the gentleman had escaped by a miracle, his under jaw being so terribly damaged that it was doubtful if he could survive.

That was something at all events, not enough by half, but better than no revenge at all. I had scarcely any money. So little, in fact, that arriving in England in a very few days, I had to sell my watch. My intention was to go to my father, but I found that he, as well as my mother was dead, and the old home a thing of the past. My means gradually dwindled, and I was too weak to work. I grew so impoverished at last, that the doctor who visited me at my poor lodgings, recommended the hospital as the best place for me; and there I was carried. They were mistaken in my symptoms, I suppose, for I was told if I was desirous of communicating with any one, I had best do so without delay. I knew what that meant. I was going under a false name, and so no one knew me. There was only one person I wished to see, for the mean trick I had played her haunted my conscience. But I had no hope that she would come to me. I wrote to her, however—to Deborah Day, of course, I mean—and the letter being posted over night, by noon next day she was at my bedside. She had much changed; she had grown older and more stern looking, and her hair was streaked with gray.

"Why have you sent for me?" she asked, coldly.

"To implore you, as a dying man, to forgive me," I replied. "You would not refuse, did you know how sorely I have suffered, and how

AUTOMOBILE NOTES.

The first gasoline automobile ambulance ever used on this coast was recently sold by the Studebaker Bros. to C. A. King of San Francisco, who will use it in local ambulance service.

The progress made in vehicle construction from the time of the Egyptian chariot down to the modern automobile is handsomely illustrated in connection with decorative panels in a book entitled "Progressive Locomotion" just issued by the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, Akron, Ohio. A second section of this work is devoted to an illustrated "history" of the automobile tire, showing the methods used in harvesting crude rubber in the tropical forests and combining it with cotton in the manufacture of Firestone automobile tires.

Contrary to the popular impression rubber is not derived from the sap of the tree, but from a milky juice found only in the bark. With 400,000 acres under successful cultivation and large areas ready to produce there is no great danger of the crude rubber supply being exhausted, notwithstanding the enormously increased demand for tires and general rubber manufacture.

terrible is the penalty I have had to pay for my mad infatuation. You see what a poor wreck I am."

I was so weak that as I spoke the tears trickled down my cheeks, but they had no softening effect on her. With a face of stone she sat by my bedside.

"Tell me all about it," she said.

And I told, disguising nothing—not even the fact that I had shot the man, of whom my base wife was enamored, and who, for aught I knew to the contrary, might be dead. I might as well have made the revelation to a statue, for all the emotion Deborah exhibited. She sat with her face half turned from me, with her thin lips tightly compressed, and her eyes fixed on the opposite wall, till I had concluded. Then after a long silence, she remarked:

"Do you wish to remain here?"
"It is not for such a poor stricken wretch as I am to choose."

"I offer you a choice. Will you remain here, or will you be taken to my house?" There was no compassion in her tones, no softening of the grim set of her features, which made her offer the more amazing.

"God bless you! Since in—"

But she held up her hand.

"I have no mercy for you," said she, "no feeling of pity. I promise you nothing in the Luther Burbank's birthday was set aside as California state bird and arbor day through the efforts of the California Club.

An unfinished and hitherto unpublished novel by Taine, the great critic, is now appearing in the Revue des Deux Mondes, under the title, "Etienne Mayran."

Cyril Maude, in his history of the London Haymarket Theatre, likened Bernard Shaw's activities at rehearsals to those of a personal devil in their demagogical irritations.

Norah Davis, the author of the new "Wallace Rhodes," a novel of New Orleans society, once served as clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alaska.

Mrs. R. H. Tucker of Spokane, Wash., is said to be the first woman wireless operator in the world. She is in charge of the station on the steamship Indianapolis, plying between Seattle and Tacoma.

Professor Senator, the venerable president of the Berlin Medical Society, is charged with bribing wealthy patients, principally foreigners, to his clinics, and has resigned his office pending an investigation.

Mrs. Ellen M. Richards, instructor in the department of chemistry at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has accepted a call to lecture in the summer school of the University of California. She will come in June and will give a course of lectures on household economics.

Mrs. Henry Villard, Mrs. William M. Ivins, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, the Rev. Anna Shaw and Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Millen are among the American women who are going to London to be present at the suffrage quinquennial which takes place in the week of April 26th to May 1st.

Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn writer, recently celebrated her eighty-ninth birthday at her home in Bridgeport, Conn. Her health is good and her mentality sound. Grover Cleveland was one of Miss Crosby's instructors when she attended the New York Institute for the Blind in her youth.

Robert Womack, the man who discovered the riches of the Cripple Creek regions, is now paralyzed and poverty stricken in Colorado Springs. However, he declares, and his friends believe him, that he knows where there is an enormous deposit of gold in the Pike's Peak region that will rival Cripple Creek.

Mrs. Tomas Estrada Palma, widow of the Cuban patriot, has returned to the United States and will spend the remainder of her days at Central Valley, Orange county, New York, where her husband was teaching school when he was notified of his election as first president of Cuba. Mrs. Palma gives as the reason the love she has for the land that sheltered her husband and children in exile.

The poems of James Whitcomb Riley are favorites with the composers of songs, and hundreds of musical settings have been provided for them. The one which has been most frequently set to music is probably "A Life Lesson" (better known as "There, Little Girl, Don't Cry"). Among the composers who have tried their skill upon it are H. A. Norris, P. A. Schnecker, H. B. Vincent, C. Forsyth, C. Sosbeski, Mary K. Wood and J. Jordan.

Here are some of the prices which some of the grand opera stars receive per performance at concerts or private entertainments: Enrico Caruso, $5,000; Geraldine Farrar, $1,700; Alessandro Bonci, $1,500; Olive Fremstad, $1,500; Johanna Gadski, $1,500; Emmy Destinn, $1,200; Berta Moresa, $1,000; Louise Homer, $800; Antonio Scotti, $800. The following singers each earn a total of more than $100,000; Caruso, Bonci, Geraldine Farrar, Fremstad, Sembrich, Melba, and Tetrassini.

way of kindness. I am your inexorable enemy, and would not pardon either of you through my eternal doom depended upon it. Still, you shall have the asylum in my house, if you desire it. You are not, as you have been led to suppose, a dying man. It was thought so when you were brought here, but I have spoken with the physician, and he tells me you may live for months or a year, maybe. Do you accept my offer?"

What was I to think, but that despite her bitter utterance, she still retained some regard for me, or why had she come at all, unless she wished me well, for all that I had wronged her? Why was she willing to have me under the same roof with her? I gratefully accepted her offer, and the next day went in a carriage to Greythorn.

It was three years since I last saw the place or crossed its threshold. Deborah was not there to receive me. She had provided a qualified nurse, and she it was who escorted me to the room that was to be mine. It was late, and I was tired, and went straight to bed.

When I awoke next morning, the first object that greeted my opening eyes, caused me to start up in uttering my hateful wife's name. There she was before me. Not in the flesh, but in shape of a marvelously truthful portrait, her winsome smile, the parted lips showing her pearly teeth to the very life. The last time I had seen that smile was when skulking behind a tree in the avenue, I saw her coming toward me, leaning on the arm of the scoundrel Wilbraham. It was not there the night before, or if so, it was covered with the cloth that now lay on the floor. I had never seen the portrait previously. It must have been painted before she came from Devonshire. Why had it been hung in the room? I dared not look on the detested thing, smiling down on me in mockery and derision. With my back to it, I hurried on my clothes and rang the bell.

"It was Deborah Day herself who came. 'That horrid picture!' said I, covering my eyes. 'Have it removed, for heaven's sake! The sight of it will drive me mad. Why—why was it placed there?'"

"By my desire, and for your punishment," she made answer, with a stony face, and speaking quite calmly. "You had best become reconciled to it, for here it will remain as long as you are here."

"Then that will be a very short time; indeed, I would sooner wander the streets, or go to the workhouse. I will go from your abode, cruel woman!"

"To a jail if you leave at all," she sternly interrupted me. "You came of your own free will. I have not deceived you. I told you I was your inexorable enemy, and I am. You are here, and your wife shall have you company, day and night, as long as you live, be it one month or fifty. That, or you go from here to a prison. I know your story, and a word from me will cause you to be arrested for attempted murder. You are not a prisoner at present. The doors are open, and if you choose to leave you may."

That seven months ago and I have not seen her once since, and the cursed portrait still hangs in its place to torture and torment me. I am well cared for, and have every comfort money can purchase, but the hateful smiling face haunts my dreams, and dawns to life in the gray of the morning. I have written imploring letters to Deborah, begging that it may at least be screened with a curtain, but she makes no reply.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Trial By Jury In Civil Cases.

In suits at Common Law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact, tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of Common Law.

So reads the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It relates, of course, to civil actions, actions having to do with property and not with criminality, but even regarding their disputes over property our forefathers felt safer to trust their interests to their neighbors than to a judiciary independent of public sentiment, or as nearly so as conceivable. The people of those days were fearful that courts might come under the influence of higher powers capable of oppression. That fear was not groundless.

Reference in the amendment to the Common Law may need to be explained to young persons, and if older persons understood the principles of the Common Law more clearly they would the more safely be guided through the affairs of life. It is a wonderful repository of common sense, and the nearer our jurisprudence sticks to Common Law principles the more certainly will it be found to promote justice and not injustice.

The Common Law, then, had its origin in the customs which grew up among the common people in their dealings with each other. The world is making such law all the time and it is generally good law because it fits the needs of the people who make it at the time it is made, where it is made. This is not saying that it will always be good law, for the conditions of life which caused certain customs to be established may be so changed as to cause new customs to take their places, but it is a principle of the Common Law that when the reason for any of its rules of conduct fails the rule fails with it.

For, after all, a law is only a rule of conduct prescribed by some power having authority to make a rule, commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong. In our country that power emanates from the people themselves, or is presumed to. It does this in three principal ways: by force of the habits—customs—of the people, by judicial decision, by legislative enactment.

A custom, in order to be worthy of recognition as a law, must have so long prevailed that no one remembers when it was not the custom. That gives it the force of law and courts will recognize it as having validity.

Courts, in our day, generally disclaim law-making functions. They gravely state that it is not the purpose of the courts to make law, but only to construe it, that is, to explain it and fit it to cases as they arise. That is a time-honored legal fiction. Courts do make law, lots of it, and generally very good and intelligent law. The old custom, bad customs, out of existence and procure the acceptance of better customs in their place, but they also lose themselves in labyrinths of their own making, build intellectual cob-houses that fall down upon their own devoted heads and the heads of the common people to the common injury. They, too, finally have to come back to the customs of the people for the ratification of the laws they make.

Of all law-making powers the legislatures and congresses are the worst sinners. Their safest function is to crystallize into statute, for convenience of expression, what rules of action the people have evolved out of their every-day experiences and the courts have sanctioned by applying them to cases that come into court for adjustment. But legislatures are seldom content with this modest function. They want to make customs what they fancy they should be instead of what they are, with the result that nearly all legislative enactments are entitled, "An Act to amend an act entitled an act, etc.," or else to repeal, all because the legislative scheme did not work in practice as it was hoped that it would. Customs always work because they could not have become customs had they not worked, but laws never work well until they become customs, and if people will not have them for customs that is the end of them no matter if they do begin with, "The People of the State of California, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows." If the legislature which lately adjourned had enacted that salutation should hereafter be by rubbing noses instead of shaking hands, not a nose would have been rubbed in consequence or a hand foreborne to be shaken. It will be even so with many laws that were enacted. They will be dead letters on the statute books.

This, then, is the Common Law referred to in the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States. We derived the bulk of it from mother England, where it grew out of the customs which obtained among our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. At the Revolution our Common Law and the Common Law of England parted company, although the two have kept within speaking distance of each other. Ours has been more modified by legislation than England's, hers, perhaps, more by judicial decision than ours. We have suffered the lawyers to make too much of our law, and therein justice has chiefly suffered.

Mrs. Malone's patience was much tried by a servant who had a habit of standing around with her mouth open. One day, as the maid waited upon the table, her mouth was open, as usual, and her mistress, giving her a severe look, said: "Mary, your mouth is open." "Yessum," replied Mary, "I opened it."—Success.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

• The unexpected does sometimes happen, but not often enough to warrant the expectation that the unexpected is to be expected. This is especially so in "organization" politics. Once in a while the men they have politically made refuse to commit political hari-kari to oblige their makers and so unexpectedly make good. Jim Gillis, State Librarian, affords an instance, and Surveyor General Kingsbury appears to afford another. He was Walter Parker's man and, as such, was expected to stand in with the predatory interests in disposing of remaining state school lands in the aid of close-in speculators. He failed of "making good" according to the "organization" standard and is probably now looked upon as an "ingrate." He stood for a law providing for the sale of such lands at public auction to the highest bidder, after due notice given, and, with the aid of Attorney General Webb, secured its enactment, against the influence of the powers that made him Surveyor General. As the result of the first auction showed, with good results to the state. The margin between the $1.25, formerly received, and prices netted by the auction, $2.50 to $4, went to the state and not, as heretofore, to a select group of speculators who always managed to occupy a preferred position as buyers of state lands. This is important as an instance of unexpected good arising out of a bad political system. It does sometimes happen that the associated villainies acquire a Man, thinking that he will prove only a handy tool, but not as often as the public chooses a tool of those villainies thinking that they are getting a Man.

A Loss to the Coast.

In the departure for London of Mr. T. A. Rickard, editor of the Mining and Scientific Press, for the purpose of establishing a similar publication in that mining hub of the world, San Francisco, California, and the Pacific Coast sustain the loss of a brilliant journalist and very likeable gentleman. More than that, the loss is of a man of capacity who has convictions and the courage to stand for them whether popular or unpopular, a man undaunted by opposition and undecieved by pretense. British born and reared, but American trained, he goes from us fitted for that larger citizenship of the world of which the world, for its continued peace and abundant prosperity, stands in constant need. We may be sure that the journal which Mr. Rickard goes to London to establish will be bound by no narrow spirit of provincialism and that America will have in its editor an understanding and appreciative friend.

A New National Issue.

The speeding of automobiles is rapidly becoming a national issue. The auto is here to stay and its influence in social and business affairs will increase from year to year, but suppose that we had a thousand trackless locomotives darting about San Francisco, each one a law unto itself, would such a state of affairs be long tolerated? We have ten thousand automobiles, as deadly as so many locomotives, and every other city has proportionately as many, many of the drivers governed by no law except their own convenience. Society has at least some claim upon the consideration of the drivers of these vehicles, the more especially that all of the roads of the country have got to be reconstructed for their benefit and use. Some day the speed problem will be settled so that it will stay settled. Meantime the advance is marked by a lengthening row of headstones in the cemeteries of the country.

Roosevelt and the Lions.

Word coming from darkest Africa is to the effect that former President Roosevelt and his son have killed some lions. Doubtless there are those besides the higher-ups, and their admirers, whose sympathies are with the lions. The interiors of their anatomies are suffering agonies over the ruthless destruction of God's innocent creatures, especially of the gazelles and wildebeests, the antelopes and zebras, not stopping to reflect that every lion killed means the sparing of the lives of more of the gentler creatures than Roosevelt and his whole party are likely to slay during their expedition. The jungle owes the lion a living and he is as likely to get it as any other brigand. Lest we allow ourselves to be betrayed into needless displays of emotion it may be prudent to reflect that Mr. Roosevelt's parting admonition was: "If you hear anything about me that does not come from me it ain't so."

State Prison Industries.

Secretary W. A. Gates, of the State Board of Charities and Corrections, is doing what has long needed to be done. He is sending out to the press of the state accurate information regarding state institutional affairs. In a circular letter before us he has instituted the following comparisons between the prison industries of California and Minnesota. The total earnings of both our prisons during the last two fiscal years was $152,378.22. Their cost of maintenance for the same period was $879,786.84, or a net cost over earnings of $727,408.62.

Minnesota has but one state prison to California's two, a fact noteworthy in itself, and a prison population of 678 against our 2,603. For the last two fiscal years the earnings of the Minnesota prison were $521,240.94, and the cost of maintenance $264,020.68, leaving a balance to the good of $257,220.26. Every prisoner in San Quentin and Folsom costs California $140 per year over and above all he earns, while every prisoner in Stillwater prison earns $190 a year over and above what he costs.

It may be noted in passing that the Minnesota prison is practically out of politics, whereas the prisons of California are in politics head over ears; but a chief difficulty in California is that the bugaboo of competition of prison labor with free has been allowed to dominate. Organized labor must be shown its error in this particular and when it is shown it clearly it will cease to compel so mistaken a policy as California is following. The state has a right, which should be held unalienable, to supply all its own needs, and the needs of the public subdivisions of the state. Free labor has a right, which should also be held unalienable, to demand that the products of prison labor, sought to be sold in the open market, shall not be sold, grade and quality considered, at less than the going prices of such commodities on a free market. Under such a system of prison manufacture and distribution no one is substantially injured. Under the system obtaining in California no one escapes substantial injury, and the greatest injury is inflicted in the form of an unredeemable and ever increasing criminal population.

All In Being Used to It.

Gentlemen of sympathetic tendencies are scarcely able to restrain their language within the proprieties when they speak of the domination which Messrs. Spreckles, Heney and Burns were at one time supposed to exercise over the city government of San Francisco, and to this day it is a nightmare fresh as though of last night's dreaming; yet these same men lived a quarter of a century under a city and a state government dominated by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company and scarcely a murmur of disapproval escaped them. They were used to that. It was the normal form of government to which they had become accustomed and under the protection, or exploitation, of which they had been brought up. They had come to look upon a policy of political pocket-picking as the natural order, and to see the government transferred to the dominance of gentlemen disposed to arrest the pickpockets, and turn them upside down that their unholy accretions might be shaken out of their garments, looked like usurpation, subjugation, anarchy, tyranny and the whole category of ills to which social order may be subjected. What hasheesh is this that our more prosperous citizens have eaten that they have lost the power of distinguishing good from evil as soon as their kind of people are involved?

ADVANCE BACKWARD.

Legislation regarding the criminal law has, for many years, been in the interests of the criminal. Under pretense of being fearful that some innocent person might suffer a penalty due only to the guilty, our laws and procedures have been so designed and cast as to make it practically impossible adequately to punish any criminal who has the means for putting up a fight against the cause of justice.

With relation to the fear of punishing the innocent William Howard Taft had this to say to the students of Yale: "The emotional and untrue doctrine that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be punished has done much to make our criminal trials a farce. This has come about through popular demand without a full understanding on the part of the legislatures and the people as to its logical effect."

We think that President Taft would have come nearer the truth and he said: "This has come about through legislators who earn a good part of their livings by making shift to keep out of prison persons, able to pay the price, who ought to be in prison, without a full understanding on the part of the people as to what was going on." Another writer has declared that an innocent person now stands ten times less risk of being punished for a crime he did not commit than he does of getting run down and killed by an automobile. Yet if ninety-nine guilty persons were to escape punishment for each innocent person punished society would soon be reduced to chaos and lynch-law would be the law of the land, and the greater part of the lynching that has been done was done because the law's delays and uncertainties outraged the public sense of justice.

The most important issue before the legislature of California at its recent session was such a revision of criminal procedures as would facilitate the administration of justice, yet not one measure important to that end passed the legislature and was signed by the governor. On the contrary, a number of measures were passed by the legislature, and at least two of them signed by the governor, designed to make the administration of justice more difficult and the result more uncertain.

It is due to Governor Gillett to say that he refused to commit suicide for the accommodation of his political masters. He refused to make his name absolutely infamous and his posterity attainted by signing the Johnson "every-criminal-select-his-own-judge" bill and the Wheelan bill giving the court the right to quash the indictment without trial if, in his opinion, the evidence given before the grand jury did not sustain the charge. The enactment of those two measures by the legislature condemns that legislature without benefit of clergy. Not all the perfumes of Araby can make its record smell sweet.

But if Governor Gillett did not commit suicide to oblige his political masters he did so far accommodate them as to commit assault and battery upon his own reputation by "mauling, pounding and otherwise maltreating and abusing" the same. He signed assembly bills 221 and 222. These measures provide for the presence in the grand jury room of a stenographer, the taking down of all the testimony offered and furnishing the indicted with a full transcript of that testimony at the time of his arraignment.

A grand jury is an inquisitorial body, not a trial court. While the law declares that only legal evidence shall be admitted, and that hearsay evidence be discarded, nevertheless the jury is made up of citizens unskilled in the niceties of the laws of evidence and often utilizes hearsay evidence as a clue to lead to evidence more substantial. The jury is not even required to hear any evidence at all on behalf of the accused, though it may do so. It is required to find a true bill if the evidence, untried and uncontradicted, would warrant a trial jury in finding a verdict of guilty.

Now the reduction of the writ of that is said and done at an informal proceeding, and the placing of this in detail in the hands of the accused, gives him opportunity to fortify himself against the prosecution no matter how guilty he may be. It will be easy, under the rigors of cross-examination, to show discrepancies between the testimony of a browbeaten witness in a trial court and the informal talk had with fellow citizens in a grand jury room. The effect of it will be to revolutionize the proceedings of grand juries. It will hamper them. It will make the witnesses timid and chary and so restrict the performance of an inquisitorial service as to make it of little value in detecting crime and punishing the guilty. It was designed to that end.

In the fact that the welfare of the accused is in the hands of nineteen of his fellow citizens and that at least twelve of them must unite in finding a true bill against him, the accused is sufficiently safeguarded as to his reputation. As to his liberty a trial court and jury, and two appellate courts, as well as the clemency of the state executive, stand between him and the loss of that. To state the issue squarely, instead of making progress in facilitating the establishment of justice in California, the enactment and approval of these two measures mark a distinct retrograde movement. In refusing to accept any of the Commonwealth Club bills, the Denman bill to make the nomination of judicial candidates non-partisan, the legislature refused to go forward. The need is that the paramount importance of a reform of criminal procedures shall be forced upon public attention that the next legislature will make a better reputation than the last one and that California may have a better governor to approve the right and veto the wrong.

A NOTE OF CHEER.

Out on the firing line facing graft, greed, successful rascality, the bearing-down pressure of the upper financial stratum. It sometimes looks to the soldier of civic righteousness as it looked to the union soldiers during the battles of the Wilderness, as though he were up against an impossible proposition and was throwing life away to no purpose. At such a moment the soldier of civic righteousness needs to be taken up where he can see out, that he may know how far he has come and so take renewed courage to "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer."

Such a service is being splendidly performed by William Allen White in the American Magazine. In his series of articles under the title of "The Old Order Changeth," he is showing us how far we have come, not only since our forefathers toiled but within the memories of men still in the heyday of usefulness. He shows how the "Interstate Commerce Convention," with a paltry war fund of $22,855 to be used against the united railroads of the country, with a campaign fund of $2,000,000, paid lobbyists and a subsidized press, forced the adoption of the Hepburn rate law and practically broke up discrimination in rates; how the Pure Food Association, without funds, and going up against a combination of poisoners who had millions to distribute annually to the newspapers, nevertheless put the pure food and drug acts upon the statute books of the nation and of most of the states; how much the Civil Service League has accomplished, and how the American Federation of Labor, the National Civic Federation, the Child Labor Committee, the Consumers' League and many other agencies working, unselfishly and self-denyingly, for the public good, have crowded back the cohorts of greed and a crass materialism at every point and are still steadily gaining ground against them.

The extent to which organization for the common good has gone in this country has been little realized. As Mr. White wittily puts it: "Given an idea in common to three Americans, and the best known becomes president, the most effective secretary and the richest of the three treasurer," and there is a new association ready to work and make sacrifice for the common good. Taken through the towns and cities of America there will probably average one society of some kind working for the "Somehow Good" for each hundred of population. There are more such organizations than there are saloons, even in California, several times over.

It looks dark for the prosecution in San Francisco now. It looks as though successful rascality might go unwhipped of justice, save as the infamy of those whose guilt is palpable will attain them and their children after them, but, as Mr. Heney declared at the banquet to John Graham Brooks (one of the nation's staunchest and most efficient soldiers of civic righteousness), the great struggle to enforce the law will at least show us where the trouble is with the administration of justice. When that is clearly seen the remedy will be applied. That is to be the paramount concern henceforth.

There is a dynamic power in a moral concept that not even the gates of hades can prevail against. It is the only thing that can beat the bomb.

HE WAS A RAKE BUT—

Alexander Hamilton was licentious. It is of no use to deny it. He did not. It is not incumbent upon any of his admirers to excuse it for there was no excuse for it. Immorality is a sin against society and with that sin Alexander Hamilton tarnished one of the most illustrious reputations of an illustrious generation. Let the tarnish stay. Dead a century, it still sticks. So be it. What a man says that must he reap. It is a law of God, of nature and of men, and there is no escape from it. But shall this fault blind us to the splendid virtues of that magnificent man? When a scheming husband and wife had plotted to entangle and ruin Hamilton, and he had been taken in flagrante delicto, did he pay them the money they coveted and go about whining that he had been "held up"? Not so. When the threatened exposure came he confessed his fault to the American people, faced the consequences like the true hero that he was, but he would have sacrificed his life before he would have yielded one penny of blackmail. There was manhood for you, not such sniveling hypocrisy as we have witnessed here in San Francisco where bribery that yielded millions in recompense for high crimes and misdemeanors has been sought to be excused on the hypothesis that the guilty had only submitted to blackmail. The American people can forgive anything rather than a sniveling hypocrisy. This was shown when the "Maria" story was brought out with which to defeat Grover Cleveland. His instructions to "tell the truth," squared that. Manhood challenges admiration wherever it is manifest and no man of his time possessed more of it than Alexander Hamilton. The effort to prevent the erection of his statue in Capital Park at Washington is beneath contempt.

The People's Lobby.

Attention is called to our special article on the work of the People's Lobby maintained at Sacramento during the last session of the legislature. It would seem that when the people have elected 120 legislators to look after their interests such interests should be looked after without the participation of other persons or associations, but experience has proven such a presumption violent. Many legislators contrive to have themselves elected that they may represent special, and misrepresent the public interest. The best remedy yet found for this evil is publicity. The press does much to afford that publicity, but it is not always above accepting retainers from selfish interests. No honest legislator can be hurt by having publicity given to his legislative acts, and every legislator who is not honest needs to be hurt. This is the function of the People's Lobby. To help honest legislators and hurt dishonest.

The Star Set Right.

The San Francisco Star, always a luminary of no mean magnitude, devotes half a page to The California Weekly, desiring to know many whys and wherefores, among others, why Judge Lawlor and Chief Justice Beatty are accepted as holding their judicial positions by imperative mandate, and why we think that the lamented Biggy was murdered.

When Judge Lawlor came up for re-election the last time all the powers of political and civic unrighteousness in San Francisco arrayed themselves against him, but the citizenry marshalled themselves for him because they believed in him, as they did for Judge Dunne at the last election, and made his election sure. Therein lay his tenure of office by right of imperative popular mandate.

When certain untoward political interests rallied behind former Justice Garroute with the view of nominating and electing him Chief Justice, in 1902, public sentiment made itself so manifest that the scheme fell through and that same sentiment gave William Henry Beatty nearly 60,000 majority over his opponent at the polls that year.

This is not saying that Justice Beatty did not decide wrong in the Schmitz case, for he did, awfully wrong. His integrity is unquestioned and unquestionable, but his type of mind is not above criticism. In common with his judicial brethren of his time he has come to value orderly processes above the establishment of justice, the letter above the spirit, being in accord with precedent above being right, and justice will suffer at his hands so long as he sits on the bench. This is said without diminution of esteem for his integrity, his sincerity, his ability, his gracious personality, or his knowledge of the law. It is his type of mind that is at fault and that type is the prevailing type, as evidenced by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, handed down this present week, which declares that, while a railroad may not own coal mines and transport their product to market, it may own corporations that do own coal mines and transport their products to market unhindered.

The whole judicial system of America has got to be revolutionized by exalting humanity above property, the spirit above the letter, right above precedent, the substance above the form. Our courts are giving us worlds of law, but mighty little justice in crucial cases, and that long delayed. The revolution against that tendency may as well begin now as at any time, here as anywhere. Procedures are to the law what ceremonials are to religion—easily mistaken for the immortal soul of The Thing itself.

This paper did not intimate that former Chief Biggy was murdered. It does not believe that he was. What it tried to say was that there is no more evidence to justify the theory of suicide than to justify the theory of accident. In fact we have reason to believe that there was very much less reason to accept the suicide theory than the theory of accident. The point we wished to make, and thought we did make, was that, whatever the cause, suicide or accident, the fact that Rudolph Spreckels went to Chief Biggy and confronted him with accusations was not the provoking cause. The effort, emanating from certain quarters, to raise that presumption was cruel, unjustified and ulterior in its motive.

Redemption of the College Man.

The sorry picture of Abe Ruef, the unanny spectacle cut by one or two legislative alumni, have spurred graduates of the University of California, living at Berkeley, to redeem from reproach the college man in politics. The redemption of Berkeley from machine domination is to be accounted for more on this ground than any other. The college graduates got busy. This is not saying that if either of the other candidates for mayor had triumphed over Mr. Hodghead a reign of graft would have ensued. The issue was not between the common people and the higher-ups. It was an issue between so-called "practical" political methods and high-class citizenship. Mr. Spear, for instance, is capable and distinctly not a disreputable politician, but his theory of government is this: "If my friends give me an office I am going to put into office under me those of my friends who did the most for me, and the city will have to pay the freight; but they shan't steal, and the government I will give the people shan't be any worse than governments that have gone before." That is the political machine view of municipal government. Set over against this was the stand taken by the "tennis machine," as the practical politicians dubbed the college-bred leaders, that, "government is for the common good, and there is no other good except the common good. We know no favorites. The best man for the place is the man we are after, no matter where we find him; a full dollar's worth of service for every dollar of taxation with no soft-job rake-offs for any man's partisans."

Twice Wanted, Doubly Blessed.

Rumor has it that President Taft has practically tendered Governor Charles E. Hughes of New York, a position on the supreme bench of the United States, a position he would admirably fill. In fact he would seem to be the man to take Chief Justice Fuller's place when that jurist feels disposed to step down; but the consensus of decent sentiment throughout the Empire State is that Charles E. Hughes is the best man of all others to succeed Chauncey Depew as United States Senator and so become a collaborator with Elihu Root. It seems to be a misfortune that Governor Hughes isn't twins.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A prominent scientist, one whose painstaking integrity gives him a right to the term, "scientist," recently said, in the hearing of the writer, practically this: "I do not feel that I need any religion and I think that scientific men whom I know generally feel the same way. We accept death as a fact in nature and submit to it, not with fear and trepidation, but as part of a universal plan."

Death is a fact in nature. It is part of a universal plan. It should be accepted without fear and trembling, but also buoyed by a boundless hope for something better beyond the grave. Without a religion of some sort, conscious or unconscious, that hope can not enter the heart to sustain it. A dead cat in the air barrel is as much a fact in nature as a dead man borne to the grave by white-gloved gentlemen and wept over by sorrowing women. That fact in nature is a dead fact. It inspires no heart with love, no spirit with hope. It emits no ray of light into the soul and raises no presumption that there is a soul. Dead man or dead cat is all there is to the man who has nothing but science to lean upon.

And what a fact in nature is this thing we call death! All life terminates in death and the most abundant thing in the world is life. The whole earth teems with it. When nature sets out to accomplish a result she does not care how many deaths it costs and, seemingly, neither does history. The very soil upon which we subsist owes its life to death and the one word, "liberty," has, literally enough, cost rivers of human blood and the earth drank it in and made a fertilizer. The atrocities which have lately taken place in Turkey and Armenia are only skirmishes on the frontier betwixt the great armies of progression and retrogression that are ever at war with each other. How can any human being endure the monstrousness of the thing we call death and a dead cat are one? One can not. One would go mad as he saw those he loves drop under the dull thud on the coffin lid unless his soul, unconsciously to him, perhaps, reached out beyond the fact in nature and took hold, upon the "substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen."

Many men, when they speak of having no need for religion, use the thought, "theology" and mistake it for religion. There are theologies and theologies—hundreds of them, some beautiful, some horrible, some simple and some complex. We do not, any of us, know about them except that we do know that they are not religion. Religion is the relation of the human soul to the soul of the universe. Theology is the relation of the minds of men to things that the mind does not know much about. The one has to do with the soul, the other with the mind. They are not the same.

For there must be a soul to the universe, a power somewhere greater than ourselves, an intelligence that is superhuman many millions of times over. The little that we know about human intelligence can know about that superhuman intelligence is so small, so infinitesimally inadequate, as to be almost a negligible quantity. It is as the quantity of air contained in a popgun is to the entire volume of atmosphere that surrounds the earth, as the drop of water to the ocean, as the life of a gnat to the total volume of life that fills the world.

And between the human soul and the Soul of the Universe some relation must subsist. There can be no getting away from that. Whether the scientist detects it or not, it is there, there all the time. Men have sought to express their sense of this relationship the best they could, and one result of this attempt to express has been the writing of theologies. A more important way of expressing it is to lift the eyes toward the zenith and say, "Our Father," and when the soul has called up into the blue for a Father it has seldom called in vain. Into that soul there has come a buoyant hope which "sees a star and hears the rustle of a wing," a consolation that no "fact in nature" can ever afford.

LOCAL OPTION A SOLUTION

By D. M. GANDIER.

This is a subject concerning which there is much confusion of thought. Some people think it is inconsistent to favor local option in license states and oppose it elsewhere. Others think that because the liquor traffic is inherently bad it is a compromise to favor a law which allows some communities to cast the traffic out but does not compel all to do so. Both of these mistakes arise from a failure to grasp the principles underlying local option, and to see its limitations. A man may believe in the right of localities to decide some things for themselves without admitting their right to decide everything.

Two principles have forced themselves to the front in the progress of civilization. One is the necessity of allowing every individual fullest freedom for the development of his own personality. The best results in manhood cannot be attained by trying to run all men into one mould. Each must be permitted to work out his own destiny in his own way. On the other hand, man is a social being. He cannot come to his best in solitary loneliness. The presence and fellowship and co-operation of his fellows is essential to his full development. Society and personality are correlative terms. Apart from society, personality is impossible, and yet society without persons is unthinkable. Destroy the personality of individuals and there would be nothing left but an assembly of automatic machines. This would not be society.

Here, then, are two well established principles: Men must develop together, and in so far as possible each must be allowed to develop in his own way. But if men are to dwell together, if they are to be born and grow up in society, it is evident there can be no such thing as complete personal liberty. Let any one person do as he wishes and the rest of the community could do as they wish unless what they wish pleases this one. Let each try to do as he pleases and the result is anarchy. Personal liberty must, therefore, be subordinate to social liberty. The right of men to dwell together under such conditions that each can get the most help from all is the supreme right of the universe. This means that the mere whims, the likes and dislikes, of the individual must yield to the welfare of the community. So far as possible he will be allowed to develop his manhood in his own way, but whenever his actions affect his fellows he must be controlled in the interest of his own and their welfare. These are now accepted principles in the civilized world. The individual is to have the fullest possible liberty in everything which does not seriously affect his fellows, but in things which do affect them his wishes must yield to the higher right of the community's welfare.

The same principles apply to communities in their relation to one another and to the wider community of county, state and nation. Local option is to the small community what personal liberty is to the individual. If any man wishes to abstain from selling intoxicating liquors, no civilized country will force him to sell them. He has a right not to do so. It is not essential to the welfare of the community that he should sell liquor and therefore he does not have to do it. Everyone will admit that he has the right not to sell. Will everyone admit that he has a right to sell? Not for one moment. Not selling hurts no one, but to sell liquor may very seriously hurt his fellows.

In Crowley vs. Christensen (137 U. S. 85) the Supreme Court of the United States says: "The statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source."

There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not the privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States. As it is a business attended with danger to the community it may be entirely prohibited."

Not to sell liquor hurts no one. Therefore, it is the inherent right of everyone not to sell if he so elects. But selling liquor may hurt others. Therefore, no one has any inherent right to sell and society may prohibit him from so doing.

It is exactly the same with any community. That community is simply a larger person. If it recognizes the saloon as a nuisance, and desires to cast it out, it has a right to do so. Personal liberty gives it this right because the casting out of that saloon does not hurt surrounding communities. The county or state has no more right to force a saloon upon that community than it has to force an individual to sell liquor. It is the right of any community, however small, to cast out the saloon if it wishes to do so. Local option is the recognition of this right. Under a local option law, the sovereign power of the state says to each locality, "We are not going to force the liquor traffic upon you. If you consider it a nuisance and wish to cast it out, you are free to do so."

It does not necessarily follow that every community has a right to keep the liquor traffic because a majority there vote in favor of it. Keeping saloons may hurt the larger community, and therefore that larger community may prohibit them altogether. The larger community has no right to force saloons into a district where they are not wanted, just as society has no right to force any individual to sell liquor, but the larger community has a right to prevent any precinct, city or county from selling liquor just as society may prohibit any person from selling it. If a saloon here is running up a bill which that community over there must help pay, then that community has a right to prohibit the harboring of the saloon here. If a saloon in this precinct is debauching manhood, defiling womanhood, corrupting citizenship and sending out a miasma which threatens the moral health of a vast multitude beyond the precinct line, then the people of that larger territory have a right to step in and change conditions here.

Thinking people are now pretty well agreed that the saloon is such a nuisance, and therefore no small community has a right to retain it against the wishes of the larger community. One precinct may give a majority for saloons, and yet the county as a whole give a majority against saloons. In that case, the majority in the county have rights which take precedence over the wishes of the precinct, and the saloon should be cast out of the whole county. The county has this right because the presence of saloons injuriously affects the whole county. The opposite of this is true. No one can say that the suppression of the liquor traffic in one precinct would hurt others. Therefore, if any community wishes to cast the traffic out it has a right to do so.

This distinction between the right to cast saloons out and the right to keep them is of great importance. It explains and justifies the action of many states which, like Oregon, have adopted laws which permit a majority in any precinct to make that precinct dry even if the county as a whole votes in favor of license, while in the same time any one vote against license that whole county will be dry, even if some precincts have given a majority the other way.

Recognizing this distinction we may consistently demand local option in every state where the sovereign power of the state has the right to prohibit the traffic altogether, and yet refuse to concede the right of local self-government on this question where the sovereign state has prohibited the traffic. It is just as consistent to do this as to hold that every individual has a right not to sell liquor while no individual has a right to sell it, and the community grants him such right. To force saloons upon an unwilling community is barbarous tyranny; to insist on the right of a locality to keep saloons when the majority in the state at large are opposed to them is anarchy; to claim the right of self-protection for every community and yet not of the welfare of state and nation above the wishes of any community is intelligent patriotism.

This latter is what the anti-saloon people are doing when they insist upon local option in license states and work for prohibition everywhere.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

"THE PLANTER."

By Charles J. Woodbury.

It is a compliment to California, and more locally to Oakland, that the "best-seller" of April is Herman Whitaker's "Planter." The first large edition was exhausted in ten days. I do not know of any book during the season that has gained for itself so large a number of readers in so short a time. Edwin Markham, the poet, and now syndicate critic, in an appreciative letter to the author prophesies a sale of 100,000.

Mr. Whitaker, besides three volumes of short stories, has now given us two musical novels—"The Settler" and "The Planter." Whether of thought or act, one can only tell what he has experienced. Into "The Settler" Mr. Whitaker condensed the bitter lessons learned in his early manhood among the prairies and forests of the farther Canadas. And it is eloquent of wrestle with the primitive, even aboriginal life in that northland frontier. In "The Planter," not less effectively, he portrays what he witnessed and endured in the humid heats and unspeakable conditions of the Mexican interior zone. Like the Athenian woman, he has experienced the power of either Diana.

In writing, the fact is half the battle—to have that to tell which is worth the telling. The other half is—how to tell it. The first law of the novel is that it must be interesting. And in these days it is necessary to be interesting at the start. This Mr. Whitaker achieves in "The Planter." No one who reads the first chapter but will feel that he must go on. The style is straightforward, simple, plain. As one reads he cannot but see how generous, nay, what a spendthrift Mr. Whitaker is of his hard-earned wealth. A dozen novelettes are squandered in a panorama of incidents. And the knowledge of his life is displayed by the author is not less remarkable. For the amount and quality of information in the book are extraordinary and timely. Considered solely as a statement of existing conditions in the rubber-belt, the force and value of the work can hardly be estimated from the tidings published a week ago by the Associated Press that the author's life will be forfeited if he ventures there again. It is such disclosures as these that have made him a marked man.

"The oldest and biggest of the plantations on the Amarrilla has sunk half a million gold in it already, and will go on sinking as long as the faith of the installment stockholder hangs out. The capitalization of the Rubero plantation was $2,000,000 gold. In reciprocity it went for $70,000,000 Mexican currency, and their stockholders were mostly women, small storekeepers and country school-ma'ns."

This agio of loss is made formidable by the pathetic exposure of peon and Indian slavery: "The spinning wheels of the automobiles carrying luxurious women on errands of pleasure, the rain-coats and rubbers that protect the shapely shoulders, dainty feet, from the wet, each and all of a thousand articles, down to the nipple in the mouth of an innocent babe, the waterbag in the hands of the merciful nurse, are splashed with the blood of the Yagui. To gratify but one of our lusts, that for gold, we would extirpate a race."

Not without effect have been such statements as these presented in scientific form, though in a novel. Already a new regime is under way, abolishing the old system and in a measure making up their arrears to the enganchadores.

But the high point of the author's art is exhibited in that while his book carries this artillery it is not weighted by it. As a story, the narrative is of absorbing interest, so well told and sustained that the lover of romance is made quite oblivious of the grave facts which address the more thoughtful.

An unusual and elevated light on the "sex problem" also distinguishes the book. What Emerson contrasted in his poems as the celestial and the demonic love, wedding of the soul and animal mating, this is illustrated in the story in a way that cannot but be deeply instructive.

Then another of the attractions the author possesses is his sympathetic portrayal of character. He recognizes the good and evil, the strength and weakness in every individual he presents, so that even the most superficial reader feels the sense of justice done to all; and this with a fine delicacy. Related to this excellence is that of identity of the character with the words put in his mouth so that the reader knows who is speaking without name. The single exception to this is Carruthers' account of his expedition with Boulton for Patricia. It is the language of the author, not of Carruthers.

It should be added that earnest, even severe as the book is, it is never for a moment dull. Humor, and good humor, abound in tropical luxuriance. There are chapters that float in it. But the present conditions of labor and life under the vivid Cancer are the main message. And when that outrage, peon slavery, which has grown so monstrous under the otherwise clement rule of Diaz, is at last slain, not the least among the weapons that reached its heart will be found this keen lance.

THE OCEAN FOGS.

By Evelyn Day.

(For The California Weekly.)

O silent fogs!

Cold sea-born specters of the moonclad night,
How you enfold in mystery the hills,
Familiar shapes to our day-blinded eyes.
Twice-wondered at and terrible you are
Dark-hanging on the shoulders of the world,
White-shining 'neath the light of heaven's moon.

The stars are caught within your moving robes
And drink cool draughts as they slip, one by one.

Behind the hills, or, to that mystic place,
Where day dissolves them, and engulfs their light.

Then silent sleep, with its most subtle hands
Touches our eyelids, and we lose the world;
But feel your silver coolness in our dreams,
And know you resting on the sleeping hills—

Till hark! the larks are calling in their flight,
And mists, and dewy vapors of the dawn
Make known to us the coming of the day—
And sunlight breaks the spell of charmed night.

HOW HUBBARD TOOK IT.

Readers of The California Weekly will not have forgotten the rare roast that was administered to the "Arch Roycroft" in these columns a few weeks since. Some of Mr. Hubbard's enthusiastic admirers were highly incensed, but it will be seen from the following that, so far as Mr. Hubbard himself is concerned, the wound was not as deep as a well not as wide as a barn door:

East America, Lee County, New York.

April 25, 1909.

Dear Friend:

I must thank you for the very excellent article of the Roycrofts in a late issue of The California Weekly. It is good stuff, but I have been wondering whether a man could make money who was really as anxious about it as you think I am. I wonder if there is not something that works against the fellow who goes on and on after the dollar. It seems to me that that is so.

When you are along this way some fine day I hope you will come and make us a visit.
With all kindest wishes ever, I am,
Yours sincerely,

ELBERT HUBBARD
Mr. Elmer Ellsworth Carey,
San Francisco, California.

To this Mr. Carey adds in a letter to The California Weekly: "And then, as if he had not heaped enough coals of fire on my sinful head, he takes one of his dainty books, inscribes my name on the fly-leaf, 'With all kind wishes,' adds his characteristic signature and, in due time, the postman handed me the book. The next time I have occasion to administer inky chastisement to the Chief Roy-croft I shall say: Elbert, I hate to do this; it hurts me more than it does you, but it is for your own good that I do it."

"If I thought," continues Mr. Carey, "that I had imputed to Mr. Hubbard wrong motives, I should be truly sorry, for we have few original thinkers and they should not be made into targets for abuse. In treating the incident as he has, Elbert Hubbard has demonstrated that he is far above the ordinary. Few of us like the lash of criticism, especially when it reaches a sore spot, and fewer still will thank the critic for it as Mr. Hubbard has done."

THE ROYAL MUMMY TO BOHEMIA.

By Charles Warren Stoddard.

Wherefore these reels that my dull eyes greet?

These dancers, dancing at my fleshless feet:
The harpers, harping vainly at my ears
Dead to the world, lo, thrice a thousand years!

Time was when even I was blithe: I knew
The murmur of the flowing wave, where grew
The lean, lithe rushes; I have heard the moan
Of Nifus in prophetic undertone.

My sire was monarch of a mighty race:
Daughter of Pharaoh, I before my face Myriads of groveling creatures crawled, to thrust
Their fearful foreheads in the desert dust.

Above me gleamed and glowed my palace walls:
There gleamed my bowers; and there my waterfalls
Lulled me in languors; slaves with feather tails
Fretted the tranquil air to gentle gales.

O, my proud palms! my royal palms that stood
In stately groups, a queenly sisterhood!
And O, my sphinxes, gazing eye in eye,
Down the dim vistas of eternity!

Where be ye now? And where am I at last?
With gay Bohemia is my portion cast:
Born of the oldest East, I seek my rest
In the fair city of the youngest West.

Farewell, O Egypt! Naught can thee avail:
What tarries now to tell thy sorry tale?
A sunken temple that the sands have hid!
The tapering shadow of a pyramid!

And now, my children, harbor me not ill:
I was a princess, am a woman still.
Gibe me no gibes, but greet me at your best,
As I was wont to greet the stranger guest.

Feast well, drink well, make merry while ye may,
For 'en the best of you must pass my way.
The elder as the youngest, fair to see,
Must gird his marble loins and follow me.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Earth's Unexplored Places.

Somewhere in the back and hidden part of his brain man is likely to carry a vague impression that in order to find the entirely unexplored places of earth he must press in the direction of one or other of the poles. As a matter of fact nothing could be much farther from the truth. There are vast tracts of land on this globe which, for all practical purposes, are as little known as is the country lying contiguous to either the north or south pole. Such a tract is found in central southern Arabia, where absolutely nothing is known of more than 400,000 square miles of land—not even whether it is anywhere watered by a river, although it is supposed not to be. Into this unknown waste an Englishman named Bury is preparing to penetrate this year, and, if he succeeds in doing so, he doubtless will be the first civilized man who has looked upon that domain. Yet another totally unexplored tract may be found in Tibet. Known by name through all times, there still are many thousands of square miles which no eye of civilized man has looked upon. Again, a large part of the interior of South America has never been explored. This list might be continued to considerable length, but already it will be evident that man need not go to the poles to find unknown regions.

Fourth Centennial of a School.

During the present month the four-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the oldest school in London, and one of the oldest in the modern world, will be celebrated. This school is St. Paul's, which was founded in 1509 by Jean Colet, a dean of St. Paul's cathedral, under the name of Jesus school, the name soon being changed to that it now bears. The original building was burned down in the great conflagration of 1666, and the present building then was constructed on the site where the former had stood. Colet's intention was to limit the number of boys in the school to 153, but this number has been increased until now there are 590. Among the notable alumni of St. Paul's have been John Milton, the great Duke of Marlborough, John Leland, the astronomer Halley, the "bloody Judge" Jeffreys, and Dr. Jowett of Balliol.

Platinum Famine Threatened.

It is announced that the world is threatened with a platinum famine, and although such a condition would not much affect industries in general, it would be of serious importance to workers in the domain of science. To understand the situation it must be borne in mind that nearly the entire supply of platinum is mined in the Ural mountains in Russia, 95 per cent. of the total of production coming from there. Since 1901 the production has been falling off steadily, having been reduced from 12,500 pounds in that year to 9,600 pounds in 1908. The cause of the decrease, however, is artificial rather than natural. There has been no diminution of the supply, but one of those combines which are a feature of modern commercial life has secured control of the supply and deliberately limited the output. Science may suffer, but it is its own exchequer which the combine is taking into consideration. So it will be a famine to order, and not the first one of the kind that mankind has known.

Another Connection of West and East.

Every railway which connects the Pacific with the Atlantic, no matter where it runs, is of consequence to both the West and the East, and it is of interest to know that the Grand Trunk Pacific railroad, to run through Canada, soon will be completed. General Manager Edison J. Chamberlain says that a contract for the construction of the 260 miles yet unfinished between the present terminus of the line and the Pacific soon will be placed, and that the railroad will be in condition to handle the west-Canadian crops of 1909. Active work also is in progress on the branch line from Melville to the international boundary line. Fully $10,000,000 will be spent in actual construction work by the company this year, and it is apparent that another transcontinental line soon will be in active operation, far to our north, to be sure, but adding to the coast's competitive facilities not the less.

The Smallest Tree.

How tall must a tree be in order to be a tree? Must it be five feet? Three feet? One foot? However the reader may answer these questions, he will be surprised to learn that a tree only an inch and a half tall, yet perfect in every detail, has been found. The tree is a poplar willow, and the island of Spitzbergen is its habitat. There it was discovered, last year, by George E. Nitzsche, of the University of Pennsylvania. The tree was fully grown, and was merely another demonstration of the recognized fact that extreme cold and abundant life do not go well together. In brief, though perfect in form and a complete tree in every detail, it was stunted, an illustration of what life must become under the untoward conditions that surrounded it.

An Odd Fad in London.

A London correspondent of the Manchester (England) Guardian tells of the latest fad of the queer people who do queer things in the world's greatest metropolis. The fad has manifested itself among those persons who are up to the ragged edge of society, neither quite in nor quite out, and would like to be peacefully reposing on the soft nap of it. They cannot quite afford to own an automobile, nor can they often afford to hire one, and they realize that it is "the thing" to do so. So it is up to them, or they think it is, to make strenuous pretense that they are blithesome automobilists. They do so by calling Art to their aid, and "making up" as persons who have come from an automobile ride and have had no time to clean up as yet. It is easily done—a touch of black oil on the nose or forehead, a little dirt on the cheek, a mussed collar and tie, and a movement of the legs as if they still were cramped, and they are in condition to deceive the public they suppose to be admiring them. The Guardian correspondent says that a great deal of that sort of thing is done in London now, and, this being the case, we reasonably may expect our Willie-boys soon to take notice and act accordingly.

Commercial Supremacy in the Far East.

What nation eventually will hold the commercial supremacy in the far East? For a long time this question has been agitating Great Britain, but her claim now is being contested by Germany, and there are those who contend that Britain's position in the race now on is the losing one. Recently Denmark sent a commissioner to study the commercial condition in the Orient. He had been there eight years earlier, and so was prepared to take a comparative view of the situation. He reports that in Singapore particularly German merchants have gained greatly on their English competitors. In fact, he broadly asserts that they have won the race, attributing the fact to the better business methods of the Germans. His opinion is combatted by some Englishmen who are acquainted with the situation, but some even of these admit that there is much truth in his contention. Oriental newspapers assert that the Danish commissioner's report is accurately applicable to all far Eastern ports. On the whole, the majority opinion appears to be that, however much or little Great Britain may have lost in this field, her hold on her business opportunities is loosening and, to keep her own, she must become more active in her commercial methods.

Keep Looking Up.

When the heart is rather weary,
And the day is somewhat blue;
When your eyes incline to teary,
And a shadow hides the view;
When you dread your task, or fear it,
And with melancholy sup,
Then's the time to urge the spirit:
"Keep a-lookin', looking up."

When your feet are worn with travel,
And your clothing's old and frayed;
When you cannot well unravel
Binding knots that Fortune made;
When misfortune seems to haunt you,
And you're drinking from her cup,
Let not care or trouble daunt you,
Just keep looking, looking up.

CLAY, FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH STS.
OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

"Mothers' Day."

Governor Gillett could not officially proclaim May 9th as Mothers' Day, but his suggestion that it be universally recognized should be heeded, for there is none to whom humanity more fittingly may pay tribute than to the "mothers of men." The day is to be observed in many states, but in none more beautifully, I think, than in Texas, where all men are to wear a white rose, or than it would be here if Governor Gillett's suggestion that men wear a white carnation were adopted.

A little white blossom, all pure and sweet.

The symbol of what we know

Is purer and sweeter than all things else

That here in God's garden grows;

A little white blossom, this tale to tell:

"I love the mother who loved me well."

A little white blossom, more humbly fair

Than all save the mother here

Which whispers us still to the narrow stair

That leads to the heights above;

And so this blossom is on our breast,

Token of all that in life is best.

"Realize" Yourself All Right.

Dr. Julia Seton Sears, of New York, is the latest bearer of glad tidings of great joy to distressed humanity. Her gladsome message relates to "realizing" whatever one may desire. For instance, do you weigh 250 or 93 pounds, and would prefer to weigh 150, all you need do is to "realize" the 150 pounds, and there you are—soon you step on the scales, and are delighted to note that you weigh the coveted 150, neither more nor less.

The "realizing" process is so simple that it is a wonder nobody had thought of it in advance of the gifted Dr. Sears. It consists of forming a mental concept of yourself at the desired weight and then clinging to the concept real hard until it is "realized." I do not know what would happen if your concept should be too curved or too indented for the desired weight, but I suppose that Dr. Sears and Nature would attend to that.

The learned doctor does not say that if you are six feet four or four feet six inches in height you can "realize" yourself to five feet four inches, but of course you can. All you would need to do would be to form the appropriate concept and cling to it, and the wonderful natural law which the doctor has discovered would do the rest.

It is said that adherents by hundreds of thousands are flocking to Dr. Sears' standard and enthusiastically hailing her as the inspired prophetess of a new cult. Verily, the world hath a million fads, and those relating to the body are 999,987 of them. Verily, too, as some sage has remarked, not all fads yet are dead.

Appendicitis.

(Written in the hope that Longfellow will not find it out.)

The shades of night had almost closed,
When pangs rent William as he dozed.
Three doctors came and diagnosed
Appendicitis.

"Oh, don't say that!" a maiden cried;
"Won't ginger tea help his inside?"
But straight the doctors wise replied:
"Appendicitis."

They brought sharp knives, as armed for war,
And cutely carved poor Willie's tor—
So bad, for that's the treatment for Appendicitis.

"Successful operation quite,"
The doctors said, with wierd delight,
And William died that very night—
Appendicitis.

His tombstone chants this tale of woe:
"Though carved with skill, he had to go.
"Too much 'success' laid William low—Appendicitis!"

The Opinions of Rufus.

Speaking of the graft prosecutions. "It's an ill bird that fouls its own nest," said the sympathizer with the Higher-up bribers. Speaking of the graft prosecutions. "You're right," says I, "but never till you fellows began to chirp. I heard that it's equally ill to take a shovel, a pick an' a disinfectant an' try to clean the nest out."

I don't b'lieve the prayer that won't go es deep es the pocketbook 'll go es high es heaven, but, then, I may be mistaken, fer I'm no expert.

One side of every case in court is wrong, and a lawyer's a man who's hired to prove it's right, the size of his pay dependin' on how hard he kin prove it.

I've heered ministers say they'd had a call from the Lord when seemed fer me, after listin' to them, that they must in some way hev got connected with the wrong number.

'Bout this time o' year apples are like some fokes' relegion—too withered to be either nourishin' or valuable.

When I meet some people I can't help feelin' that I'd rather have less sanctity than to hev the kind of 'em.

If most of us men was es decent es our sisters I calc'late we'd be 'tween three an' four thousand years nigher to the millenium 'than we are.

I don't know es it's very strange there's lots of wicked people in this world when we keep such places es the Barbary Coast fer the speshul purpose of lettin' them enjoy themselves.

It's true that a rollin' stone gathers no moss, but I've never been able to see that that was much of a drawback to a stone.

Where Heaven Is Found.

I once was taught that heaven's gate was straight and narrow, so

There were but few who found it, while the crowds went on below.

And I was taught though tortured souls the cooling water craved,

I still might smile, and smile again, to think that I was saved;

The home celestial of the ones who petty Self

And sing, "Thank God I'm not as he," through acorns evermore.

'Twas thus I thought until one day a kindly deed I did,

Unshaped by Self, unwarped by Greed her sorry brood amid;

Then straight I knew, while all the world seemed peace and joy ashine,

The heav'n for which in vain I'd sought right here and now was mine,

And since that day I'er have held, and still

I hold it true,

That heav'n is found, and only found, where deeds of love we do.

A Drama of Sisterly Amity.

It was when the Forum Club, which wears skirts, was electing one of its officials that a drama of sisterly amity was beautifully presented. Mrs. Gaston and Mrs. Alphonse—let us call them that—were the rival but not opposing candidates.

"You take the office," said Mrs. Gaston. "No, you take it," Mrs. Alphonse responded.

"You take it."

"I urge that you take it."

"I insist that you take it."

"I trust that everybody will vote for my capable friend," said Mrs. Alphonse, turning to the other members present.

"I urge everybody to vote for my accomplished friend," Mrs. Gaston remarked to the same audience. Finally one protested more than the other, and so the other one was elected.

All of which reminds of two women who eagerly wish to pay each other's fare on the street car.

"I'll pay it," says one.

"Oh, no, I'll pay it."

"Do let me pay it!"

"I should really prefer to pay it, dear."

"But I have the change right here."

"So have I."

Finally the one who really has ten cents pays both fares.

When the men heard of that Forum Club election they smiled that dashed superior smile of which brute man is capable. But why? Are man's proceedings, when there is an election in the Nint', for instance, an improvement on the methods of the women? The boss and his herded human cattle; the securing of votes by threats, cajolery, deceit and even by bribery—are these things more admirable than a courtesy which, even if somewhat strained, recognizes the amenities and deencies of life? And of such things men's elections too frequently and too largely are composed.

Answer the foregoing questions as you please, but, for my part, I hold the women's way superior, and so this may be considered a tribute to it, a tribute which should not be considered wholly lost even if somebody did imagine she saw a smile on my countenance as I wrote.

Her Sweet Blush.

"Did you ever know a girl who had a more pink-and-white complexion than she?"

"I don't know that I did, but her brother claims it is objectionable in one respect."

"What is that?"

"Why, he says it requires an alcohol bath to get entirely rid of it."

The Pygmy Men of Selshtown.

The pygmy men of Selshtown,

Whose king is Sordid Greed,

Whose battleries is, "Starve and die,

If I on fatness feed";

Their cunning mines are laid full deep

'Neath ways by brothers trod,

And rare success their souls would reap—

If but there were no God.

The pygmy men of Selshtown,

Their luring traps they lay

"This sudden strife is all of life,"

They cry, then go their way;

And deep they dig, and dark they dig,

Their days a gilded blur,

And theirs would be a triumph big—

If ne'er a God there were.

The pygmy men of Selshtown

Their brothers' blood condemn,

And bitter tears of sin-cursed years

Are on their garments' hems;

They dig to chorus of man's woe,

A chorus sad and deep,

And wondrous trophies they might show—

If God for aye would sleep.

The pygmy men of Selshtown,

How much they miss, how much!

The peace of life that calms its strife,

Dear Nature's soothing touch;

But still they go their crafty way,

Unheeding him who weeps,

Clutch tinsel baubles to their clay—

And God the record keeps.

Another Point of View.

"You know it is written that the poor we have always with us."

"Yes, drat it all, that is the trouble."

"What do you mean by that?"

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Sacramento, Cal., May 1, 1909.
Editors of The California Weekly.
Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading the last copy of your paper. For some weeks I have thought to give you my mind in reference to its worth. For me, the "Hearst" principle of "Living" is the most important part. Do not leave it out. The people you reach need just such material. New in our world is a "quotation" to do a little effective preaching that the ordinary man cannot do. Success to you in your great mission.
Yours sincerely,
TODD CLARK.

If the purposes of The California Weekly were to be set forth in a sentence or two it would be, first, to emancipate California from government by a great and greedy association of corporations and restore government by the people; second, to so revise our criminal codes and courts as to make the punishment of malefactors of great wealth as speedy, certain and just as in the case of the humblest citizen who has transgressed the laws; third, to inspire the readers of this paper to look up and see out beyond where the sky and the earth usually come together that their walk through life may be sustained by a power not of themselves and their pace quickened by a glorious hope. There are those who would reverse this order. That is their job, not ours.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: As a subscriber for your paper and as one who is interested in the struggle for universal equality before the law, I cannot help commenting on the criticism in your latest issue that the style of your publication is not sufficiently virile or bright. It is not strikingly virile or bright; it is true; but it does possess the quality of courage and reveals an honesty of purpose that cannot be questioned. It may not be as attractive as as profitable as the effervescence of Hubbard or of the fifty thousand dollar Hearst editor, but I believe it will prove more effective. It is not anything if not appropriate. I hope you will not change it. There is nothing which is so apt to weaken a writer's love for the truth as a constant aim at brilliancy.

My only fear for the policy of the Weekly is that it may fall in with the maudlin, sentimental tendency of the times to urge legislation which proposes to protect the "weaker brother." Let us have no legislation of any character which places a premium on weakness by protecting the weak. It is not only just that those who are strong, intellectually and morally should dominate but it is desirable. Let us bear this constantly in mind and not compromise our attitude toward privilege by advocating movements which can result only in rendering our entire position justly assailable.
Respectfully yours,
C. G. EDWARDS.

Our correspondent may rest assured that the temper, tone and timbre of The California Weekly will not be much changed until such time as the shareholders arise in wrath and change the management. The paper is what the staff can make it, and it would require another kind of a staff to make another kind of paper. As to our "weaker brother," he must take such place in the social rank as his strength will permit him to take, but he must not be made the general burden bearer because he is weaker. The Indian brave walked the trail carrying his blanket and his bow while his squaw came trudging after packing upon her bowed back all the family possessions, and for no other reason than that she was the weaker and could be made to bear the burden.

The tendency of a taxation system based, as our national system is, almost wholly upon consumption, is to shift the burden from the strong to the less strong and from the less strong to the weak—to those least able to carry the load, and that is just as wrong as the treatment of the squaw by the buck. The California Weekly would not take from the weaker brother any load that that brother is able to carry. Therefore, it would not abolish the poll tax. Such a policy would make the weaker brother still weaker. There is no "maudlin sentiment" about this attitude. It is straight common sense. But then there are the social pariahs, the lame, the halt and the blindly incompetent! They have got to be helped from cradle to grave and that is quite burden enough without adding to it one single person able to carry his own weight. To carry anyone able to go it alone is to handicap the carrier and make him carried selfish and lazy. We stand for equality of opportunity, but we do not propose to let the Devil take the hindmost if we can keep that hindmost out of the Devil's clutches.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

In Devil Canyon, near San Bernardino, a "wild man" has been seen several times recently, and has caused considerable consternation among picnickers in that vicinity. So far as has been learned, he is not an escape from an asylum, and no one thus far has been able to identify him.

Berkeley is to have an airship factory, and the construction of one already has begun. When it is completed an airship invented by Leonard H. Lane, of that city, will be manufactured in it. A model already has been constructed and Mr. Lane has made five successful flights in it.

Official figures show that Nevada's gold production in 1908 amounted to $14,373,545.36. Allowing that the state has a population of 100,000—which appears to be a liberal allowance, as it actually shows an increase of about 140 per cent. since 1900—this would be an average of $143.73 to each citizen, or $718.65 to each family of five. Which would indicate that the Nevadans ought to be a good way from starving, even if they had no other source of wealth than the gold which is found in their ledges. It is announced that an electric line soon will be extended from Palo Alto to San Jose by way of Mayfield, Monte Vista and Cupertino. It will place Los Gatos, Congress Springs and Saratoga in close connection with San Francisco.

Scarcely had Fresno's Raisin Day been demonstrated a success before various newspapers were out with suggestions that a Prune Day should be next in order. Why not? For that matter, why not various days devoted to advertising various California fruits? Advertising a good thing cannot very well be overdone, and Californian fruits are about as good a thing as markets have to offer.

Visalia is entitled to congratulations. The J. B. Jordan ranch, consisting of 640 acres near that city, has been bought by a Los Angeles syndicate, and will be placed on the market in tracts running from twenty to eighty acres in size. These felicitations because every large ranch thus cut up means better tillage of the soil and more wealth produced from it.

Both Pomona and Bakersfield are to hold elections in the near future to decide whether or not bonds shall be issued for school purposes. The Pomona proposition calls for the issuance of $150,000, and the Bakersfield election for $55,000, in bonds. In each instance the bonds, if voted, will be used for both the purchase of sites and the erection of school buildings.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Effect of the Primary Law The most disturbing element in San Francisco politics is the new primary law. It has made doubtful more political deals than a few, and it has disconcerted the reformers who were for it quite as much as it has the practical politicians who fought it. Coalitions of factions have been the meat and drink of political manipulators in San Francisco for many elections, and at first glance it looked as if the law would put an end to coalitions because, apparently, it prohibited a candidate from receiving the endorsement of a party other than that to which he has sworn he belongs. This point was cleared up to the general satisfaction of anxious candidates and politicians by the decision of the Election Commission that the nomination paper requires the signer to state that he is a member of a particular party but it does not require him to state that the candidate he nominates belongs to any particular party. This decision permits members of any party to nominate a candidate from another party, and, of course, the members of the candidate's party can nominate him too.

Pre-Primary Conventions The course of political affairs in San Francisco demonstrates again what this paper has before called to the public's attention: that the abolition of nominating conventions does not abolish the methods of ante-convention politics. The practical politicians, now that the question of two-party endorsements has been settled, are playing their old game of give-and-take, trading an advantage here for a prospective advantage there, and making all the usual deals that hitherto have made the conventions simple meetings to ratify the actions of the bosses. The only difference is that the prestige of convention action is eliminated, and that the "freeze-out" tactics of the boss-ruled conventions can no longer be employed to keep off the ballot the name of a candidate who will not take part in the program. The new law makes for greater ease in getting a worthy man before the electors on election day. But for practical purposes it is just as necessary now as before the law was passed that that worthy candidate's strength should be developed before the people previous to election, and that the sentiment of the people who want good government should be concentrated upon one ticket. Otherwise, the reform element will simply dissipate itself by scattering its votes among a dozen candidates, while the pure vote can be relied on to vote solid for one ticket that they get the tip is the push ticket.

Practical Independents The independent Republicans have seen this fact clearly enough to organize a series of clubs and try to develop their strength and unite on one ticket. The independent Democrats (the San Francisco Democratic Club) are feeling their way toward an understanding with the independent Republicans, and the Good Government League will probably be in line with any ticket that meets the full endorsement of the reform element of both parties. This would be practical politics in a worthy use of the word, and practical common-sense besides. Some such workable understanding must be reached by the friends of good government, or the continuance of vital policies will be left to the tender mercies of Mr. Herrin political bureau. How would the people who want to see good government continued and justice established like to have Mr. Herrin dictate the course of the graft prosecution, for instance, or the letting of contracts for the rebuilding of the city hall, or the naming of the chief of police? For that as is squarely the issue in San Francisco as it is in the state; the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company is as active in San Francisco politics to-day as it was in state politics in the last legislature; and friends of good government need to be just as suspicious of the activities of Gavin McNab and Tim Sullivan as they are of the activities of Grover L. Johnson and Walter Parker.

Labor Grievance at City Administration The talk of labor men invoking the recall against Mayor Taylor and the Board of Supervisors has subsided, but it is interesting to know just what labor's grievances were that aroused the talk. These grievances were embodied in the report of a committee appointed by the San Francisco Labor Council to investigate charges made by one Daniel O'Connell that the city administration was extravagant and hostile to labor. Briefly, the report sustains most of the charges, in particular that the Board of Supervisors had so stinted appropriations to the Board of Works as to necessitate the removal of janitors and the reduction of pay of others, while the salary of the city engineer was increased $2,000 and that of the city architect $1,000; that the bills for automobile hire for city officials indicated extravagance; that the supervisors were paying exorbitant rents for lots for temporary offices and buildings while not utilizing vacant lots owned by the city; and that the administration was hostile to labor in that it had failed to heed the requests of labor representatives that fire boxes be made in the fully equipped municipal factory by local mechanics instead of being purchased from outside firms, and that it had refused either to reinstate janitors or to order that hostlers in the fire department stables be paid the rate specified in the city charter.

Did He Walk Out Or Was He Pushed? State Architect George C. Sellon lately retired from the happy family of State Engineer Nathaniel Ellory and the public is not quite sure whether he was forced out of office or if he merely walked out because he wanted to go. Perhaps he is not certain himself. Anyway he is out. There has been enough friction between Sellon and his chief during the last two years to light matches, and Ellory pursued the course of a measure requiring the state architect to give all his time to the state, which Mr. Sellon felt he could not afford to do at $4,000 a year, so he went. Nevertheless, that is a good provision to have in the law. It would be better if, as in the case of the State Board of Equalization, for instance, that provision were enforced, which it is not. Instead of not allowing private to interfere with public business these officials seldom allow public business to interfere seriously with private business, the law to the contrary notwithstanding. However, the general impression is that the state has had the services of a bright young architect for a couple of years even if advertising "Sellon & Heming, State Architects" did lead to a dissolution of the connection between architects and state.

Forewarned Registrars Zemansky, of San Francisco sees, in the new direct primary law, the supremacy of "organization" methods made more easy than ever in that the law will put a premium upon candidacies, upon bringing out tickets supporting every kind of new-fangled fad that human ingenuity can conceive. To meet the opposition will only be necessary for the organization boss to concentrate his strength with which to confront a divided opposition. This may be true but it is not new. Every intelligent friend of the direct primary has foreseen it. The remedy is to concentrate the opposition to the organization and plump that vote, too. It can be done. It must be done even if a second election has to be held, as in Berkeley, when the two highest in the first election take a full out of each other in the second and so settle it. This is what Senator LaFollette wants in Wisconsin and, if that be necessary in order to secure majority rule, why we shall have that, too, here in California, cost what it may.

What Berkeley Has Taught Us San Francisco is much obliged to Berkeley for the instructive lesson of Saturday last. Berkeley has, in past years, been ruled by one or the other of two houses, the house of Spear or the house of Schmidt. If these two shrewd politicians could have hung together they might not have hung separately, as they have done on wiggly limbs blown by every breeze that passes. But bye and bye the Berkeley people awoke from their slumbers saying: "A plague on both your houses," waded in to do both of them up and they have done them. They got together for the first time as a Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, their enthusiasm carrying them so far that they held the Berkeley vote in the palms of their hands and the whole Herrin organization could not prevail against it. Thus encouraged they got behind the new charter and secured the adoption of that. Then they took hold of putting in office a staff of officials that can be counted on to make a success, and not a holy spectacle, of the new charter. They picked out for mayor Beverly J. Hodghead, clean and competent, and got behind him so effectively that he was given a clear majority at the first election. No "organization" seeking to divide the better element can stand against that kind of work. San Francisco can accomplish a similar result in a similar way, but by no other. The lesson of Berkeley should be taken to the inner consciousness of San Francisco.

The Gaity of the Campaign As long as Mr. Is Positively Assured Frank J. Sullivan remains in the political eye the mayoralty campaign in San Francisco cannot be dull or devoid of humor. He is as good as a cage full of monkeys. He tells his troubles, family and all, not to the policeman but to the whole public. He opens his heart as a catfish opens its mouth so that the workings of his immortal soul are distinctly visible. Those workings are very human but not very much to the credit of the dignity of Mr. Frank J. Sullivan. They do not denote a strong character. They suggest melancholia. The Union Labor party people will do unwisely if they take up with any more lily-handed sons of toil to represent them in public office and they will do especially unwisely if they take up Mr. Frank J. Sullivan, which they won't. He is a joke.

SELF GOVERNMENT AT LOS ANGELES

By E. A. DICKSON.

Los Angeles citizens have learned the value of organization. For years they fought organized vice as individuals and failed. Then they fought organized vice with organized citizenship—and won.

Recently they learned another lesson. They found that whenever a new crisis had to be confronted (the recall of Mayor Harper, for instance) they had to organize all over again. This was hard work—and costly. To conduct the campaign to oust Harper from office required the expenditure of about $10,000, to say nothing about the time and energy sacrificed by the leading citizens in managing the bitterly contested battle of ballots.

The forces that were opposed to good government, on the other hand, had their soldiers all ready for action. They were organized. They began fighting while the citizens were trying to get their scattered army together.

The fight was an uneven one, so far as numbers were concerned; a struggle between a vice squad and a reform army. But the vice squad almost won because it was organized and well drilled.

The citizens learned that occasional organization isn't enough. Not only must there be organization to fight organization but it must be an all-the-year-round organization. Sporadic organization will not avail.

In a very able address before the City Club soon after the recall election, Meyer Lissner, one of Los Angeles' splendid citizen-soldiers, made a convincing appeal for permanent organization of the good government forces. Two weeks later the citizens, acting upon his suggestion, launched what is known as the Good Government Organization. In his address, Mr. Lissner said:

"If you want to have permanent good government in Los Angeles or anywhere else, for that matter, you have got to have permanent organization of good government forces. They say 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' and I say 'Permanent organization is the only safeguard for good government.' While I do not believe in what has been called 'the organization, I do believe in organization itself. It should not be necessary every time a good government campaign is undertaken in Los Angeles to have to begin anew, or to request men who have been active in precinct work to act as precinct committeemen. There should be permanent good government organizations in every precinct in the city, ready, like minutemen, to respond almost automatically to the need of the hour."

The Good Government Organization is intended to be a federation of all other civic bodies which are working for the upbuilding of Los Angeles. It will be permanent; that is, it will maintain headquarters and a paid secretary all the year round. Clubs are to be formed in every precinct of the city.

The purposes of the organization are told in its brief constitution, thus:

"To unite and organize the various forces of good government in Los Angeles. To organize in each precinct a good government club, which shall be represented in the councils of the organization by one of its members or officers. To endorse and support worthy candidates for election to office. To oppose the nomination and election of unfit men to office. Generally to maintain an active organization for the purpose of promoting and advancing all movements for the advantage and welfare of Los Angeles."

That the organization may be thoroughly representative of the citizenship that stands for good government and the general upbuilding of the city, the following civic bodies are declared eligible to membership:

City Club, Chamber of Commerce, Municipal League, Central Labor Council, Merchants' Association, Voters' League, Federation of Improvement Clubs.

It is provided, however, that not more than ten members shall be accepted from the governing body of any one organization.

In addition to these, the membership will include one representative from each precinct good government club and fifty members-at-large, to be named by the president with the approval of the executive committee.

This organization, then, will be a league of all the other civic bodies. The three hundred (or thereabouts) citizens who compose its membership and represent the various civic and commercial organizations will be the city's political watchdogs. Their function will be to suggest good men for public office and to support those men when nominated. That is their positive duty. Their negative duty is to oppose the nomination and election of unfit men.

Los Angeles, therefore, is provided with a pretty substantial organization of her citizens for active political service; and, what is more to the point, it is permanent in character.

But a second problem confronted the citizens when they first began talking about a permanent organization of the good government forces. "Where was the money to come from? Echo answered "Where?"

Here again Meyer Lissner suggested the solution. He said:

"The most serious matter in connection with reform movements and movements for good government is the financing of them. There are many good citizens, men of ability, who are willing to devote a good deal of their valuable time to this work and to contribute liberally to campaign funds besides, but they balk when it comes to going, hat in hand, literally begging for funds which are doled out, grudgingly in many cases, by men who do practically none of the work and, by reason of their large interests in the community, are the principal beneficiaries of it.

"It so happens that citizens who are able to and do give generously to the financing of movements of this kind, while quite limited in number, are called upon on every occasion. It is not only bothersome for them, but also for the solicitors, to have to take up such a matter every time the necessity arises.

"It would be more businesslike and a great relief for all concerned if each one of these generous givers would agree to pay such an amount as he would expend annually into a fund, to the trustees of which all applications of the kind mentioned could be referred, and who could either assist or turn down a proposition, as their judgment would dictate.

The citizens saw the merit of Mr. Lissner's suggestion and at once organized what is known as the Good Government Fund. The fund at the present time has about thirty-four annual subscribers, who agree to pay their annual subscriptions in equal quarterly installments, until further notice, and has a guaranteed annual subscription to date of $22,000.

Such a fund will be able to furnish all moneys needed for good government purposes, and it is the intention of the good government fund trustees to finance every worthy enterprise for good government in the city and county. The trustees of this fund are:

S. C. Graham, C. J. Kubach, Stoddard Jess, P. M. Johnson, William Lacy, J. O. Koepfl, Gilbert S. Wright, John R. Haynes and M. Lissner.

The announcement that the citizens have both a permanent organization and a permanent

WHAT OUR PEOPLE'S LOBBY DID

By GEORGE BAKER ANDERSON.

Four years ago, during a session of the Congress, there appeared at a committee hearing on a bill vitally affecting the plain people, who usually have to content themselves with playing a thinking part in the political drama staged on the banks of the Potomac every two years, a man unknown to any of the Representatives in Congress composing the committee. The stranger, a quiet little man, stood unobtrusively in one corner of the room while half a dozen silk-hatted, frock-coated, patent-leathered, smug-countenanced gentlemen, locking arms with or otherwise affectionately hobnobbing with the committeemen, made themselves very much at home.

The chairman of the committee took his seat at the head of the long table in the center of the room, shot impressive glances from beneath and beyond shaggy, statesmanlike eyebrows, at the gathering, and gave his gavel a graceful whirl. Before he let his emblem of fleeting authority fall he condescended to permit the body of the timid stranger to come within the radius of his vision. The personification of austerity was on tap. It was an impressive, a dramatic moment. The gavel still gently twirled, when—

"May I ask, sir, whom you represent?"

The query was directed toward the shrinking figure standing in the corner.

"The people," was the startling reply.

A roar of laughter, in which the chairman and all the members of the committee joined, reverberated through the room. Yes—but was it not a great joke?

The gavel fell—very light as its fall upon the block. The joke appeared to be helpless.

"I am very sorry, sir," began the chairman, as the half dozen silk-hatted, frock-coated, patent-leathered, smug-countenanced gentlemen who made lobbying their business gazed at one another and winked, "but our time is going to be very limited. We have a number of gentlemen here representing large interests, and they must be heard. I do not see how we can very well give you any time."

The presumptuous, bumptious little man in the corner left the mellifluous accompaniment of rippling titters and soft-pedal heehaws—perhaps a thin veneer for the something beside exhilaration which some of those present felt at that moment. You have heard a hysterical woman laugh when somebody told her all her household treasures had just been fed to the hungry demon fire? The other laughter belonged to the same family.

How preposterous, indeed! The people! What right has any man, just a common citizen, to appear before any august body of lawmakers and declare himself a representative of the people?

The experience of this professed representative of the people at the national capital four years ago had a parallel, with a great projection thereupon at Sacramento last winter. "The people!" sneered Speaker Philip A. Stanton, and Assemblymen Grove L. Johnson and Robert L. Beardslee, when they found that a mere man had dared to presume to enter the sacred precincts of a legislative hall and ask certain lawmakers why they were absent during roll call on an important measure.

"The People's Lobby! What right has this fellow to call himself a representative of the people?" roared the machine politicians, slapping their glib, glibulous chests.

"Such creatures as these," oracularly declared Johnson of Sacramento, "are not fit to breathe the same air we do."

And time proved that from this judgment there was no appeal. For, at the instigation of Stanton and Johnson, bosses of the machine element in the assembly, though knife-to-bone enemies, the Senate on Rules and the great Committee on Judiciary succeeded by the adoption of tactics which no future committee of a California Legislature will dare to pursue (even if inclined to do so, which is doubtful), in keeping the representative of the People's Lobby off the floor of the Assembly.

Off the floor, did I say. Not only off the floor but, by order of Speaker Stanton, delivered in person by the agitated sergeant-at-arms (who didn't appear to relish his job), even out of the galleries, day and night, Sundays and holidays, whether the assembly was in session or not. Not even was this miserable creature, this wretched felon, this hideous spy upon the actions of the elected "real representatives" of the people, permitted to set a foot or poke a nose or thrust a glance into the Assembly gallery during the Lincoln memorial exercises, though Jere Burke and John C. Lynch and Walter Parker and Frank Daroux, of poolroom notoriety, might have occupied posts of honor on that occasion, for the asking.

The People's Lobby was the fruit of the ideas advanced by a number of public-spirited citizens of California who had reached the conclusion that the time had arrived when the majority of the voters of the State wanted to know more about the doings of their lawmakers than the correspondent of any one newspaper might be able to tell them. It was believed that not only would a daily or semi-weekly narrative, free from tincture of partisanship, be welcomed by thousands of interested citizens, but that a permanent record of the attitude of members on all important issues (not only their votes, but their work in committee, their attitude in debate, their opposition to lobbyists, their support or opposition for use in campaigns in which members will seek re-election. And in both respects the anticipations of the founders of the People's Lobby fell very far short of the actual demand. For so widespread has been the request for the full records of various speakers, both good and bad, independent and servile, courageous and cowardly—that there is little room for doubt that many of these senators and assemblymen whose records (when completely exposed by the People's Lobby, as they will be) to the proper members of such exposure shall have arrived) prove their total unfitness for public office will be denied renomination at the hands of an outraged constituency.

Contrary to the popular belief, the People's Lobby was not a one-man institution. Realizing that much of its work, to be effective, must be done secretly, it established one man, the writer of this brief article, as its executive head at Sacramento. But the real work, much of it, was done by men employed about the capital in various ways. Some of these men were those who were clerks of committees; some were engaged in confidential capacities as attaches of one house or the other. All were faithful to the trust reposed in them. So far as can be learned, not one "leaked" some of the attachments of the People's Lobby (all but three of whom served the cause without hope of pecuniary reward) knew nobody connected with the novel institution excepting its recognized head and the office employees. The organization was far from perfect. Its committee equipment contained no faulty material. The structure held firm to the last.

One of the first immediate results of the activities of the lobby was the adoption, by both houses, of drastic anti-lobbying rules. That this movement was inaugurated for the direct purpose of keeping the one known member of the People's Lobby's head off the floors (provided, in the case of the senate in particular, he were detected in the act of violating the rule) was obvious.

Strangely enough, the People's Lobby was not caught lobbying—as the term is defined in the California Election Code, Burke, Lynch, Parker, Daroux, and others who were known to be the genteel art a profession, continued to perform their labors, but not, as during former sessions, in the legislative chambers. Two years before some of them invaded the floor of either house during roll-calls and actually directed their hired men how to vote after the roll-call had begun! Last winter they gave their orders in the seclusion of their headquarters at the Capital Hotel—sometimes over a game of pinocle. These rooms were, for a time, the mecca for the time-servers in the legislature, including most of the members from Los Angeles and the majority from San Francisco.

Toward the close of the session the railroad lobbyists grew bolder and Burke, in particular, frequented the corridors near the entrance to the chambers, calling members out as the occasion demanded; but open lobbying on the floor was at an end, so far as the boss of the Southern Pacific crew was concerned.

Not so, however, in the case of all of the gentlemen of persuasive eloquence who had enlisted under one banner or another. The Royal Arch lobbyists, the racetrack lobbyists, the dental lobbyists, the medical lobbyists and representatives of other special interests forgot the rule as the session ripened, and so, apparently, did Lieutenant-Governor Porter and Speaker Stanton; for on many an occasion were some of the most notorious lobbyists in the State seen almost touching elbows with these two presiding officers, on the floor of either house, during sessions! And it was not an uncommon sight to see Lieutenant-Governor Porter and Jere Burke in intimate conversation in the senate corridor, or some secluded spot!

To set me narrate, in one paragraph, a bit of hitherto unwritten history, to illustrate how closely in touch with events the People's Lobby found itself early in the session:

While the fight over the anti-racetrack gambling bill was at its height, but before the fate of the measure was sealed, one of the members of the senate was approached by a man professing to be, and generally believed to be, an agent of one of the two big racetracks in California, and told in plain terms that his vote against the measure would be worth $25,000 to the racetrack people. Of course the offer was spurned. That the People's Lobby learned of this effort at bribery within a few hours after it had been made indicates how close a watch was kept upon the forces of corruption at work at Sacramento.

The People's Lobby prepared and secured the introduction of several reform measures, and three important resolutions, two of which agitated the machine to its foundation. One of these resolutions was adopted, after a bitter fight, with some amendments. None of the bills became law, all sharing the common fate of nine out of ten reform measures before the late legislature. It examined and prepared, or had prepared by competent authorities, digests of nearly two hundred bills, furnishing copies of these digests to various members of both houses, as the necessities appeared to demand. It found "bugs" in a considerable number of bills, and in every instance secured, or helped to secure, the defeat of the measures thus reported upon, or secured amendments killing the "bugs."

A score of cases might be cited, but two will suffice for a brief review:

Assemblyman Perrine of San Francisco introduced a bill providing for the reorganization of the National Guard of the State. In its original form one paragraph of the bill provided for life tenure for certain officers. The offensive clause was discovered by the People's Lobby, which at once gave publicity to the "bug" through various avenues, and it was stricken from the bill.

Assemblyman Leeds of Los Angeles fathered many vicious measures. One of his bills, harmless enough on its face, at first reading, amended the law governing the appointment of courts. The People's Lobby discovered the "bug," which took from the district attorney the power to try "blind pig" cases in towns other than those in which the offenses had been committed. Through the immediate and earnest co-operation of one or two moral organizations and the activity of certain members of the assembly, the bill was killed, in spite of the most desperate efforts of Loebl. From a great mass of data in its possession, covering not only the session of 1909 but also preceding sessions, the People's Lobby now has in course of preparation two sets of documents

ments whose value to friends of good government in California can hardly be estimated. One of these will contain a detailed history of every important measure before the Legislature of 1909, including those which failed of passage. The other—and this, in my humble opinion, will provide campaign material of incalculable value—will be a detailed record of the work of every member of the Legislature. Where members of the present body have served in previous sessions, much of their earlier record will be preserved in this manner.

It is proposed to print 300,000 or more of these records in time to put them in the hands of all voters before the next State election, but those required in municipal elections occurring in the meantime will be available. Whether all will be printed in one volume, or each member's record will appear in a separate pamphlet, has not been determined, but the latter method probably will be adopted.

There will be many surprises, many regrets and a torrent of explanations and attempted explanations when these records are handed out for the inspection of the voters, but their publication in this form seems to be the only way to drive the machine tool out of the business of legislating for whom? The people?

The lawmaker for the corrupt machine bosses needs something more than a slap on the wrist.

"To be or not to be" sewerage was the question on which the electors of Tulare recently voted, and they decided not to be by just four votes. The total number of votes cast was 352, and of these 231 favored bonds for sewers, but as a two-thirds vote was required, there was a small lack. There is talk of petitioning for another vote at an early date.

An interesting experiment in the line of making dredger-worked land useful is being made by A. C. Strick of Mariposa, Yuba county. He is planting a thousand young eucalypts on such land, and if they do well it is understood that large dredger tracts will be set out to them.

When the footsteeps of the steward—
Softly come and softly go;
When the passengers are groaning
With a deep and sincere woe,
Will you think of me and love me
When I'm in my berth below?

In the dining hall, my darling,
Think not bitterly of me,

It was best to leave you then, dear,
Best for you and best for me.

according to amount, small loans of $500 to $1,000 bearing the highest rates, and those of, say, $15,000 and upwards, bearing the lowest of six per cent.

I have some mortgages on hand now for sale on that basis, besides several applications for new loans on the same terms.

Did you ever stop to consider the advantages offered by a loan like this where you are sole master of the situation so far as this one investment is concerned, and for a lot of other reasons I can name? This is the safest class of investment known to day.

The security is almost invariably double the amount of the loan and sometimes a good deal more.

Mortgage, note, fire insurance policy and certificate of title go with each loan.

To complete a loan you can either come to my office yourself, ask through your bank or send the money to me, as you choose.

I personally inspect the security for every loan, examine all the papers in the transaction, select reliable fire insurance and title companies and collect and remit the interest to you every month or every quarter, as you like, without charge to you.

The borrower pays all expenses. I have placed millions of dollars on these loans without a loss, for foreclose.

I turn down lots of applications for loans because I can't personally satisfy with every detail. Those that I select show almost a guarantee are all right in every way.

I have clear investigation of my loans, my methods and myself.

The population of Oakland is 240,000 and growing fast; there is much activity in building and other lines; development here, plenty of opening for capital, and, consequently, unlimited opportunity for the use of money.

I THINK, Mr. Editor," demanded the Professor when the cards lay in little played-out "hands" on the table, and it wasn't anybody's shuffle for that evening, "that it is your turn to relate your romance. You have been keen enough in your interest in the others."

"My romance!" exclaimed the newspaper man. "My romance! Lord, man, I married a school teacher, not a stenographer."

"The point seems to be well taken," observed the Judge.

"The Court will kindly note an exception," continued the Professor, "but if we are not to hear from the Editor we certainly should from the Postmaster. It will be remembered that on the occasion of our first matrimonial conference he admitted having gone nearly insane over the sister of the wife of his friend who was talking of coming to California to live. I have treasured that remark in my memory."

"Well, so far as that statement is concerned," said the Postmaster, "I was entirely within the fact when I declared that I nearly went insane over that experience and I cannot think of it to this day without trepidation."

You see, it was this way: I fell in love with the wife of another man. Now don't be alarmed. There were neither coffins nor pistols. She was not a young thing married to an old leper, she wasn't an heiress to speak of and he was not a rich old miser. All the parties concerned, myself excepted, were of the salt of the earth and I don't think I behaved so badly myself, but I'll leave that to you after I have told you the story.

Alice and I had been childhood schoolmates. Although I was three years older than she we were in the same classes most of the time for the reason that I was out of school and at work, except during the winter term, during which I barely caught up with the others, when I had to be out again, for I was on my own resources after I was fourteen. She was not at any time my particular favorite nor I hers, although friendly enough.

We lived in a small town. Her father kept a store. My father was dead, my mother poor, and I worked for my father's store and clerk at school. The bookkeeper and head clerk was John Henderson, a dozen years older than I. John was silent, diligent and kind, the mainstay of the store, for the "old man" trusted too liberally and was not very prosperous.

First it was Alice's mother who died, after which John's widowed mother came and kept house for John, the "old man" and his two daughters. Then it was the "old man" who got the pneumonia and followed his wife, but when he knew what he had he fixed things so that John would keep business going and take care of the girls until they could shift for themselves, settle the estate and "do what was right" betwixt him and them. So read the will, to which were attached no bonds. The "old man" had taken John in as he had taken me, though a dozen years older, and placed implicit confidence in him, so he went to his rest as easy in mind as he must have been in spirit, fearing nothing.

John sent Alice's sister, of whom he was very fond, to the normal, then out teaching, and would have sent her on her own, but she took a different direction and she married early and settled down in an adjacent town and has lived prosperously, but not very happily, ever since. She was five or six years older than Alice.

After Alice finished the common schools John wanted her to go to the normal, too, but she had no taste for teaching, but wanted to learn bookkeeping, stenography and all that, to which women were not as much addicted then as now, so that she could help John in the store.

Meantime my mother had died and I had sold our little effects, taken the money and gone to college. When I came back John and Alice had been married two years and she had their first baby at the breast. The business had been growing some, but John had not had a day's vacation since the "red man" died, and was a bit run down. Could I come in and help him for a year? I could live with the family and, although the salary would not be large, my board would cost me nothing and I could save something if I cared to.

A NON-SCANDALOUS AFFINITY

By TOBIAS BLACK

(Being the Fourth Calcut Club Romance.)

AS I SAY, I was just out of college and was uncertain whether to practice law, medicine, merchandising or politics, never could make up my mind and as I never did conclude what I wanted to be I haven't been anything to speak of any time since. I think Alice had something to do with that, too. But this I know: I was out of money, and this chance to take hold where I had left off four years before came right to hand.

John had to rough it awhile, by the doctor's command, and so left it to Alice and me to run the store, mainly, while he rented a farm and ran it that season just to get back his health, which he did.

Of evenings Alice and I used to sing some together. She had a piano and I a violin and we practiced duets, too. I was quite musical in those days, had a good baritone voice. I haven't sung a note or drawn a bow across strings from that day to this. Haven't had the heart to. John came home at night tired with farm work and went off early to bed saying that our music did not disturb him any, rather thought it helped him to doze off to sleep when otherwise he might be too tired, our voices sort of blended together so well.

Well, it went on this way for three-quarters of a year, when, one noon time when I was alone in the store and there weren't any customers, John's good old mother came into the office, rested her elbows on the desk where I was doing some figuring, her wrinkled old face resting in the palms of her hands, and looked at me, not saying a word. "What is it, mother?" I asked, seeing that there was something on her mind, for I called her mother as well as the rest did.

"Son," she said, "be careful, be awfully careful."

"Careful about what, mother?" I asked in unfeigned surprise.

"Can it be that you don't know?" she demanded in her soft voice, and then, looking me straight in the eye, she went on, "I believe you don't. Yes, I am sure you don't, but you must be very careful about Alice."

"Careful about Alice?" I exclaimed. "Have I been careless about her? I don't understand what you mean."

"I see that you don't," she said, "and I am glad that you haven't known, but whether you know it or not you are both skating on very thin ice, and I think that she is as unconscious of it as you are. Things can't always go on that way. They have gone too far already. I am a woman and I know. You are the stronger of the two and the future must depend on you. Until your year ends be careful, then go away. If anything bad should happen, if anything should come between him and Alice it would kill John. He is all wrapped up in her and the baby."

With that she went out and Alice came in to let me go to dinner. As she came bursting into the office with her rustle of skirts and breezy breath like new mown hay I caught in her eyes for the first time a look that I had not seen there before. Of that dinner I ate little.

Thereafter I had more exacting duties in the store of evenings and less time for music and reading. John noticed the difference and upbraided me for making a drudge of myself, but the old mother pressed my hand between hers and whispered under her breath, "God bless my true-hearted boy!" Perhaps she meant me and perhaps she meant John.

We were standing on the porch in front of the store near closing up time watching for John to come up the road from the farm. Alice with baby in her arms, as she nearly always did when the weather was fine. As he rounded the corner into the main road, "There comes dear old John," she cried. "He has been like a father to me and I have loved him—like a father," saying the last three words half under her breath and ever so slowly, but her eyes were more expressive than her words. He was fifteen years her senior by the calendar and twice that by every other indication of comparative age.

Again as the buds of spring were swelling and my year of service had nearly ended she asked me to come into the parlor and sing an old song once more, and I went. We were alone but for the baby creeping about on the carpet. As she tumbled around for the music she said, in an undertone, "You have decided to go far to the west, have you?"

"As far as my money will carry me," I returned.

"It is best that you should," was the reply. "You will not come back this way again, not ever?" she asked.

"No, I can't not," I replied. "I don't well see how I can."

"I suppose that also will be best," was her answer.

By this time she had found the music and, opening it, ran her fingers over the piano keys, but when she tried to sing her voice trembled and she tossed the music aside. "I can't sing to-day, Fred," she said, and I saw that her eyes were filled with tears.

The day of going came. John was to drive me to the depot. I bade mother good by at the door and ran into the parlor to say good bye to Alice while John waited in the buggy outside.

I found her pacing the room in evident distress. "Good-bye, Alice," I said, as I held both hands out toward her, "we have had good times together." Then, almost screaming, she called aloud, "Fred! Fred! My brother! My brother! How can I ever bear not to see your dear face again!" Then, throwing all reserve aside she threw herself in my arms and weeping on my shoulder. I stroked her hair and, for the first and only time in my life, save in the kissing games of childhood, kissed her. Her husband sat in the buggy outside oblivious of it all and, so far as I know, he remains oblivious of it to this day, for he is an old man now and Alice is aging, as I am. I have written to him sometimes, but never to her. I never could trust myself to do that.

Well, I came west, hustled hard at this and that trying to get out of my mind and heart that last two minutes with Alice, but it was no use. It is at this moment as though it were an hour ago. I married because it was the duty of a citizen, married my boarding-house keeper with a nest of children to bring up and helped to bring them up. I have not been unhappy, because I would not be, but my life has been empty of something that only Alice could have put into it. If I have not permitted it to be wholly barren of results it was more good fortune than good purpose, for I have not been able to settle down to fit myself for any special calling in life. Versatility has saved me from failure and "doing politics" has kept me from becoming bitter.

So you see, gentlemen, I have had my affinity without a scandal, my romance without a tragedy, and it is to me that two of the long lives of renunciation ought to be a full equivalent for the penalty of having been square.

"There you go again!" ejaculated the newspaper man. "If you fellows had married school ma'ams, the sensible men of the world not have carried such aching voids around with you until the end of your days. By the time a woman has taught school a certain number of years, and sees processions of other folk's children ahead of her stretching on to the crack of doom, matrimony would look good to her and she would be a little less hypercritical about the quality of masculinity she yokes up with nor

THE GRAFT CASES.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun is progressing as rapidly as might have been expected, but it goes slowly, and there is little of the spectacular about it, the evidence thus far being largely such as has heretofore been given in the trial of other cases. One after another twelve of the former supervisors—Coleman, Kelly, Gallagher, Nicholas, Davis, Phillips, McGushin, Harrigan, Boston, Furey, Mamlock, and Wilson—have gone on the stand and told the oft-repeated story of how they sold their votes for the coin of the United Railroads, which had been offered them. Gallagher acted as intermediary and paymaster in most instances, although former Supervisor Andrew M. Wilson swore to a conversation with Abe Ruef in which the latter promised that the bribe money would be distributed equally to all the former supervisors.

Throughout the cross-examination of all these witnesses the main object of the defense naturally has been to discredit them, and to this end it has attempted to show that their testimony varies from that given before the grand jury, but the attempt has not been notably successful.

Having shown that money was offered and paid the former supervisors to vote for the United Railroads' overhead trolley franchise, the prosecution is now engaged in attempting to prove that the money thus paid for the United Railroads was paid by the order of Patrick Calhoun. To this end, Frank A. Leach, formerly superintendent of the San Francisco branch of the United States mint, has testified that he paid $200,000, in accordance with the order of Mr. Calhoun, to Tiley L. Ford, an official of the United Railroads, about the time of the bribery operations, and his testimony has been corroborated by that of William K. Cole, former cashier of the local branch mint, and Eugene Hawkins, its chief clerk. William M. Abbott, one of Calhoun's attorneys, has testified that he went with Ford to secure the money from the mint.

An incident which for a time threatened to have a serious bearing upon the trial was the throwing of Mrs. Otto H. Mackroth from a United Railroads car by its conductor. In the resulting fall Mrs. Mackroth was severely injured and her husband, under escort, was permitted to visit her at a hospital. It was feared that this might effect the disqualification of juror Mackroth on the ground of possible prejudice, but both the prosecution and the defense waived action in the matter, and the threatened delay due to the securing of another juror was avoided.

An attempt is being made to stop the pay of Detective William J. Burns and his assistants as employees of the District Attorney's office, and this looks back to the recovery of the prosecution's papers from the keeping of William M. Abbott, chief counsel for the United Railroads. If Burns is a public official there is a fairly clear case of the bribery of such an official against Mr. Abbott; if not, his path will be made smoother.

While not directly one of the graft cases, the trial of Luther G. Brown, head detective for the Calhoun defense, is so closely connected with them as to warrant considering it in that connection. Brown is under indictment for kidnapping Fremont Older, editor of the San Francisco Bulletin. By his consistent opposition to the grafters Mr. Older had made himself odious to them, and so the most daring arrangements were made to get him out of the way. Having, in Los Angeles, secured a warrant for Older's arrest on a charge of criminal libel, Brown, accompanied by Porter Ashe and others, on the night of September 27, 1907, inveigled him to a place on Van Ness avenue, where they arrested him and forced him into an automobile. Thence, while he demanded that he be taken before a judge in order to give bail, they hurried him in the automobile to Redwood City, where he was forced upon a train to Los Angeles. Here he was held until his predicament was ascertained, when steps were taken resulting in his release on bail at Santa Barbara.

This is the proceeding for which Brown now is to be tried. A full jury has been secured, and the taking of evidence now is under way.

Automobile Notes.

Although much of the leading makes of tires give splendid service it is true that additional satisfaction would follow if every owner would insist that certain common practices be avoided. For instance a car is often allowed to stand in water or on a damp garage floor, which is very bad for the tire. Under the constant influence of dampness the exterior rubber covering of the tire is bound to separate from the fabric sooner or later. The tire is then condemned and the maker is blamed for the result of the owner's ignorance or carelessness.

That an automobile properly built will not only give better service than a horse but will give efficient service for a longer time is what Dr. George E. Senkler of St. Paul, Minn., has set out to demonstrate, and he is within a year of scoring his point. He has been using a motor car in his professional work, and says:

"Among the physicians here the average useful life of a horse I have found to be between six and seven years. I am convincing many that the car can be made to equal this, but it will take another year to prove it."

Dr. Senkler proposes to see how much longer than seven years the car will serve him effectually in his work.

Dashing across long stretches of country of fine sand and sycamush, country which is absolutely devoid of anything that may be classed as roads, climbing hills of grades ranging from 3 to 33 per cent, at a pace averaging twenty miles per hour are almost daily occurrences in Santa Barbara county, when F. E. Bedichek is at the wheel of his Studebaker "thirty" roadster, with which he has run up more than 15,000 miles since last June.

The roadster is used by Bedichek in making his rounds of the oil fields in which the company by which he is employed as division superintendent operates. The engine of the machine is geared two and one-half to one and there are no roads, grades or passes in the Santa Ynez or Santa Barbara mountains that have not been mastered by Bedichek's Studebaker.

("Affinity"—Concluded.)

overly exacting after she is in harness. To my notion what this world needs is less of romance and more of good, hard common sense in things matrimonial."

"To my mind what the world most needs," observed the Professor as he reached for his hat, "is the perfecting of my matrimonial philosophy which, thanks to you gentlemen, is progressing apace. Mr. District Attorney, it will be your turn next."

951-3 MONADNOCK BUILDING

A GLIMPSE OF THE YOSEMITE.

By T. A. Rickard.

(For The California Weekly.)

That man is the best cosmopolitan who first learns to know his own country; next he should see the best of other men's countries. On the eve of departing from California, I obtained a glimpse of the Yosemite, deeming it a pity to leave without a personal realization of a scenic beauty so famous. The journey was easily made, and my memory is now enriched with impressions that will last for life. The Yosemite is indeed superb: a cul de sac in the Sierra Nevada, a Happy Valley in Elysium, an amphitheatre of the gods, a place where all the extravagant and impossible landscapes of the scene painter of a theatre are made magnificently and exquisitely real.

Geologically, the Yosemite is not as abnormal as it appears; it is an inland ford cut in the granite mountains by the powerful agency of erosion, in the form of water and ice. When the mountains underwent uplift the slope westward was so increased as greatly to augment the power of the river to wear down the rocks. This natural sculpturing was assisted later by the grinding of moving ice until a deep hollow had been formed. Two peculiar features of the Yosemite are the cliffs, is traceable to the jointing of the granite, whereby it is cleft along perpendicular planes. Those who see the high bastions of rock and the astounding walls inclosing the valley, which is only one mile in average width by eight miles long, assume some cataclysm or geologic catastrophe as the cause of its formation; but scientific observation indicates that the result must be imputed to the patient forces of river and glacier, aided by the searching hand of frost, the contraction and expansion of water in cracks formed in a much sheared granite. As a lovely woman is to the anatomist only the counterpart of her less attractive sisters, so the valley of the Yosemite is like other valleys, save for the gift of a beauty that defies analysis and smoother comparison.

Owing to the earliness of the season not many of the trails were open, but it must be remarked that a "trail" in the Yosemite is no ill defined track, but a garden path of decided elaboration, suggesting motor-cycling rather than mountaineering. Among the recognized excursions is the walk to the Vernal Falls and from them to the foot of the higher cataract, called Nevada Falls. This affords many bits of characteristic scenery. One of the most beautiful is obtained from the bridge that crosses the torrent of the Merced and gives a view of the Vernal Falls framed between the lofty pines; in the foreground is the rush of foaming water, driven to fury by the opposition of huge boulders of granite; in the background is a stupendous cataract, falling sheer from a wall of rock that crosses from pine-clad slopes to the canyon; looking up to the waterfall, it seems as if it came from the sky, as impossible as the scenery of a dream, as exquisite as the setting of a poem.

The most wonderful thing in the National Park is the descent of the Yosemite. This waterfall is near the center of the valley and within view of the hotel, so that a short stroll brings the traveler to a foreground befitting the splendid scene. The water descends in two leaps and a scurry; the first drop is 1,600 feet, and the lowest 400 feet with a chute of 600 feet between so that the total height is 2,600 feet. The Victoria Falls of the Zambesi are 347 feet, or more than twice the height of Niagara. One does not, however, measure natural beauty by feet or even by hundreds of feet, nor by the height of water, otherwise I might emphasize the power represented by the descent of the big volume of liquid. In spring the rivers rejoice in new strength and call lustily to one another as they race to the sea; in autumn their strength is abated, they are thin and feeble, and their song is a gentle monotone. In April all the waterfalls of the Yosemite are vociferous; and the astonishing thing is that they leap from high cliffs instead of running down the dark ravines; in white robes of spray they throw themselves headlong over sunlit cliffs, while their shadows play like smoke on the mountain walls. The leap of the Yosemite can be seen as a picture inclosed within a frame of verdure, the tall trees affording a feeble measure of the aerio height down which the river tumbles in excess of joyous life.

In the mountain meadows, 3,000 feet above the main valley, the river runs quietly and peacefully, reflecting the blue of the day and the crimson of evening; but as it approaches the valley the current is quickened with life, and changes its gentle flow into a rapid rush over the worn pavement of granite; the stream is hastening to meet its fate and trembles in fear anticipation of the sea. Speeding forward the waters reach the brink of the cliffs; arching at the leap like a hound in leash, the river hurls itself into the void and thunders down the abyss. The height is so great that the different gusts of water descend in projectile form, to be riven into spray before the bottom is reached. The river is shattered to a white powder of mist, which is blown westward in a perpetual rain. In the turmoil at the base of the first leap, the current is lost to view, but a little lower it re-forms and makes a superb cascade, at the foot of which the waters are divided into four or five streams, which unite in the meadows and join the Merced river. But the eye returns to the waterfall. The white scarf of beauty is thrown athwart the mountain walls; the substance of it being transitory but the form constant. In stainless daylight the falling cloud of water is silvered by the sun and throws a translucent shadow on the face of the cliff. The deep diapason of the cataract silences all other sounds, and even at night, at a distance, one hears the hurrying of the waterfall, as of birds in flight.

To get a closer view and a larger outlook I climbed to the top of the upper falls. It is only a good walk, not mountaineering; for the trails around the valley, though they may be out of repair, are so plain that even the foolish should not err therein. The exhilaration of getting there was worth the exertion, and the exertion itself was worth while. On the top the snow lay thickly, but a crust made walking easy. Standing above the crest of the waterfall, the view was superb. Such moments are the peaks of life. The valley lay at my feet in peaceful serenity, the dwellings of man appearing so insignificant as not to detract from the beauty of the picture or to interfere with the grandeur of "mountains pillaring a perfect sky." Alone on the height, enraptured by the vision of a world so beautiful, I found myself quoting:

For what high end is all this daily boon,

Unseen of man, in sightless silence spent?

Doth lavish Nature vainly importune

The unconscious witness of the firmament?

Or, is it that the influent God, whose breath
Informs with glory sea, and shore, and hill,
His infinite lone rejoicing nourishes
Upon the bounteous outcome of His will?

("Los Angeles"—Concluded.)

ent good government fund has had a wonderfully encouraging and stimulating effect upon the public generally. And it has had a corresponding repressing effect upon the push politicians and the Southern Pacific hirelings.

It is no exaggeration to say that the citizens of Los Angeles have solved the problem of good government. By agitation and insistent demand they have armed themselves with a city charter that assures them of honest government provided they have honest officials. And now they have laid the foundation necessary to assure the election of men who are honest.

They have the initiative, which will permit them to be their own lawmakers in the event their elected lawmakers prove recreant to their official trust.

They have the referendum, which will permit them to veto bad legislation.

They have the recall, which will permit them to oust a dishonest or an unfit public official.

They have the most modern system of direct primary and non-partisan city elections.

They have a permanent good government fund.

And, finally, they have a permanent good government organization.

Bails, Fines, Punishments.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

So reads the eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The makers of the constitution saw no need for incorporating such a provision into the organic law. They regarded the Common Law, of which we spoke last week, as sufficiently safeguarding these Rights of Men, but the people were suspicious of power and timid for themselves and their posterity and insisted upon the incorporation of these sixteen words. They have done no harm and have exercised a restraining influence upon authority.

For it has taken the world long to learn (the lesson is not more than half learned yet) that it is not the severity of punishment that deters crime so much as the certainty of it. Hatred of the other fellow's sin has inspired the desire to mutilate that other fellow's body to the end that he may have a realizing sense of the sinfulness of his conduct. Therefore the history of man's inhumanity to man, in the name of justice, makes quite the darkest pages in human history.

Perhaps there are some who do not know just what "bail" is or how it came into use. In the olden time every community was held responsible, as a community, for its own citizens. If an injury was traced to such a community, and the community itself could not fix the responsibility upon the guilty individual, the brunt had to be borne by the community at large. But if a member of that community were charged with the offense then the community itself had to see to it that he was presented for trial or suffer the consequences. This gave rise to giving hostages. If for any reason the person charged with offense could not be spared pending the trial some other person took his place in jail, relying upon the backing of his community, and a sense of honor on the part of the accused, to present himself when wanted. Gradually money or property came to be used instead of human pledges and, finally, obligations to pay instead of money payment. Tyrannous power could easily make the bail bond so high that no individual could secure the requisite pledge. That would be excessive. Any sum greater than necessary to secure the attendance of the accused would be excessive and a hardship upon the accused. Therefore such excessive bail is prohibited by the national constitution and by the constitutions of most of the states.

There are, however, crimes of such extreme gravity, such as murder or treason, that they are generally held not bailable at all. Persons accused of crimes of this character, where the presumption of guilt seems to be strong, will be trusted to prison bars rather than to any substitute. Bail is only allowed prior to conviction, between arrest and preliminary examination or between preliminary examination and trial. A court may, after conviction, and while a case goes to a higher court on appeal, allow bail but conditions must be unusual to warrant it.

A fine is a bad sort of punishment at best, and has little justification from whatever point viewed. It bears unequally. To the very rich a fine means little more than tossing a small coin to a beggar, but to one not rich it may inflict great hardship. Many a family has suffered because the father had to pay a fine for drunkenness or for some other offense against social well-being, whereas a rich father could pay the penalty with a light laugh and think as little of the ignominy of it. Days in prison at hard labor count equally as punishment upon rich or poor and are preferable from whatever point viewed.

Still, fines have a certain justification in that they tend to reimburse society for the cash outlay incurred in enforcing laws. The officer who arrests, the judge who tries, the jury before whom tried—all these must be paid for their services. If a fine can be applied that will repay this cost, if nothing more, the guilty person, and not the social whole, should be made to bear the expense of his wrong doing. Sometimes laws provide for both fine and imprisonment, for reimbursing society for what the criminal act has cost and for imprisonment as punishment for the act itself. This is a better form of punishment than either fine without imprisonment or imprisonment without fine. All that the constitution insists upon is that such fines must be reasonable and what is reasonable is determined by what reasonable men believe to be reasonable. No hard and fast rules can be laid down, although legislatures often do lay them down harder and faster than they ought.

Cruel and unusual punishments are forbidden because ours is intended to be pre-eminently a humane government and because wreaking vengeance does not prevent the commission of crime. On the contrary, it inspires in the mind of the victim a thirst for vengeance in return and, likewise, in the minds of all his friends and sympathizers. Not only is this so, but cruel punishments, by a psychological law only partially understood, suggest to other minds the commission of the same crime for which punishment has been so severely meted out; but if the person punished knows in his heart that he is rightly punished and punished reasonably, and his friends are of the same opinion, the enforcement of law has a salutary effect upon them and deters crime. This seventh amendment was wisely made a part of the Constitution of the United States. It is sound in theory and wholesome in practice.

Bill Number Three.

A business house is enclosing the following "pome" with its bills:

The first is Bill T.
The second, Bill B.
The third is the Bill
You're owing to me.

The first was elected
The second, rejected.
The third is now waiting to be collected

So kindly help hasten prosperity.
Promised to us by big Bill T.
By mailing at once your BANK BILL to me.
And thus liquidate Bill number three.

You need not feel sorry for poor Billy B.
He'll be running again in four years, you will see.

So please only worry about Bill number three.
Then join in the chorus, "Three cheers for Bill T."—Berkshire Eagle.

"All right, sir, will you have it too short or too long?"—Flegende Blaetter.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Possible But Improbable.

It is possible that the People's Water Company, supplying the east bay cities, and the Spring Valley Water company, supplying San Francisco, may unite into a metropolitan water corporation. If so the union will have the double purpose of defeating any effort on the part of the several cities to associate themselves in a water district for bringing in a municipal supply from the Sierras and for competing with the associated cities if a municipal supply be brought in; but it is not inherently probable that such union will be formed. The source of most of the news running to that effect is questionable. It bears taint of being boughten, also of having an ulterior motive in view. The People's Water company has a reputation to lose, the Spring Valley one to gain. Matrimony under such conditions is always fraught with danger to the better half. The temper of the public is disposed to be fair with both corporations. It is not disposed to submit to extortion from either. No private enterprise will bring water from the Sierras and, without water from the Sierras, the bay cities can never feel secure from a water famine or be sure of getting water of first-class potability. A combination for extortion will produce a combination for resistance and, however long it may take, or however much it may cost, the associated cities will eventually win the fight against extortion. Therefore discretion should be the better part of valor in the cases of both corporations.

Herrin Not the Premier.

There has been some newspaper discussion as to who is really Harriman's right-hand man, but the Wall Street Journal declares that R. S. Lovett is the one great figure who has come forth to the highest rank under the Harriman regime. It adds that Judge Lovett is not only the most conspicuous success in the Harriman lines, but he is moreover one of the most conspicuous successes that has appeared in New York in the last ten years. Judge Lovett possesses the additional advantage of having done nothing to discredit himself with the public. An asset of cordial public antipathy is not one to be coveted by as far-seeing a dictator as Mr. Harriman who, while he has not scrupled to wear the reputations of others to a frazzle, has lately lost no opportunity to court the public favor for himself and his enterprises.

Forcing the Issue.

It should not be necessary for San Francisco to municipalize, reconstruct, own and operate the Geary street railroad. It should not be necessary for the city to take over, construct or own and operate a municipal water system, but the public service corporations will not rest content until they force the municipalization of practically all natural monopolies. Municipal ownership per se is not desirable. It places a burden upon government that it should not have to bear, but it can bear it and it will bear it rather than submit to rapacity, corruption, indifference and neglect. If public service corporations would serve the public, and rest content with that, municipal ownership would never command a hearing beyond a small group of negligible theorists, but they must needs play a financial shell game with public investors and make a poor and inadequate service a means for practicing extortion upon their patrons. Municipal ownership follows as a result of municipal rebellion against corporate tyranny, corruption and greed. The past has given no hostage for better things in the future. The only course left is to push municipalization forward wherever, as in the Geary street enterprise, a good opportunity is offered. It will not be an easy burden to carry, but it will be far easier than submission to a corporation that has debauched every public agency it has come in contact with, including bench, bar, press, and the public mind, not excluding the pulpit. San Francisco has more than once manifested its reserve power of undaunted manhood. The Geary street enterprise calls for another such manifestation. Speak to the people and they will go forward.

Working the Fannies.

In Los Angeles a group of women, who combine soft heartedness with softness of head, have done so much to help undeserving criminals that they have become known all over the United States to professionals of this class. A yeggman arrested in a boxcar in that city was found to have in his possession a list of directions how to proceed to secure the help of these women if he should find himself involved in difficulties with the police. In the language of the crooks this is "working the Fannies for light travel." Of course the women who become so much interested in detected malefactors are good women, but they indulge their sympathies to such neglect of their judgment that they oftentimes do more harm than good. The class is not peculiar to Los Angeles. Its representatives are everywhere, but they may be more in evidence in that city than in most places. One of the benefits of regularly organized charity work is that it puts into the background this type of woman philanthropist and brings to the front women of more business-like mind and training.

A Notable Document.

At the Commonwealth Club, Wednesday evening, at the St. Francis Hotel, an exhaustive address was read by Mr. Geo. W. Dickie upon the subject of Ship-Subsidy. It were well to print a million copies of the address and distribute them to the million most thoughtful and patriotic Americans, not that the conclusions reached by Mr. Dickie should be accepted as irrefragable, but that basic information might be in hand upon which to formulate a rational national policy in relation to the American marine. That policy is now as unintelligent as it is inadequate. Our condition cannot grow much worse without obliterating the American flag from the seas of the world lying out of sight of the American shore. As much as 92½ per cent. of our foreign commerce is now carried in foreign ships for which service American commerce pays to foreign ship owners $250,000,000 a year. The American navy can scarcely venture out of sight of American shores without employing foreign ships to carry its coal and other supplies. Nor would free ships supply the deficiency. If ships were built and donated by the American government to American owners to be sailed under American registry and with American crews at American scales of wages and costs of supplies the recipients of the gifts would be bankrupted without the further aid of a subsidy. It looks as though our entirely artificial American standard of living and of wages, of prices and profits, had made an American merchant marine impossible under conditions other than those by which the American navy is being constructed and maintained and, if so, the query arises as to whether the government itself might not as well undertake the job directly as indirectly through subsidized corporations.

Keep an Eye on France.

The status of the civil service employee of government has not yet been thoroughly determined, either in this government or any other. It must sometime be determined and upon a basis of equity and certainty. It is impossible that governmental business shall be tied up by strikes as private and corporate business is often tied up. Even a public as long suffering and patient as the American will not long tolerate that. The postal employees of France are raising the issue and the French government will settle it. That settlement will establish a precedent that other nations will be inclined to follow. Our guess is that whoever enters the civil service will enter it upon practically the same footing that one enters army or navy, under a contract of enlistment the breaking of which will constitute mutiny with adequate punishments therefor. We are not venturing this prophecy because we advocate that policy, but because it appears to be inevitable, and its inevitability should have an important influence upon the tendency to increase the activities of government in ownership and operation of public utilities.

LOCAL AND OTHER OPTION.

Last week we found space in our columns for a very close-knit, well-reasoned article in favor of local option with reference to the liquor traffic, but not for a comment upon it. This week we find space for an article that looks at the subject of liquor control from a different point of view. Both views are deserving of consideration.

The aim of the local optionist is plain, unequivocal, certain. He wants prohibition. If he cannot get it nationally, at one swoop, he will take it by state, if not by state, then by county, if not by county then by precinct, but however he goes at it his object is the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages.

Over against these good people, nearly all of whom either care nothing for alcoholics in any form, or dare not trust themselves to so much as smell the odor of a wine cask or beer barrel, lest their inveterate enemy lay them by the heels, stand some millions of persons, like the author of the letter found in another column, who regard the moderate use of liquors as no more questionable than the moderate use of tea, coffee or buttermilk, and the immoderate use as differing not a whit in principle from the excessive use of buttermilk, coffee or tea. Their motto is: use without abuse. If they do not always order their steps by that motto neither do others in eating or drinking, work or play.

Both are right and both are wrong. God knows if between such extremes of view any golden mean of policy for the public to pursue can ever be found. That is what The California Weekly is looking for.

This paper favors local option in every farming, or city residential, precinct. It believes in driving the liquor traffic into the business centers of incorporated cities and towns; but until ninety out of the hundred of men are willing voluntarily to forego and give up, for the common good, the alcohol in their beverages, it believes it better that what liquors are sold shall be sold under the surveillance and protection of the law than through outlawry. Just how this is to be done it cannot say. Perhaps Fresno, by confining the sales to bona fide restaurants and family liquor stores (to be not consumed on the premises of the latter) may prove the better way. It is worth trying.

Our correspondent's view of the status of temperance fifty years ago is unduly roscate. His one strong point is that whiskeys were purer then than now, but there was not then less drunkenness in proportion to population, or in proportion to drinkers than now, whereas now practically half the population are teetotalers and, by being such, lose little and gain much. His reference to Noah was unfortunate. The old man's jubilation upon reaching terra firma has been a humiliation to the race. Our correspondent's "properly conducted" saloon would be worth going across the continent to see. The best one that ever was was too dirty and foul-mouthed a place for gentility to be caught in. His query as to what the prohibitionist has to offer instead is not germane to the issue. The prohibitionist offers prohibition. It is up to those who do not believe in prohibition to offer instead of the saloon and prohibition something better than either. What shall it be?

UNDUE PROCESS OF THE LAW.

Every person who has been a member of a deliberative body knows what a hindrance to the transaction of business a stickler for parliamentary rules may become, yet it is indispensable to have rules governing the deliberations of congresses and conventions. But when the purpose of a deliberative body is sacrificed to the exactions of the rules mischief results and the rules need to be suspended.

It is so with regard to the processes of the law. They were made to facilitate, not to impede justice. At least that is the theory that justifies their making. No sane person would wish to have all legal proceedings informal and summary. That would be chaotic. Even lynch-law recognizes something akin to an orderly procedure. Order is said to be heaven's first law, and courts cannot and must not dispense with it, but there is a thing as subordinating justice to procedure, the purpose to the form, the ideal to the ceremonial. That is dangerous. It is worse than dangerous. It is destructive.

Legal procedure has come into being in two different ways: By rules which courts have made for the conduct of their own business. By rules which legislatures have made for the conduct of the business of the courts. The first source of procedure is generally the better. The second comes from the bar, or from such members of the bar as have, from time to time, been elected to the legislature. Such changes as these men have caused to be made in rules prescribed by the courts have generally been made to fit special cases that had arisen in their practice and had given them trouble. They were not made with a broad view of the needs of justice, but to help some attorney to win cases, and to get the hands of some court that had stood between some attorney and the winning of his case.

Finally, there is that in ceremonial which is natural to the mind, especially to the narrow mind, the mind that cannot reach a hill-top view and must be content to run in ruts. This is the bane at once of judicial and legislative life. These are they who "lade men with burdens grievous to be borne." They have done it in all ages of human history and they are doing it now. And in all ages there comes a time when this burden becomes so heavy as to crush whatever is under it. We have reached such a time in our criminal jurisprudence. Under the weight of an artificial ceremonial, so intricate that no man, no matter how learned in the law or the machinery of the law, can pretend to master the maze of it, justice is ensnared and overthrown by anyone having the means to expend in hiring expert legal vaqueros for the performance of the service.

And when his honor of the woodcock, peering over his spectacles, sees justice wallowing in the dust tied foot and hand ready to receive the hot brand of defeat, he delivers himself thus: "These rules are prescribed for the protection of society itself." "They are for the benefit of every man who comes before the court—the guilty and the innocent alike; for it is only by their impartial application that the question of guilt or innocence may be safely reached in any case, and the defendant justly said to have had a fair trial." "The wisdom of ages has demonstrated the necessity of surrounding the administration of justice with certain fixed rules and limitations to avoid the personal equation of the mere will or desire of the individual—which always tends to wrong and oppression." Usually somewhere in the sage declaration this sentence is also found: "The function of the court is to apply the law, not to make it." This is an ancient and hoary legal fiction which no judge ever employs in the presence of another judge without winking the other eye.

So far from being "justified by the wisdom of the ages," our California code of criminal procedure, as interpreted by courts mediocre in ability and technical beyond endurance, stands condemned in that whoever is able may have immunity from punishment, no matter what crime he may commit, if he will pay the price charged by a band of legal vaqueros who stand ready to let themselves to whoever will avail himself of their expert services. If we would have law and not anarchy in this state, justice and not injustice, if we would not have, "Law that grinds the poor while rich men rule the law," there must be such a revision and simplification of those "fixed rules and limitations," as will uphold justice and not overthrow, buck and gag it whenever it undertakes to deal with a rich freebooter. When- ever justice is sacrificed to a rule violence is done to the commonwealth and a crime is committed against social order, no matter whether it be court or legislature that inflicts the sacrifice.

NOT SO EASY AS HE THINKS.

The baccalaureate sermon delivered to the graduating class of the University of California in the Greek Theater last Sunday afternoon was a notable event. It was delivered by Rev. Charles Reynolds Brown of the First Congregational Church, Oakland, who took for his text: "He shall be called the Prince of Peace and shall reign for ever and ever." It was a masterly presentation of the most cogent arguments for international disarmament (beyond the needs of an international police) the settlement of international controversies by arbitration, or a court of nations, in which the United States is to take the lead and set an example by building no more battle-ships and reducing its present navy to the status of a police patrol.

It all appeared to be very easy to Dr. Brown and, judging from the applause, to seven-eighths of his seven or eight thousand hearers. Germany could not wish to go to war with us because the United States is one of her best customers for things "made in Germany," Great Britain because our source of supply of food stuffs and raw materials is the main dependence of our cousins across the Atlantic, France because of a sympathetic interest in our institutions, and Russia because of traditional friendship, other nations because they would have nothing to gain from a war with the United States.

Heaven knows what a burden militarism has been to the world, and how there ought to be enough of reason and judgment, national and international, to establish courts of arbitration or judicature for lifting this terrible burden off the shoulders of industry and commerce. It is right that the world should be made to see these truths as clearly as language can set them forth, and it is especially important that those who go out into society, after being trained by the state for social efficiency, should have them impressed upon their minds; but pari passu with this fitting for citizenship at the University of California there has rightly gone forward four years of drill in the science, arts and duties of a soldier and, rightly, too, in Dr. Brown's own church a cadet corps is being drilled in the use of arms. The world has not yet advanced so far as to make it safe for any people to forget how to fight.

The rivalries of peoples, the competitions of nations, the conventional proprieties and dignities insisted upon in international society—all these things are to be taken into account. If one would know the penalty of national helplessness let him ask of China, India, of the Armenian populace to-day. The cupidities of commerce are swept away like cobwebs in the face of an outraged national pride. Unfortunately, too, for this safeguard, it is so ignoble as to command the derision rather than the sanction of patriotism. It was the merchants of the North who desired to "let the wayward sisters go," and suffer the Union to be dismembered rather than sustain a loss of trade.

Does not the reader agree with us in believing that a safer and a safer view of our national policy toward war was that set forth by Theodore Roosevelt in the New York Out-look of May 8th, as follows:

The professional peace advocate who wishes us to stop building up our navy is, in reality, seeking to put us in a position where we would be at the mercy of the other nation that happened to disagree with our desires to disregard the immigration that comes to our shores, to protect our own interests in the Panama Canal, to protect our own citizens abroad, or to take any stand whatever either for our own international honor or in the interest of international righteousness. Moreover, those well-meaning but fatuous advocates of peace who would try to prevent the up-building of our navy utterly misread the temper of their countrymen. We Americans are ourselves both proud and high-spirited, and we are not always by any means far-sighted. If our honor or our interest were menaced by a foreign power, this nation would fight, wholly without regard to whether or not its navy was efficient. In the event of a crisis arising, the peace advocates who object to our building up the navy would be powerless to prevent this country going to war. All they could do would be to prevent its being successful in the war. A strong navy is the surest guaranty of peace that America can have, and the cheapest insurance against war that Uncle Sam can possibly pay.

Doing Pretty Well, Thank You.

Although E. H. Harriman and E. P. Ripley continue as twin Cassandras, to go up and down the land bemoaning the hard conditions confronting railroads, because of the effects of the Roosevelt policies, the railroads of which they are the heads are doing pretty well, thank you, and the condition of railroads in general is not so bad as it has been painted. As given out in Wall street, the net earnings of the Southern Pacific for the first eight months of the present fiscal year were 17 per cent. better than last year, while the Union Pacific's net earnings are 22.6 per cent. better. There is a prospect that the Union Pacific will earn more than 20 per cent. on its common stock for the year, while the corresponding figures for the Santa Fe are 12 per cent. It cannot be said that corporations doing as well as these figures indicate are victims of political prejudice or the short-sightedness of the public. As for the railroads of the country taken as a whole, their gross earnings for the second week in April were 10 per cent. larger than in the same week in 1908, showing that the railroad business is on the up grade.

Use and Abuse of Applause.

Editor of The California Weekly:

A few weeks ago Bach's beautiful Mass in G minor was sung in the University of the University of California in a genuinely reverent manner by a well trained choir. But the beauty and the deeper meaning of the music were marred by the applause with which the Mass was interpreted. I am not a Roman Catholic, but the Mass is a form of Christian worship hallowed by centuries of use and expressive of the deepest religious emotions, and to applaud it seemed not only an exhibition of bad taste but of downright irreverence as well.

Last Sunday the Baccalaureate Sermon was preached at the Greek Theater by the Reverend Charles R. Brown and was interrupted over and over again by applause. If we are going to applaud in a religious service, why not applaud the prayer? And surely Theodore Wiedersheim's fine reading of the Scripture selection deserved applause as well.

Seriously, ought not something to be done through the columns of The California Weekly, and through other agencies, to educate public opinion on the subject of the use and abuse of applause? There is a time to meet and a time to dance. There is a time to applaud and a time to be silent. There is also a time to applaud with reverent silence in the heart.

Sincerely yours,

Oakland, May 10, 1909. ALBERT W. PALMER

Convention has ordained that a sermon shall not be applauded and that applause is out of place in a house dedicated to worship, but there have been times when Dr. Brown's own congregation has found it necessary to thrust its hands into its pockets to keep them from involuntarily applauding a sentiment expressed during a sermon, and the evening that Francis J. Heney addressed the Men's League on the graft situation good Deacon Williams, who has served the Lord for nearly ninety years, asked that three cheers be given to Spreckels and Heney and 2,500 men gave them with such a will as made the rafters of the church creek under the strain of sound. If ever a joyful noise was made unto the Lord it was then. Nevertheless our correspondent's point is mainly well taken.

The Explanation Easy.

The Springfield, Mass., Republican rather wonders that the argument put forward by Southern California state divisionists, that division would increase the powers of the Pacific Coast in the councils of the nation, by adding two more United States Senators, does not challenge more attention from those living north of Telachapi mountain. The explanation is easy. The representation of California in the United States Senate has not usually been of such quality as to stimulate a universal desire to have it multiplied by two. When the political emancipation of this commonwealth from corporate control shall have been decisively achieved the multiplication of senators from California may call for more enthusiasm. As for the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company, it is sufficiently represented at Washington already.

Eucalyptus Planting.

Attention is called to a special article elsewhere in this issue on Eucalyptus Planting in California. California expects great things from tree cultivation, and especially from this particular form of it, but great results can only come of well planned enterprises. The series of eucalyptus articles appearing in this paper will constitute a handbook on the subject, so reliable as to warrant their being accepted in the fullest confidence, and so comprehensive as virtually to answer any question which an intending planter may wish to ask.

Papers with which The California Weekly exchanges are not only permitted but requested to make the largest possible use of this series of articles to the end that they may perform the greatest possible service to the state.

Not Kidnaping.

The intelligent jury that acquitted Luthur Brown of the charge of kidnaping Fremont Older probably reached the conclusion that the crime was not completely committed inasmuch as "Older" is not "Younger," and was therefore no "kid," but merely caught "napping." Also the process adopted in spiriting Older away has been hundreds of times successfully imitated by justices and constables in recovering Chinese slave girls and returning them to their masters when they were seeking to escape from hard bondage. The use of our laws, courts and civil officers for the infliction of wrong is no novelty.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There runs a delicious old story about two young lovers who found themselves living together in a garden, where there were rather more live things than would seem to be real good for the garden but, none the less a delightful place in which to live until sin came crawling in on its belly to make trouble, for sin crawls sinuously and seldom dares to stand and face uprightness frankly and with an unabashed countenance. It is related of these two young lovers that they were beguiled into eating of the tree of knowledge betwixt good and evil, whereupon they knew evil from good and rather inclined to prefer the evil in most instances. That is one theory of our becoming able to know right from wrong with power to choose betwixt them.

Then there runs a theory that there is within each of us a "still small voice," which, if we listen very sharply at every parting of the ways, will tell us which road is the right one and which the wrong to take. Some say that this voice is capable of cultivation (education) and may be taught to tell us wrong as certainly as to tell us right. Others say, not so, it will tell you right every time if you will but listen, for that voice is the soft whisper of an angelic presence sent on the wings of thought from the Most High.

We are also told of a wonderful book that has been handed down through the ages in which are recorded the highest thoughts of which the human mind is capable, thoughts inspired by the Ruler of the Universe and sent us for our guidance that we may walk uprightly and safely through all allurements.

Diligent men who study the mysteries of being, through being the testimonies of the rocks, the winds of men in the laws of mind and of human society, tell us that our moral laws are the results of human experience; that we have tried so many wrong ways of doing things, and have suffered so excruciatingly for having taken the wrong, that we have, through tribulation and suffering sorrow, learned the right way to live and to act, and that this knowledge has come to be the heritage of the race.

An up-to-date cult has discovered that we are, every one of us, twins, of the Siamese variety; that through our beings run one conscious and our subconscious selves, that the conscious self is worn on the outside and shows the result of rough usage, in that it does not always prefer right things, whereas our subconscious selves are pure and undefiled and all we need, in order to live and do right, is to hypnotize our conscious selves into subordination to our subconscious selves. If we cannot do this ourselves, we are to go to a psychotherapeutic physician (in clericals) and either hire, if we are able, or "bum," if we are not, that hypnotic service that will give the unconscious subconscious our own supremacy over the bedraggled conscious.

The purpose of this is not to tell the reader which of these methods of knowing right from wrong, good from evil, is to be preferred. The suggestion in mind is that with so many possible moral guides accessible to us we should, any of us, be fairly able to distinguish that which is right from that which we merely want to do, or from that which is commonly done in our set. It would seem that there should be little room for confusion of ideas, even relating to such common, every-day things as graft in public affairs, submitting tamely to extortion and blackmail, because more profitable than resistance, as holding the rich and well-dressed lightly responsible for moral delinquencies while visiting unstinted condemnation upon the human beast of burden through whose beclouded understanding float obscure glimpses of good and evil. There is no moral justification for mistaking inclination for "inner light," or the practices of our set for our measure of conduct. Any one of the hypotheses of moral enlightenment suggested in the foregoing should lead to better results

GREAT MOVEMENTS AT LOS ANGELES

PROJECTS THAT MAKE FOR A VAST CITY GROWTH.

A survey of Los Angeles after three years' absence discloses amazing changes in its physical appearance. Skyscrapers of the most modern steel and concrete fire-proof construction fill compact city blocks where before were only residences or gaping vacant lots. New streets are lighted with graceful electric lighters. Old streets of business blocks have been extended in their use. Broadway has increased in importance. Much that is new and strange calls to the eye for notice and admiration. Only the old throng is familiar, with its joyous bustle, and care-free energy, and tang of eastern metropolism, for Los Angeles is to some extent still a suburb of New York and Boston.

But beneath the surface current of impression one finds new depths of moving tides that are to make Los Angeles much more than it has been. A growth in population at the average rate of 20,000 every year must be explained upon some economic ground. The old idea that Los Angeles is a resort, pure and simple, where half the people live upon a visiting half, must be revised. Three hundred thousand population needs other explanation. Somewhere such a great body of people must find root in the soil or in productive industry. This is the revelation that one notes upon investigation, that Los Angeles is a considerable manufacturing center, a great jobbing center, and that the larger economic movements under way are laying the foundations for a population soon destined to pass the half-million mark.

Bulk of Manufactures.

The manufactures are the first surprise. More than 12,000 people are employed in factories in Los Angeles. One usually thinks Los Angeles has no factories, but here are some of them: steel rolling mills, flour mills, foundries, brass works, paper-box factories, tiling factories, manufactories of mining machinery, pumps, glass, cement, implements, the list could be extended to fatiguing length.

Another way to estimate the importance of her manufactures is to note that in Los Angeles are 430 miles of spur track railroad, from which 100,000 cars of freight move annually into commerce on main lines. And these besides the usual tram tracks for general public use.

Trading Center of Southwest

Los Angeles holds another secret, its enormous wealth. The mining and agricultural lands of Utah and Nevada, of Arizona and New Mexico, and Mexico itself, all pay tribute to Southern California. She is their trading post. They buy of her machinery, clothes, food stuffs—all the necessities of living; and of this trade are born the great wholesale houses and their attendant train of employees. In turn, the products of these markets come here for transshipment, for manufacture, or for sale.

And these tributary places hold vast reserves of wealth that lie waiting improved facilities of manufacture and transportation to be developed. Vast beds of coal and iron sleep in the hills of Utah and Nevada, waiting for the opening of the Panama Canal, for the completion of the harbor at San Pedro, for the extension of the Oriental trade.

A Coming Port.

"The opening of San Pedro." Already there is here a port. But as it is not yet done, the engineering task is easy: so much mud to be dredged, so many wharves to be built. The human problem is being solved. The inertia of the blind resistance made for years by the Southern Pacific railroad against San Pedro in favor of Santa Monica is yielding to the public pressure. San Pedro will be consolidated with Los Angeles within the year. Sooner or later—probably soon—the great resources of water frontage will be developed in the inner harbor, and commerce will flow through Los Angeles along the natural grade to the city-owned wharves and docks of Wilmington, and a new era of progress in the south will be opened.

For instance, this, with fuel oil, with an Oriental market, with Texas cotton reached by easy grade along the Southern Pacific, with freight rates reduced by water competition of the Canal, why, say the long-visioned men of Los Angeles, shall not a great textile industry grow here, to supply China and India and Japan their cheapest fabrics? Or, with a process of steel-making with oil as a fuel—a process whose imminent success seems probable—shall not the iron beds of Utah yield their riches and come here for fabrication into structural steel and machinery?

Good Roads, for Freight.

These are anticipations of conservative men whose wealth has been made here. In another direction, they look to a system of good roads now in process of construction, as a means of salvation from discriminatory railroad rates. With easy grades, broad-tired auto trains can haul the citrus crop to the wharves, twenty or thirty miles away, where it can load on ships which, because of their bulk, can be more economically refrigerated, and, because of their cheap rates, will vastly reduce the cost of getting the crop to eastern markets.

All these things mean growth in trade, growth in manufactures, growth in cultivated area, growth in population. Because of these, and partly to assist them, the people of Los Angeles are building for the future a magnificent water system. The bald figures are amazing. Two hundred and twenty-five miles of aqueduct, to bring water from Owens Lake. Tunnels—twenty-nine miles of them; cost $24,000,000; 280,000 gallons of water per day; 60,000 electrical horsepower. All this the city's purchase, construction, property, the heritage of future generations. Water for a city of four millions, electric power rivaling all the present development of all the electrical systems in Southern California. Irrigation for thousands of now barren acres in the San Fernando valley.

These things indicate a vision of future possibilities, a constructive imagination, a spirit of daring and hope and energy that is of a piece with the rejuvenation of San Francisco and the traditions of the Argonauts. Los Angeles has been called "The City of Perpetual Boost." It may be that; but over against the boast of promotion in justice let us set the bonds that her citizens have pledged for Owens water, the bonds they have pledged for better roads, the work they are doing to upbuild the material prosperity of their land. And with these evidences of material growth, let us record their growth in civic conscience that has led the best of her citizens to cleanse her politics and league to keep them clean.

GOVERNOR FOLK COMING.

Governor Joseph W. Folk, of Missouri, will be in San Francisco next Tuesday, May 18th. At noon of that day he will be tendered a public reception by the Government League in the Music Room of the St. Francis Hotel. Following the reception, an informal luncheon, costing $2.00 a plate will be given. The public is invited to attend both reception and luncheon. Mayor Taylor is expected to preside, and Francis J. Heney will make a short speech, but the principal address will be by Governor Folk on "Good Government."

Sardou's Prediction.

Sardou once said to a companion: "It seems as if they could not disgrace our Paris too much. Could anything be uglier than that statue in a morning coat? To think that in order to place that hideous monument there they removed a charming little fountain like the one still at the other corner. You may be sure that the fountain that is left will be destroyed some day and some abominable effigy of a contemporary celebrity will take its place. Poor Paris!"

The day has come. The Municipal Council has recently decided to erect a statue to the memory of the author of "Madame Sans-Gene" and the place chosen is the pretty little fountain which Victorien Sardou so much admired.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

THE LITERARY SPIRIT OF THE DAY AS REFLECTED IN CURRENT PUBLICATIONS.

KIPLING'S LATEST FANCY.

Mr. Kipling's latest book is "With the Night Mail," which came out two or three years ago as a magazine story. It is a tale of aerial navigation in 2025, marked by wonderful imagination and coloring.

Years ago there was a story of Mr. Kipling's discontent when his American publisher forwarded him a batch of magazines on request, but to decrease the bulk had the advertising pages stripped off. Mr. Kipling declared that the advertisements were the most interesting part. Carrying out this idea, Kipling claimed his new book, as a magazine story of the year 2025, should have the atmosphere of that period. So as a kind of appendix to the story he has written the Notes, Letters to the Editor, Answers to Correspondents, and Advertising Pages such as he believes will be found at the end of the magazines of that day.

In the Answers to Correspondents, one who signs "Paterfamilias" is informed by the editor that a certain offender "is liable for direct damage both to your chimneys and any collateral damage caused by fall of bricks into garden, etc., etc. Bodily inconvenience and mental anguish may be included, but the average jury are not, as a rule, men of sentiment. If you can prove that his grapple removed any portion of your roof, you had better rest your case on decoverture of domicile (V. Parkins vs. Duboulay). We entirely sympathize with your position, but the night of the 14th was stormy and confused, and—you may have to anchor on a stranger's chimney yourself some night. Verbum sap."

Among the "ads," we find:
Man Wanted—Dig driver for Southern Alps with Saharan summer trips; high levels, high speed, high wages.

Family dirigible; a competent, steady man wanted for slow speed, low level Tangeye dirigible; no night work; no sea trips; must be able to make himself useful in the garden.

Powell's Wind Hovers for planes lying-to in heavy weather, save the motor and strain on the forebody.

Books advertised are:

Hawkin's Fog and How to Avoid It. Van Zuylen's Secondary Effects of Thunder-Storms; An Illuminated Star Map, with clock-work attachment, giving apparent motion of the heavens, and Belt's Way Books, "giving town lights for all towns over 4,000 population."

WHAT CAINE THINKS OF US.

Hall Caine writes in the current "Appletons" the following appreciation of us:

"I love America and the Americans. I love America because it is big, and because its bigness is constantly impressing the imagination and stimulating the heart. I love its people because they are the most industrious, earnest, active, and ingenious people on the earth; because they are the most moral, religious, and above all, the most sober people in the world; because, in spite of all shallow judgments of superficial observers, they are the most childlike in their national character, the easiest to move, the laughter, the readiest to be touched to tears, the most absolutely true in their impulses, and the most generous in their applause. I love the men of America because their bearing toward the women is the finest chivalry I have ever seen anywhere, and I love the women because they can preserve an unquestioned purity with a frank and natural manner, and a fine independence of sex. I love the constitution of America because its freedom is the freest I know of.

"And if these are qualities which have their defects, I go to the length of loving some of the failings of American life and character as well. I love the brusqueness of speech and the freedom of manners which imply that Jack is as good as his master and sometimes a good deal better."

"THE GLORY AND THE DREAM."

(For The California Weekly.)

The morning calls to the noonday,
Noon to the setting sun,
The dawning night mourns for the light
Of the day that is not begun.

The lover dreams of his passion
Fed by the maiden's kiss,
The bride of a night weeps a lost delight,
Each for a vanished bliss.

The ocean mirrors the sky's hue,
Stars, of the glowing sun,
The murmuring sea croons the litaney
Winds have sung as they run.

The music that thrills our heart's blood
Sighs of a lost desire,
The flaming eyes of a wild surmise
Kindle the warrior's fire.

The dullard lolls to his senses;
Poet of the world's things,
Of bygone might, of coming right—
Aloof in his bower sings.

The morning calls to the noonday,
Noon to the setting sun,
The blind to-morrow sees yesterday's sorrow,
Future, past, prevent, is one.

A JOURNAL FOR SNOBS.

A friend of the California Weekly brought to this office a copy of "The Gentleman's Journal," edited, its editors would have us know, from Fifth avenue, New York city, as "a journal for men—written by gentlemen and for gentlemen."

The ideal sounds reasonable, but the performance indicates a sinister and un-American conception of ideas of "snob" and "gentleman." How does this editorial ecstasy appeal to the American of everyday ancestry: "In our social essays we shall deal with the man at leisure and at his ease: breakfasting in his rooms, chatting at a house party, lolling aboard a boat, supping at a cafe, perhaps, or riding to hounds of a gray, gusty morning. We shall describe the appointments necessary or convenient for his comfort and dignity (sic), either as guest or host, and the duties he should expect from his servant, etc."

How these dime-novel phases of the elegant rich flow from the facile pen! We breakfast in our "rooms," forsooth; "chat"—not talk, horrors! no—at a "house-party"; "loll" and "sup" and "ride to hounds." In the language of an inelegant and utterly impossible person, of course, "Slush, isn't the ocean dusty!"

Listen and hear who our instructor is in "the practice of those politenesses which mark a finished gentleman in the social emergencies that confront every man daily." The Observer specifies: "I have been met with in Fifth avenue, in Pall Mall, in the Bois, on the Grand Canal. You may have brushed shoulders with me as we drank leman squash in the safe at Monte Carlo; we have touched elbows, perhaps, watching Abdul Hamid grouch gorgeously to his prayers in Constantinople. We may have smoked in the billiard-room of a Scotch shooting lodge; you may have read of me as at one time attache to the Austrian court. My name has long been on the Visitor's Book at Windsor; and I had the honor to watch 'North-East' land the last Grande Prix, from the box of a very exalted personage indeed."

Now, isn't it kind of him to feel that "it would be of great use to my younger and less experienced fellow countrymen if I gave them the benefit of my knowledge in those matters of social value which every man of the world recognizes as so essential to being a gentleman?" "Are we vulgarizing the British aristocracy?" he asks in the headline of a two-page article. Echo answers. Echo asks on the editorial page that every "gentleman" shall be informed as to "Crisp Cynicism" by Elinor Glyn, authors of the unspeakable "Three Weeks," as of course, cynicism is a sure mark of "the man of the world." The Observer makes one grave oversight, however. We have searched his book, and we cannot find the word "hauteur." Does not The Observer know that "hauteur" is an indispensable attribute of every "gentleman"? We are disappointed in him. Still, perhaps, we can forgive him; he does use "raison d'être" and "messieurs" and "mon dieu!" "my dear fellow," "waistcoat," and "neckerchief," and speaks so nonchalantly of "Sherry's" and "Delmonico's."

We commend "The Gentleman's Journal" to our growing class of snobs, but to the rest of us it suggests a thing unclean, a desire for disinfectants and a bath, and a re-reading of Kipling's "Barrack-Room Ballads" to get back a wholesome sense of connection with reality and fellowship in the world of men.

THE FIGHTING FAILURE.

He has come the way of the fighting men and fought by the rules of the Game,
And out of Life he has gathered—what? A living—and little fame.
Ever and ever the Goal loms near—seeming each time worth while,
But ever it proves a mirage fair—ever the grim gods smile.
And so, with lips hard set and white, he buries the hope that is gone—
His fight is lost—and he knows it is lost—and yet he is fighting on.

Out of the smoke of the battle-line, watching men win their way,
And cheering with those who cheer success, he enters again the fray,
Licking the blood and dust from his lips, wiping the sweat from his eyes,
He does the work he is set to do, and—"there—in honor lies."
Brave they were, those men he cheered, theirs is the winners' thrill;
His fight is lost—and he knows it is lost—and yet he is fighting still.

And those who have won, have rest and peace; and those who have died, have more;
But, weary and spent, he cannot stop, seeking the ultimate score.
Courage was theirs for a little time—but what of the man who sees
That loss he must, yet will not beg for mercy, upon his knees?
Side by side with grim gray Death, he struggles at dusk or dawn;
His fight is lost—and he knows it is lost—and yet he is fighting on.

Praise for the warriors who succeed, and tears for the vanquished dead,
The World will hold them close to her heart, something each honored head;
But there in the ranks, soul-sick, time-tried, he battles against the odds,
Sans hope, but true to his colors torn, the plaything of the gods!
Uncover when he goes by at last! Held to his task by will,
The fight is lost—and he knows it is lost—and yet he is fighting still!

GEORGE MEREDITH AN AMERICAN FIND.

An Australian university professor has sent to a Melbourne newspaper an account of his interview at Box Hill with George Meredith. Asked whether he had ever thought of visiting Australia the novelist said that when he was young enough to travel he could not afford it. Nobody, he added, would read his books at that time, and he doubted whether his "dear countrymen" would ever have been persuaded to look at them if the Americans had not led the way.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Modern Cave-Dwellers.

Not all cave dwellers passed from earth in the passing of those barbarous ancient peoples whose homes in the rocks men now investigate with much interest. On the contrary, there still is a large number of troglodytes dwelling on (or in) the surface of the earth. A recent traveler in France estimates their number in that country alone at no less than 2,000,000. For seventy miles along the valley of the Loire, from Bois to Saumur, the great majority of the rural inhabitants dwell in caves which they, themselves, have fashioned. They do this of choice—the most of them being at least comfortably well off—experience having taught them that the caves are warm in winter, cool in summer, and as they view the matter, well adapted to their use. But perhaps the most remarkable feature of such underground life is a veritable village which is found in the salt mines near Cracow in Austrian Poland. This village, situated far below the surface of the ground, has been in existence since the first half of the fourteenth century. In it nearly a score of generations have been born, lived their burrowing lives and passed away. The village has its railroads, connecting the various parts of the mine, its streets, its church, stores, public hall, residences and most of what is found in villages that know the sun. It has its births, deaths, and that "marrying and giving in marriage" which is man's midway post between the two. So it will be seen that we need not hunt an antediluvian world to find cave-dwellers.

Open-Air Public Schools.

It is not in the least strange that the idea of conducting open-air public schools is meeting with favor, for the arguments in its favor are so evident and so substantial that the only wonder is that the idea had not long ago been suggested and carried into effect. But, while this favorable consideration might have been expected, it certainly does seem curious that the first section of our country to carry the idea into practical execution should be New England, with its long and cold winters; yet this is what has come to pass. Providence, R. I., established such a school last year, and Boston now has one and a commission of its school department recommends the establishment of a number in the interest of the better health of children. This back where the Pilgrim Fathers landed and escaped freezing to death by a narrow majority! Out here in California, where Nature issues a perpetual invitation to all humankind to be out in the open, we are considering the idea—at least, some people hope we are.

Great Britain's "Spoliation Budget."

London correspondents are referring to the proposed new British tax law as the "spoliation budget," and while there probably would be complaint over any increase of taxes, a cursory examination of the proposed law indicates that the correspondents' name for it may not be misapplied. The rich man in particular appears to be "up against it," and, while he is best able to endure it, his lot will be trying, at least. He must pay an 8 per cent. income tax, $200 a year for every automobile he owns, an increased tax on his land, and 20 per cent. of all increase in land values. In addition to this, when he dies his estate must pay a death duty of 15 per cent., 10 per cent. on all bequests to near relatives, and a tax of 2 per cent. on all estates passing to probate. It would require just about four deaths to obliterate an estate. There are other features which are not much better, but these are sufficient to indicate that hard times are ahead for the rich. But wealthy if this law should go into effect. It is not at all probable that it will. It is attempted to be justified only on the ground that immense sums of money must be raised, principally for the increase of the navy, and much as Britain thinks of her navy, she is not likely to be willing to place all her wealth in it. It is expected that the issue will go to the people for popular decision, and there is thought to be little doubt that they will decide against it. While we have been considering how to make wealth pay its proportionate share of taxes, and deprecating little about it, our English cousins appear to have become vigorously active in the matter—somewhat too vigorously, it would seem.

Weight of the Human Brain.

Professor F. W. Mott, an English scientist who has been conducting experiments relating to the weight of the human brain, announced his conclusions in a lecture recently given in the Royal Institution in London. According to his observations, the average brain of a female child at birth weighs 361 grams, while that of a male child weighs but 321 grams. This handicap of 11 or 12 per cent. might seem most discouraging to the boy, but he goes nobly to work and more than overcomes it, so that by the time he is an adult his brain, supposing it is of average size, weighs 1,350 to 1,380 grams, while that of his sister or his wife weighs but 1,213 to 1,220 grams. The percentage is reversed, but the professor does not apologize for the implied reflection on womankind. However, neither need man be ashamed of the bad start he makes nor woman of the equally bad end at which she arrives, for it is entirely possible that another deliver in brains would arrive at statistical conclusions largely at variance with those of Professor Mott, it being a certainty that a limited number of brains selected by chance would vary considerably from an equal number of other brains selected in the same way.

International Fishery Agreement.

President David Starr Jordan of Stanford University, representing the United States, and Professor E. E. Prince, representing the Canadian government, have carefully considered the question of fishing in the boundary waters between the United States and Canada which so long has seemed a possible cause of trouble between the two governments, and have arrived at an agreement which is satisfactory. Under its terms the United States government will appoint a federal protection staff which will co-operate with the Canadian fisheries protection service, the two governments thus acting jointly for the enforcement of mutual regulations. It is hoped and believed that this will terminate the possibility of trouble growing out of the old and complicated fishery question.

Cocoonat Pearls.

Nature, the mighty chemist, turns out some marvelous things in her gigantic laboratory, and not the least curious of these is what is known as the cocoonat pearl. A specimen is exhibited in the museum at Kew, England. It is nearly a half inch in diameter, pure white in color and of excellent polish. That it was developed in a cocoonat there is no room to doubt, and although specimens of its kind are rare, they are far from being unknown. Some of them have been analysed by chemists, and no difference between them and the pearls of ocean can be detected, nor is their microscopic structure at all different. In each case the chemical constituents of the pearl are the same, viz.: carbonate of lime, organic matter and water, but—and here is the curious feature of the case—there is no carbonate of lime in the milk of a cocoonat, by which the pearl apparently must be deposited. It is related that native East Indians not only have known of these cocoonat pearls for a long time but look upon them almost with reverence, attributing all manner of virtues to them, while the rajahs have paid a large price for them, to be used as charms.

A Unique Industry.

During the month of March there is an immense demand for sprigs of shamrock to be worn on St. Patrick's day, and this demand comes not only from Ireland, but from England, her colonies, the United States and, indeed, wherever an Irish foot is set. So great and so constantly increasing is this demand that it has given birth to a queer industry in Ireland, an industry which has not its kind elsewhere on earth. This consists of the establishment of "shamrock farms" on which nothing but this dainty little Hibernian clover is grown. Already there are several of these farms, and their number is said to be increasing with each year that passes. The time may come when more tame than wild shamrock will be grown in Ireland, but it has not yet arrived.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Heart of Mine.

Tired, and worn, and weary?
I know, oh, heart of mine.
The old, dim eyes are teary.
That once were hope-ashine,
Dead hope, no more creating
Youth's visions, half divine;
And you are only waiting
What cometh, heart of mine.

Yet, heart of mine, faint never,
How'er the spirit fares;
Beyond our sore endeavor
Is One who heals and cures.

Oh, heart of mine, I know it;
Your dream doth shattered lie,
And tares of doubt o'ergrow it,
And scorpions pass it by;
And, oh, the burden laden,
I bear it here with you,
But serving now to don'ton
The hope that once we knew.

Yet, heart of mine, look higher,
How'er the battle fares.
O'er pain and doubt and tire
Is One who knows and cures.

"The Most Beautiful Girl."

She who has been declared to be "the most beautiful girl in California" has been officially discovered, and her beauty now is being passed out to residents of the state in newspapers of the state, the quantity and quality of that beauty varying with the newspaper in which one chances to see it represented; but this, alas! is one of the penalties of trying to precipitate beauty in printers' ink on paper of varying inferiority.

I am not acquainted with the winner of this beauty contest, and I do her and the judges the justice to presume that she is a very "queen rose in the rosebud garden of girls," "divinely tall and most divinely fair," and anything else the poets may have said on this most alluring subject; and yet, gladly conceding this, I venture to suggest, not a doubt, but a wonder, whether she really is "the most beautiful girl in California." Suppose it should chance that the most beautiful girl would refuse to be a contestant in a beauty race; suppose she should decline to send her photograph to any committee on the ground that she did not wish to express the opinion that she considered herself the champion beauty; suppose she should prefer not to be the object of the wig-wag of a million tongues—supposing all these things, and probably they are not un-supposable, how can we be certain that the "most beautiful girl in the state" is the most beautiful girl in the state? This is what puzzles me.

The beauty of the winner in this contest is conceded, but how are we to be assured, before we weave our crown of roses, that there is not somewhere a modest little woman—and perhaps several of them—who is as sweet and beautiful as she is modest, to whom Mother Nature herself has awarded this crown, although she, herself, would be last to suspect it? In brief, must one indorse the official decision, or may he respectfully differ from it?

The Distinction.

If I want a thing, and make it my own,
Though it's neither a gift, a sale or a loan,
Why, that, as the world has a long time known,
Is stealing.

If I want a thing, and I bribe a man
To steal it for me from the public pan,
Though I own it seems a rascally plan,
It's high finance.

The difference may seem to you and me
As twinedee-dum to twinedee-dee,
But wait till the higher court strikes the key—
Then you'll notice something.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Our Way, and His.

He walked among the vile. His wayworn

Knew slobber paths by Shame and Error
trod;

Decrying sin, he held that it were meet
To lead the tattered sinner up to God.

Ah, who would choose, where pleasures rare abound,

And soft-eyed Peace doth beckon us the while,

To dream with her through days with rapture crowned,

To walk among the vile?
The snuffing hypocrite who thanks his God
That he is not as brothers by his side,
The canting pharisee with power shod,
These were the ones this vagrant wight decried.

Why, who would dare to hold man's trophies less.

Than what the cackling multitude maintain?
And who so foolish as of choice would press
The awful path of pain?

Our lives speak our contempt for such as he;
Our prisons loom for such as bedless roam;
A wiser way is known to you and me.

Whose charity begins—and ends—at home.
Do brothers perish? Shrug, and say, "Ah,
well!"

But ne'er for him such scanty heed sufficed,
For he—oh wonder of the tale I tell!—
He was the loving Christ.

Universities and Dan Cupid.

But are we not a little hard on our students in the universities? Are we not about equally disposed to find fault with them if they do and if they wonder of the tale I tell—How rapidly as we fancy they should me wait a while, and then we get out our statistical tables and demonstrate, to our own satisfaction, that higher education is leading to race suicide, devoting pages in magazines and newspapers to this meritorious enterprise. If, on the contrary, they show signs of maturing, we immediately publish tabulated lists of engagements, and sternly paint the immoral moral that higher co-education unduly hastens marriage and is a very bad thing on that account.

The student seems to be "up against it." If he marries, we grumble; if he doesn't, we growl.

Apparently it does not occur to a large number of our publications that human and sex nature are about the same, whether they be educated or uneducated. A boy or girl does not need much education to find an attraction in one of the opposite sex, and you are not likely to educate them so thoroughly that this attraction will be lessened. Dame Nature has a way of attending to these little matters herself, and that philosopher and clown alike own her sway let the history of mankind proclaim.

Probably it would be just as well to drop both the statistics and their morals. Proving both sides of the question, they demonstrate too much to be highly useful. And in the meantime we safely can leave it to the boys and girls to do as nature dictates—which is precisely what we and our ancestors, educated or uneducated, through all generations, have done.

Advice by an Expert.

"Young man," said old Allplunx to his confidential employee, "if you wish to be really successful in life, be a judicious and liberal briber."

"But they indicted you for it, didn't they?"
the young man remarked.

"Oh, yes, of course, but that is a mere incident of the business."

"Shouldn't think it could have been pleasant."

"Oh, I don't know. It gave all other judicious and liberal bribers, their friends and my newspaper, an opportunity to assert that I was a noble and public-spirited citizen who was being abused and maligned, and a large part of the public believed it. But that isn't the real point."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, the account stands this way: To sum expended in judicious bribes, $200,000; to employing lawyers to prove that I am noble, public-spirited and abused, $200,000; to buying papers, incidentals, etc., $300,000; total, $700,- 000."

"It seems to come high. That's a big sum."

"Certainly, but look at the profit. Our experts calculate we will make at least $1,500,000 on the franchise we bought, or over 170 per cent on our investment. I tell you, son, if you wish to make a glittering success of life it is absolutely necessary for you to be a judicious and liberal briber."

"I see," said the young man.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

The California Weekly.
Woodland, Cal., May 5, 1909.
Dear Sir:—I have tried to get people acquainted with your paper, and hope I have induced some to subscribe.

At honest and a decent newspaper is the noblest work of man.

Long may you live and prosper. Yours,
G. P. HURST.

There are five principal reasons why newspapers get the reputation of being dishonest. One is that their editors are tempted to follow their judgments rather than their consciences and, having as little judgment as conscience, they get off wrong.

A second reason is that they tell things for the purpose of procuring a given effect upon the public mind, desirable or undesirable as the case may be, and hold that the end justifies the means even at the cost of ever after blushing in the presence of truth.

A third is that they are not so sincere in striving to ascertain the truth as they are in striving to tell what, upon insufficient investigation, seems to them to be true. This fault catches the best of us sometimes.

A fourth is that they deliberately prostitute themselves for money, let themselves to hire, champion that which is paid for and fight that which they are paid to fight. The English language is so terribly rich in epithets applicable to such journals, but the use of all of them leaves the user with a sense of inadequacy of expression bordering on helplessness.

A fifth is that they tell as true what we don't believe to be true.

There are others.

Dear Mr. Pillsbury: The School for Citizenship is in my opinion a valuable part of the California Weekly. It seems to me that we cannot be too often reminded that our government is not a thing apart but that, in the last analysis, the people constitute the government. Your articles about the rights acquired by the people in the struggles of long ago have been preserved to them, are especially valuable in reminding that "it is not so long to what rights from a king and to what them down in a book." I hope these articles will continue. Yours very truly,
O. K. CUSHING.

So far as the editor of The California Weekly knows this paper is the only one printed that systematically undertakes to tell its young readers (and we are glad to know that some of the adults enjoy the department) what every citizen needs to know in order to become a citizen of the United States in the full sense of the term. Being out of the ordinary the department has not attracted particular attention that the Staff knows of, though there have been some encouraging responses to it. The ordinary text book on government gives the skeleton without the meat, the body of government advances to a consideration of our state government, and the more usual functions of near-by citizenship, it will be the purpose to bring it just as near to the living, breathing thing we call government as possible. It will deal with the practice of government as well as with the theory. In a nutshell the expectation is that, sooner or later as the series progresses, every question that an intelligent youth can ask about government will be answered. With this in view we commend the paper to the favorable consideration of every father who has a son old enough to take an interest in public affairs.

Temperance vs. Prohibition.

Editor The California Weekly:

Dear Sir:—Dr. Alison says fifty years ago physicians were generally disposed to speak kindly of the alcoholic beverage. He is right; the reason why is, fifty years ago good, pure whisky sold for twenty-five cents per gallon, and as a rule was drunk by most all classes of people, ministers included. I can say there was less drunkenness then than now, and over indulgence did not result in stomach derangement or headache. It contained no deleterious ingredients as it does today.

To class alcohol with mineral poison such as strychnine, arsenic and opium is rank nonsense. Anything used to excess which tends to destroy your health is a poison to your system. From observation I can say that there are as many or more people today dying by drinking good whisky to excess. Most all very old people are either smokers or moderate drinkers. They enjoy their stimulants which are a comfort and a food to them. An old lady neighbor of mine, eighty-four years of age, always smoked a corncob pipe, and she used to tell me as long as her pipe tasted good she was all right.

Our All Wise Creator created all things for our use and not for abuse. Every nationality has its stimulants, and if my neighbor seeks to deprive me of anything he does not want himself it is selfish tyranny. Noah raised grapes, made wine and enjoyed drinking it. Christ helped out a merry wedding party when they ran short of the good wine that makes the heart glad by turning water into wine. St. Paul recommended wine to his disciple, Timothy. Wine, beer or stimulants in some form have been and will be made and drank as long as the world stands.

Prohibition does not, never did or never can stop it. One may as well try to dam up the Mississippi river. The only sane way to modify the drink evil is Mr. Gustave Fabst says: Abolish the dives; granting licenses only to those that can be relied upon to conduct saloons properly. Sane regulating under laws approved by the people will be productive of good results. A good plan would be to gather and publish results of prohibition laws where they have proved failures as in the state of Iowa and elsewhere. Iowa had a twenty-five years sad experience. There was as much and more drank as before and it impoverished the state as the money for liquor all went to other states which had sane laws. One instance, the town of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, 6,000 population before prohibition law passed had two drug stores. After it passed, and drug stores had permits to sell liquor for medicinal use, four more drug stores started up although people were as healthy as before, except the increase in the number of drunkards who were sick men for some days after a booze as drug whisky was not like whisky fifty years ago.

Of thirty-nine patent medicines now sold, all contain alcohol from 13 to 47 per cent, which is stronger than good, pure whisky, leaving sherry, port, claret or champagne far behind. Good beer contains from 2 to 5 per cent alcohol. The sensational methods which the prohibition party uses to further its cause are decidedly questionable. They try to do away in a few weeks with customs that have existed centuries.

What have they to offer instead?

Very truly yours,

J. H. GOETSCHKE.

The first cup of coffee was drank in Europe at Venice in the year 1591, when a Venetian doctor introduced the berries from Egypt and taught his countrymen how to crush them and brew the beverage. The use of coffee soon became general, so much so in fact that Venice was full of coffee houses where the people killed away their days drinking the aromatic beverage.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

"Straw Men" Candidates

The mayoralty campaign in San Francisco is still in the side show stage of progress, with would-be bosses standing up straw men for the public to look at and watching what the people think of them. William Crocker, the lumberman, was among the first of the straw men put up for inspection, but he made the mistake of having two rival showmen stand sponsor for his appearance, without telling either that the other was "on the door." The result is that McCarthy, who wanted to handle his campaign, and thought he was doing it, found out that Tim Sullivan was really taking the tickets, and he has developed a corresponding lassitude of interest in Crocker. This coolness has lately been followed by McCarthy passing the word to a few of his trusted barkers that McCarthy himself is the star attraction, and is making his political moves on the basis of leading organized labor another time to the polls.

McCarthy and Casey Getting Together

Incidentally, McCarthy seems to have out-generaled his rival labor leader, Michael Casey, of the Board of Works—or, more properly, to have taken him in, in all senses of the term. Casey and McCarthy had an all-afternoon session together on April 29th, and what seems to have happened is that Casey left with the privilege of playing politics for McCarthy's good for a return not very obvious to the average mind. Casey has allied himself in the Board of Works with Thos. A. Day, the board's president, who, with former commissioner Egan, used to oust Casey's friends every chance they got. Apparently McCarthy and Tom Finn, the president of the County Committee of the Labor Party, have been using Casey to get McCarthy men into office. For example, George Keeley has been replaced as Superintendent of Streets, by E. I. Nolan, one of McCarthy's political lieutenants and a gentleman whose lighter line of relations are devoted to promoting sport by managing Johnny Murphy's career as a lightweight pugilist. For another example, Boiler Inspector Andy Porter—who supported the good government ticket at the last election—has been succeeded by Ed. McDonald, another McCarthyite from the Thirty-second District, who changed his registration last year in order to go to the Democratic State Convention at Stockton to represent the McNab interests by supporting Harry Flannery's man, George A. Tracy, for Congress. Tracy, beaten, and by the way, is having the fight of his life to retain leadership in his own union, the typographical Casey Letting Just what Casey gets out of the Camel In this happy arrangement does not clearly appear, but politically weatherwise folks say he principally gets left, as he is undermining his own personal following while McCarthy gets the plums. Casey's candidates for mayor are plural, but unfortunately so far have not proved lucky choice. Andy Gallagher, of the San Francisco Labor Council, has had sweet nothings piped in his ear by Casey, but Casey is not believed to mean anything serious by it. Frank J. Sullivan leaped to sudden notoriety under Casey's tutelage, but unfortunate confidence to the duty press in which he abused James D. Phelan, his brother-in-law, seem to have put him into unfortunate relations with the conservative element among the unionists.

Tom Finn and "Floater" Haggerty

Tom Finn, the other benevolent assimilation of Casey, was police commissioner under Schmitz, went to the legislature in 1906 as a Democrat, went to legislature in 1907 as a Republican, and is now, in 1909, chairman of the County Committee of the Labor Party and is said to be toying with the nomination for mayor himself on the labor ticket, though McCarthy will probably

"flatten" that ambition. Finn's saloon on East street is, however, the political pothouse where quereyry's boom for mayor foamed and staled, and still is a center of much political activity. His chief lieutenant is "Floater" Haggerty, another Schmitz police commissioner.

McNab's Lonely Looking Part

The McNabocrats are having a rough road, too. Ever since McNab knifed the four people's choice candidates for judgeship at the last election, he has had no hope of connecting with any of the good government elements in any party, and he has reluctantly concluded that his pet candidate, Coroner Leland, has no show. Larry Walsh's candidacy—he was president of the Board of Education under Schmitz—is now credited to McNab. Larry Dolan, the present sheriff, is being exhibited by Fire Commissioner McCarthy, but he is tolerably certain to be fought by the labor people, as the fire commission has gotten itself continually into the bad graces of the unionists over the letting of contracts for fire boxes go outside the city. Dolan is also weak in the Mission, where the big vote is polled, largely because of the incompetence of his appointees.

League Clubs and The Independent Republicans

The independent Republicans enlisted under the Municipal League of Good Government clubs have perfected organization in five districts and expect to have clubs soon in all districts. They hope to make these clubs as strong as the parent club in the Thirty-ninth. The independent Republican who is most frequently mentioned as candidate for mayor is James Rolph, Jr., president of the Mission Improvement Association, president of two banks, and a life-long and very popular resident of the Mission district. His election is conceded if he will accept the nomination, which he has so far declined to do. He is a friend of the graft prosecution, and a man who so far has resisted the pressure of his friends who make the class appeal that Calhoun is "our kind of people."

Democratic Endorsements

The independent Democrats who, as the San Francisco Democratic Club, are organized to fight McNab, are to hold a conference a week from next Wednesday to unite on a ticket. The district club in the Thirty-third District recently endorsed David I. Mahoney, former police commissioner, for mayor, and Louis Ferrari for district attorney.

Permanent Reform Body in Los Angeles

The newly organized Good Government Organization in Los Angeles evidently means business. Coinciding with the arrival of Walter Parker in Los Angeles the other day, the executive committee of the organization met in Marshall Stimson's office and arranged to form a good government club in every voting precinct and to invite the following political and social organizations to ally themselves with the movement: The City Club, Voters' League, College Men's Association, Municipal League, Democratic League, Central Labor Council, Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce and various improvement associations throughout the city. "The plan of the movement," says Secretary Clarke, "is to array our forces and begin immediate work for the December battle. We want to secure a perfect organization in every precinct in the city, to be able to put the issue squarely before the public and to get our vote out on election day." The following men constitute the present executive board: S. C. Graham, Marshall Stimson, Dr. Sherwin Gibbons, Dr. John R. Haynes, Dr. Thomas J. Nelson, Dr. S. H. Tolhurst, Richmond Plant, James A. Anderson, Cyrus McNutt, Sidney A. Butler, Harry R. Callender, Charles A. Elder, A. P. Chapin and Meyer Lissner.

Sacramento and the Saloon Issue

Sacramento is a brewery town. It believes in beer and in having beer so convenient to the consumer that the shortest distance between two points shall be a straight line leading from the home to a beer saloon. Some years ago the Tuesday Club, a strong organization of determined Sacramento womanhood, secured the establishment of ordinance restricting the establishment of further saloons within a prescribed district, known generally as the business part of town, the hope being that the saloons in the residence districts would gradually disappear as their owners died off or moved away. They have neither died off nor moved away and the residential district saloon is still an offense to the growing sense of decency of the Capital City. Two years ago an effort was made to vote the saloon out of the residential districts, but the men folks, despite the pleadings of the women folk, snowed the proposition under. However, Sacramento is not content to rest steeped in sin and beer and it has constituted a committee of public-spirited men, neither prohibitionists nor saloon sympathizers, to take up the issue and formulate some workable plan to make saloon conditions brtter. The issue as formulated will be fought out in the forthcoming city election. It will be watched with great interest all over the state! The breweries of Sacramento have undertaken to govern Sacramento, by and with the advice and consent of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company and its political consort, the Sacramento red light district, including Chinatown and its king, Trustee Rider. The political significance of this movement is scarcely less important than the moral issues involved.

Some Very Big Politics

The state of feeling between the people of Great Britain and those of Germany is one of profound concern to the world. It is unhealthy. On the part of the British it is almost hysterical. The Germans are more self-contained and, let us hope, prudent. Both countries want to know where, in the event of war breaking out between them, the sympathies of the United States will be. It is safe to say that they will not be with the aggressor. War between these two nations would be a world calamity unless, indeed, it should prove so disastrous to both antagonists as to bring about international disarmament. That might be worth the price, awful as it must prove. But to all inquiries President Taft will present a phymicly immobile of countenance that will baffle even an adept at draw poker.

PHYSICAL REGENERATION

By ELMER ELLSWORTH CAREY.

I suppose it is possible for any one who has reached the age of forty or fifty years to regain in a great measure the health and vitality enjoyed ten, fifteen or twenty years previously. Few, however, care to undertake the task by correct methods, as it means the renunciation of many pet dietetic sins, and the formation of new habits on a correct basis. Many would rather die than give up certain indulgences of the table. Yet no truth is better established than that disease in general has its foundation in wrong living, especially in wrong eating, which usually means in plain English, "eating too much." Thousands of invalids seek noted springs and spas, hoping to find health in some particular climate or locality; but health is not a matter of climate or mineral waters; it is simply a matter of proper care of the body, according to well-established hygienic principles. A sick person is one who has violated some law of health; often the infirmities of old age are the results of a lifetime of wrong living. The body is loaded with poisons and impurities, mainly earthy and calcareous salts, which have caused the tissue cells to ossify; a better term is "petrify." An old person, stiff, lame and decrepit, is simply a petrified person. The cells of the body should be composed mainly of non-mineral, jelly like substances; instead, we find in the aged a surplus of lime and other inorganic substances which sadly interfere with the functions of the body. In the course of a lifetime, the average person accumulates a large quantity of mineral waste and refuse in the muscles, arteries, veins and in the various tissues of the heart, liver, kidneys, brain, etc. When the deposition of mineral waste and garbage has reached a certain point death follows from petrification of the tissues.

To bring about physical regeneration, the first requisite is the prevention of the entrance into the body of an excess of minerals and the stoppage of the manufacture of poisons and toxic elements within the system. The next point is the removal from the tissues of the accumulated waste and mineral deposits; in other words, the garbage which has collected through improper dietary habits should be removed.

Cereals contain comparatively a large percentage of mineral elements; so those who seek to regain the suppleness of other days should eat sparingly or not at all of cereals. Meats contain uric acid, and other poisons and waste products of metabolism that exist in muscular tissues; all these assist in filling the human system with deleterious material; avoid meats if you would stay the hand of Father Time. In general, any food taken in excess of the amount needed to preserve the natural weight of the body is a clog and a detriment, producing poisonous elements, exhausting the vital forces, and inviting disease by weakening the resistant powers of the body.

Hard water and mineral waters contain inorganic substances in solution which are of no use in the human economy; use soft water or distilled water, and use it plentifully, two or three quarts daily; if juicy fruits are used freely, not so much water is needed. An excess of starchy foods is injurious.

After having cut off the supply of unnecessary minerals and reduced the food supply to proper proportions, there are several methods of eliminating the stored-up waste in the body. In passing it may be remarked that the necessary amount of minerals for the body can best be supplied by the use of green vegetables, nuts and fruits, which should be eaten raw or steamed. The following are some of the systems used to eliminate disease-producing refuse from the body: dry diet cure, fasting, milk cure, fresh fruit treatment, water drinking, raisin cure, internal baths, vapor baths, electric light baths, etc. California olive oil, unfermented grape juice, orange and lemon juice are also used with marked benefit. The quickest way to eliminate refuse and poisonous substances lodged in the tissues is to abstain from all food for a season, drinking water or fruit juices freely as one may be inclined. In fact many, many bodily ills will disappear under this very simple and inexpensive treatment.

The "fruit fast" is recommended by Dr. Kellogg of Battle Creek, Michigan; he recommends the exclusive use of fresh fruits for a time. Copious water drinking is often used as a means of cleansing the system, as the large amount of water (which should be soft or distilled water) dissolves and carries out of the body the accumulations of uric acid, lime and other waste products. When this plan is used but little food should be eaten, or none at all. One of the most pleasant means of assisting the eliminating process is to commence operations in watermelon season and live exclusively on melons. The juice of the melons contains special health giving qualities and ingredients which assist in dissolving the garbage deposited in the byways of the body. In Europe a similar form of treatment is known as the "grape cure," in which the patient is fed exclusively on grapes.

In this state the "grape cure" can be used to advantage in the fall; but the "raisin cure" or "raisin treatment" can be tried at any time. To try this method of bodily recuperation, eat raisins exclusively for one or two weeks, masticating thoroughly; the benefits are more pronounced if unfermented grape juice is also used freely. And by the way, California grape juice is one of the most delicious as well as healthful beverages, and its universal use would go far towards preserving the national health. Unfermented grape juice brings a much higher price than wine, and there is a world-wide market for it. Where one person uses wine, a hundred persons would relish the natural juice. Here is a hint for our grape growers who are confronted with the serious problem of finding a market for their vineyard products. Let them manufacture unfermented grape juice and advertise it as the product of the modern fountain of youth. Grape juice is a fine remedy for rheumatism and blood diseases. The continued use of grape juice will cure more diseases than the combined use of the pharmacopoeia. Its health and vigor giving qualities make it an excellent substitute for the mythical Elixir of Life, the dream of the alchemist. If the life-giving, health-giving and beauty-giving qualities of our California grape juice were known, our vineyardists could not make it fast enough. Advertise it—simply tell the truth about it—and it will sell by the train-load at $1.00 per gallon. There are many brands of eastern grape juice on the market, but they are not to be mentioned in the same breath with California Zinfandel or Muscatel. Here is a latent industry, capable of being expanded into mammoth proportions, of which our vineyardists seem to-day ignorant.

THE EUCALYPTS IN CALIFORNIA

II. WHERE TO PLANT

Written for THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY by GEORGE W. PEAVY, United States Forest Service.

The principal agencies employed by nature to limit the extension of plant growth are temperature, moisture and soil. Elevation plays an important part, but only to that degree in which it produces changes in temperature. Considering temperature alone, the range of any species of plant life could be made to appear as broad bands circling the globe parallel to the equator. If it is a matter of elevation the zones of plant life may be regarded as great belts running parallel to the sea level and changing in character until the line of perpetual snow is reached. As one goes northward the tropical trees give way to the broad leaf deciduous trees and they in turn to the pines and firs. Ascending the Sierras one passes through the successive belts of oak, digger pine, yellow and sugar pine, and finally through the alpine conifers to a treeless region. Then, again, when the temperature and soil are constant factors, the character of the flora of any given region is modified by the quantity of moisture different sections receive and its distribution throughout the year. A striking manifestation of the variations caused by differences in the amount of annual rainfall appears in this state in the gradations from the sparse and practically valueless growth of the Mojave country to the dense forests of the coast redwood belt.

Temperature Requirements.

The home of the eucalypt is in Australia and Tasmania, tropical and semi-tropical regions. Taking the eucalyptus family as a whole, the best and most rapid growth is made in those regions in which the soil is rich, moisture plentiful and frost unknown. Here some species attain dimensions second only to the giant redwoods of California. Going from this ideal situation the growth rate diminishes and species change, until at the limits of the range of the genus, stunted, chaparral-like species alone survive. Considering the requirements of the rapid growing timber eucalypts, then, it is to be expected that they will demand similar conditions in order to make like growth when transplanted to other situations. That the trees do make these demands of new sites is amply proved by the experience of the past forty-five years in this state. To the best of our present knowledge, not one of the important timber species is making satisfactory growth where the temperature falls below twenty degrees Fahrenheit for any considerable period. This at once limits the eucalyptus areas in the state to the Sacramento valley south of Red Bluff, the San Joaquin, the San Gabriel and Colorado river and parts of the region on the ocean side of the Coast Range running in a thin belt to the northern limits of the state.

The Demands for Moisture.

The area thus outlined, however, is not all suited to the growing of eucalyptus timber. On the contrary, in a large part of it the supply of moisture is inadequate for satisfactory results and in still other parts the soil is not fitted to tree growth. Many of the eucalypts can live from year to year on a small amount of moisture. For rapid development, however, in common with all quick growing plants, they need a large amount of water supplied throughout the year. In a fairly retentive soil if the temperature is right, they will do well with a precipitation of twenty-five inches distributed over the rainy season. In the region of ocean fogs a large amount of water is supplied by condensation of this form of moisture on the leaves of the trees. During a heavy fog it is a common thing to see the soil underneath the trees as wet as though a heavy rain had fallen. The amount of water precipitated in this way very materially influences the rate of tree growth and renders situations undesirable because of lack of soil moisture, suitable for the production of valuable timber. The influence of fog is most marked about San Francisco bay and the territory fronting the ocean as far south as Los Angeles.

Still another source of moisture is that beneath the surface, the source upon which non-irrigated trees chiefly rely. The quantity of subsoil moisture varies greatly with the rainfall, the nature of the underlying rock and the opportunities for surface and subsoil drainage. The general level of the subsoil moisture is commonly called the water table. It fluctuates from year to year, depending on the amount of annual rainfall and in certain regions, upon the rate at which mountain streams supply water to the valleys. For example, in situations like the Tulare lake region the water originating in rains and in the mountain streams occasionally raises the lake level to such a degree that thousands of acres are submerged. When the lake subsides to its former level the water table sinks with it, but in the soil it remains slightly above the lake level, the depth to which it falls depending on the nature of the soil and the surface elevation. The position of the water table at any time can be ascertained by making borings or sinking a well. In this way the fluctuations in the level of the water table can be seen. The changing depth of water from season to season and during any given season.

Especially favorable conditions for tree growth may be said to exist when the water table lies five to eight feet from the surface. A water level too close to the surface is almost as grave an obstacle to rapid tree growth as one too low, for it compels the development of a surface root system, thus rendering the trees liable to being overturned by the wind. When the soil and the temperature factors are correct, ideal growing conditions can be produced by irrigation, for by this means the proper amount of water can be supplied at the time it is most needed. Irrigated land in California, however, is very valuable property, especially if it is in the hands of a farmer who can produce a crop. The owner or prospective purchaser of such land should consider well the initial cost and the possible returns before arranging to tie up his investment for fifteen to thirty years.

The Ideal Soils. Hard Pan.

The ideal soil for the eucalypt and in fact for nearly every growing crop, is a rich, deep, sandy loam. With the proper amount of water and the correct degree of temperature a greater volume of wood can be produced than under any other conditions. If this ideal is deviated from, the rate of production will diminish. It goes without saying that land with such soil in this state is a very valuable asset. Whether any considerable amount of it can properly be devoted to the growth of eucalyptus timber is very problematical.

Soils which are apparently well adapted to growing the eucalypts sometimes conceal a serious obstacle to tree growth in the form of hard pan. This usually consists of a more or less continuous layer composed of rock or formed by soil cements, lying at varying distances from the surface. Where the hard pan does not permit of circulation of water, which is usually the case, the water from rainfall is held above it, often rendering the soil too wet to work during the rainy season and preventing the rising of subsoil moisture during the dry season. Where irrigation is possible, hard pan lying from two to three feet from the surface is not a serious obstacle to the production of the common surface crops. Without irrigation such soils are valuable only for forestry purposes. For satisfactory tree growth the hard pan should lie at least six feet below the surface and commercial planting should not be attempted under such situations unless irrigation can be practiced.

Eucalyptus plantations should not be put out on shallow hard pan soil, even if irrigation is possible. Since the total amount of soil available is that lying above the hard pan, the trees will not be supplied with the proper amounts of the soil elements needed for their best development. As a result, the trees will be slow in growth and inferior in form and height. Besides they have been forced to develop a shallow root system on account of which they are likely to be thrown by the wind.

Hard pan occurs in the San Joaquin valley above Tracy and on the eastern side of the San Joaquin river and Tulare lake. It is also found in certain sections of Sacramento valley and in a lesser degree in some of the coast valleys.

Strong alkalis are especially harmful to tender plant growth. Certain plants will endure a quantity that would be fatal to others. The eucalypts, as a rule, are fairly resistant. Since, however, alkali is injurious, it appears to be the part of wisdom to avoid all soils which contain it in harmful quantities. The Tulare lake region in the upper San Joaquin valley is decidedly alkaline in certain sections. So also are the Salinas valley and isolated sections of the Sacramento valley.

Important Considerations.

The prospective planter, then, in selecting a situation for his eucalyptus forest, should secure definite answers to the following questions:

1. Is the temperature within the proper range for the species it is proposed to plant?
2. Can water in sufficient quantities for satisfactory tree growth be obtained throughout the year?
3. Is the area of the proposed plantation underlain with rock or hardpan?
4. Does the soil contain alkali in sufficient quantities to prove injurious to tree growth?

If satisfactory answers cannot be had to these questions, expert advice should be obtained.

Less Favorable Situations.

The general purpose of this discussion has been to indicate the conditions under which the eucalypts will make the greatest volume growth. The reader has been left to infer that the rate of growth would be less in proportion to the deviation from the ideal situation. It must not be understood that planting is not advised on the poorer grades of land. It may be possible that a greater return in relation to the investment can be had from planting on some of the poorer grades of soil. As is very evident, the whole matter of the profitability of the investment goes back to the proportion between the cost of the business and the return from it. Without question there are thousands of acres of land in the state at present largely non-productive which could be profitably devoted to the growing of eucalyptus timber. The returns by comparison with the better sites would be small, and the period when the material would be marketable would be long deferred, matters, however, of little moment if the land is thus put to its highest use.

The rancher who wishes material for home use or who has a tract of land otherwise useless, which can be put to the growing of eucalypts, is little concerned about the ideal planting site. He will plant anyway. With him it is a matter of the choice of species and the location of the plantation. Here again observation discloses the fact that the small, in the aggregate, a large area of land in the possession of small ranchers which should, for its best use, be devoted to growing eucalypts.

The planting of eucalypts for shelter belts has been the most characteristic use of the tree. The general appearance of whole sections has been changed by employing it for this purpose. The benefits of the eucalyptus windbreaks in the citrus belt, in the lima bean section and in regions of shifting sands are thoroughly appreciated. For this purpose alone, a large number of trees are put out every year and through the agency of the shelter belts thousands of cords of wood are contributed annually to the wealth of the state.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Prior to the last issue of The California Weekly the prosecution had proved by testimony which there will be no effort to controvert that the members of the former blooding board of supervisors were paid from $4,000 to $10,000 each (the former sum in most instances) to vote for a trolley franchise for the United Railroads; that this money was paid to the former supervisors by former Supervisor James L. Gallagher; that Gallagher received it from Abe Ruef, the one-time political boss and self-acknowledged recipient of bribes. It further had been proved by officials of the San Francisco branch of the United States mint that, just before the time when these bribe-moneys were paid in behalf of the United Railroads, the sum of $200,000 was paid, on Patrick Calhoun's order, to Tiry L. Ford. So stood the evidence one week ago. In brief, bribe-money had been paid in behalf of the United Railroads, and at an almost identical time the president of the United Railroads company had secured a large sum of money which had been passed on to one of his lieutenants.

This money might have been secured for legitimate purposes—and, if it were, the defense, of course, could readily demonstrate the fact—and it has been the effort of the prosecution during the past week to show that it was not. To this end it has been shown by the testimony of Charles Hagerty, Abe Ruef's former office boy, that Tiry L. Ford, to whom the $200,000 was paid, by the branch mint on Calhoun's order, visited Ruef at about the time he received the money, and that thereupon Ruef rented three safe-deposit boxes of the Western National Bank, the latter fact being demonstrated by the testimony of officials of that bank.

Still it might be that the money was used legitimately, that Ford only made a social call on Ruef, and that Ruef rented three safe-deposit boxes merely because he liked the looks of them, and to disabuse the jury's mind of any such impression, if the members had formed it, the prosecution introduced other evidence. First in importance, probably, was the testimony of Adam M. Dahler, formerly cashier and now acting treasurer of the United Railroads company, whose evidence made it clear that the $200,000 transaction was not recorded in the ordinary way on the books of the company and that the money was not used in the course of regular business. George Wilcutt identified a letter from Patrick Calhoun dated in September, 1906, four months after the purchase of the former supervisors, in which Calhoun directed him to credit the United Railroads Investment company with $200,000, which instructions were obeyed by him, but he knew nothing of the use to which the money was put. Ivor Jones and Bernard F. Nelson, clerks in the treasurer's department of the United Railroads, testified that no large sum of money was handled in the course of regular business in the course of 1906, and directed by Calhoun and Kaitera, the latter roads swore that no large amount of money was handled in the regular course of the company's business during 1906.

If no other public good were accomplished by the trial of Patrick Calhoun, it is much to have had made clear the attitude of James D. Phelan, Rudolph Spreckels and men of that type in reference to the matter. Through all the organs of the defense it has been iterated and reiterated that these men interested themselves in the matter solely in hope of personal gain or in gratification of private malice. Mr. Phelan, having been placed on the stand, swore to negotiations with Calhoun for a conduit system which were terminated by Calhoun, whereupon a company was formed with the intention of bidding for a franchise and securing a conduit system. He was subjected to a rigorous cross examination by the defense, and to not one exploiting question, thus asked did the prosecution object, but when, on direct examination, the prosecution attempted to make still clearer the attitude of these citizens the defense met it with objection after objection. IF WE could only print the stories that we know," sighed the city editor, as he leaned back in his chair and looked at his watch at 4 a. m. in a cheap restaurant under Brooklyn Bridge. The reporters nodded sagely, and assented, "If we only could." The editorial rooms in Park Row were deserted. The morning editions had gone to press, and the reporters had adjourned to the nearby "night owls" for supper or breakfast—one could call it either—and a chat before going home to bed with the dawn. Outside they could hear the trucks rattling away to the ferries and the Grand Central station, laden with damp papers that displayed an especially black head line announcing the death of Bruhn, the great detective, at a remote sanatorium upstate, a victim of overwork. Within they sat and drank by the dingy light of "Mike's" bar. One of the reporters queried the city editor:

"By the way, Ainsworth, don't you know some things about Bruhn that didn't get into the paper this morning?"

"The city editor's replaced his watch. Well, yes, I suppose I do. I have a good deal about him that didn't go into the paper. Good story, too."

He looked about the room. There were no strangers present. Mike was asleep on a stool behind the bar. "And as you boys know better than to let it leak, I don't mind telling it. I was in part of it myself, but I know more than Bruhn ever thought I did. I'll tell it the way I found out the most of it which will make two stories in one. It was one summer night about ten years ago."

"Hot? Lord, but it was hot! I was city editor of the Herald then, and I had a man on the Long Island assignment that was soldiering on me bad. He'd let himself get scooped twice, so I took a night off, partly to get cool and partly to trail him, and left my assistant on the desk and took one of those iron steamboats from Twenty-third Street down to Coney. I made for the hurricane deck where it's dark and the coolest, and got a camp stool in the shadow of the pilot house. The weather was blessed relief, by the time we hit the Narrows I wouldn't have minded an overcoat except that I was on the lee side. It was pretty fine and restful and I leaned back and enjoyed myself, with nothing and nobody to bother me. Even the orchestra below deck was far enough off to sound sweet and make the place romantic and sentimental."

Next thing I heard, though, was a couple walking towards me along the deck. They passed within three feet of me, without seeing me, and the man set down a couple of camp chairs and they settled themselves and began to talk. I'm a reporter and I didn't interrupt what I heard, naturally, especially as I recognized Bruhn's voice. Evidently he and the girl had been close on to quarreling and they had left the crowd to talk it out. He was dearest in earnest, talking love with all his soul and answering her objections to his suit with the nearest approach to eloquence I'd ever heard. I could tell that she wanted to hear him, wanted to believe what he said, wanted him to convince her that her doubts were unjustified. But she was putting up every possible objection she could conceive of to stave him off and try him out. At last she said:

"I'd almost be afraid to marry you after what a girl I know said about you once."

"What was it?" he asked, all eagerness. "She said that you had the cruelest mouth she ever saw," the girl replied, "and that she saw you one night look as if you could hate harder than you could love."

There was a long silence before Bruhn answered her. I could hear his breath drawn in sharply and then slowly exhaled, and his chair creak as if he were binding his muscles down to stay in it. When he did speak, his words came like cracking whips, though he did not raise his voice.

"Maybe there's something in that," he said. "I've said, 'I don't want a mirror to see if I look like a callow boy. I've had work to do; I've had my way to make in the world. Began it young. Ten years old. My father failed; but he failed like a man. Gave his note for what he owed, with fair interest, and started back at the bottom to pay out. We all had to help. My mother made dresses for rich women to dance in. Worked her eyes out, worked her heart out, killed herself at it, and left us to go ahead. I went to work in a factory, worked from six to six with an hour at noon for three dollars a week. It helped. I didn't eat lunch in that hour a day—I took it from one to two and went to school, five hours a week. Saturdays I took it to go to the bank, with the pittance my father had scraped together to apply on the note. The cashier used to abuse me; called my father a thief and a sneak; cursed me because I hadn't more money to pay; called in his father, who was president of the bank, to help humiliate me. They took it out on me, ten years old. You know how it hurt—a child. By the time I was fifteen we had paid out, but it had made my father a wreck, a broken-spirited wreck. He didn't live long after. He died in the city hospital, with the pride of an honest man in his eyes, but with the sorrow of a haunted man there, too.

"I kept at work and I went up, but I worked for more than just success. At night when I went to bed I could see the faces of those two bankers, taunting me, and I could feel again my spirit writhing as it had done when I was a kid and they had tortured me. I said to myself, there's no good in men who would use a child like that; such men have robbed widows and broken honest men, and I swore, as there was a Just God in heaven, I would break them. I made my way through school; I learned the streets as a boy who works alone learns them; I saw the hardest side of a hard world."

"One day I found a chance to put my knowledge to use. A big robbery was pulled off in the jewelry district in Maiden Lane, and the detectives that are supposed to keep every crook, day or night, out of the streets below the dead line, were fooled and raging. I saw some things in the Bowery a week later that reminded me that I hadn't seen Happy Jack the Dugo Kid for ten days. They used to loaf around the Atlantic Gardens a good deal, and I knew what they were without having to be told. I did a little trailing on my own account, and I checked up their movements every minute of those ten days, except three hours. At the end of the night the robbery was pulled off, I tipped the Pinkertons, and they took Happy and the Kid off a Jersey ferry the next night with half the goods on them."

"Then the Pinkertons took me up and I made good. I stayed with them until I saw more money outside and I started my own agency with a bunch of the big ones in the Street for my clients."

"All this time I had kept my eye on those bankers. When I got the money, I paid some of their clerks to keep me posted on how the bank stood. Any one of a dozen times I could have showed them up as robbers, but I was playing a bigger game. I kept quiet and waited. They were high flyers, and a high-flyer always takes one too many chances some time. They did. They got in on a corner in wheat in the Chicago pit and tried to swing it through brokers there. They had a good thing, too. They would have made it go, but they didn't figure on me. If they had they wouldn't have figured that I knew they were using the bank's funds away beyond anything they had the collateral to protect."

When they had their pool about ready to cash in I sent for Ainsworth, city editor of the World he was then. I showed him what I had and told him what I knew. The World is always eager for that sort of stuff. Ainsworth ate it alive. The next morning the whole front page of the World was full of it—"Speculators in Control of Bank Cornering Wheat with Bank's Funds," and all that sort of stuff. I told Ainsworth if those fellows wanted to know where he got it, send them to me. They came, don't you doubt it. Hell broke loose in Chicago and New York that day. The wheat corner went to smash in an hour. The bank closed its doors after a day's run, and the examiner and the depositors were after those fellows hot-foot. They went to Ainsworth and he sent them to me. They begged me, for God's sake, to let up on them, to name my price, to save them from ruin. I laughed in their faces. They went down on their knees and begged, the crawling vampires. I said to them:

"You fellows don't know me. I haven't got a price. I've followed you for years and I've got you where I want you and I'll break you to the last cent you own and disgrace you to boot. You don't remember old man Bruhn, do you, that you sent to the grave over a note for ten thousand; you don't remember the kid old man Bruhn used to send with the interest every week; you don't remember how you cursed him and tormented him and reviled his father to his face. Well, I'm that kid, and I've come into my own and I'll see you damned before I let up on you."

"And I did it, too. I broke them, disgraced them and their name forever. The old man committed suicide and the young fellow went to Sing Sing. And I've never had a regret. I can hate. Now you know how much. But love is hate turned around. Can't you see that?"

Ainsworth stopped. The reporters leaned forward in the smoky light. "Well! Well! What happened?"

"I've often wondered," he replied. "The boat had docked by that time, and the pilot disturbed the boat-ster. I tried to snub as quietly as I could, and I didn't get a chance to see her face. I think they stayed aboard and went back on the return trip. But Bruhn was a married man, wasn't he?"

MOTHERHOOD.

By Agnes Lee.

Mother of Christ long slain, forth glided she,
Following the children joyously astride
Under the cedrus and the olive tree.

Pausing to let their laughter float to her,
Each voice an echo of a voice more dear,
She saw a little Christ in every face,
When, lo! another woman, pressing near,
Yearned o'er the tender life that filled the place.

And Mary sought the woman's hand, and said:
"I know thee not, yet know thee memory-tossed"

And what hath led thee here, as I am led—
These bring to thee a child beloved and lost,
"How radiant was my little one!"

And He was fair,
Yea, fairer than the fairest sun,
And like its rays through amber spun
His sunbeams bright
Still I can see it shine and shine!"
"Even so," the woman said, "was mine."

"His ways were ever darling ways"—
And Mary smiled—
"So soft, so clinging! Glad rays
Of love were all His precious days."

My little child
Was like an inmate light that gleamed.
"Even so was mine," the woman dreamed.

Then whispered Mary: "Tell me, thou,
When wilt thou come, and And she:
"Oh, mine was rosy as a bough
Blossoming with roses, sent, somehow,
To bloom for me!
His balmy fingers left a thrill
Within my breast that warms me still."

Then gazed she down some wilder, darker hour,
And said, when Mary questioned, knowing not:

"Who art thou, mother of so sweet a flower?"
"I am the mother of Iscariot."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

Under a barn on the farm of W. D. Gillham near Knightsen, Contra Costa county, a litter of kittens and another of polkittens recently were born. Under these circumstances the mother cat wisely concluded to move out with her family, but, in so doing, she took not only her own family but also two of the baby stragglers, transporting both her own and the adopted to a place near the house. There the mixed family is being happily reared, but it still is considered a fairly safe bet that either a part of it will disappear or Mr. Gillham will move out.

According to a report filed by the census marshal there now are in the city of Marysville 883 children of school age. Of this number, 802 are of Caucasian, fifty-five of Mongolian, and twenty-six of Ethiopian parentage, or about 91 per cent, white, 6 per cent yellow and 3 per cent black.

Easterners will please make a note that on May 1st—pay particular attention to the date—an immature stalk of barley grown on the ranch of F. M. Hungerford, near Auburn, California, had attained a height of sixty-seven inches, while its head was four inches long. Given time to develop, it is believed that the young tree would attain considerable size, even for California.

Speaking of the conservation of natural resources and the necessity of growing timber as rapidly as possible, a straw in the current of argument against the matter may be found in the fact that the Diamond Match company, at its Sterling City mills, expects this year to cut 50,000,000 feet of lumber, the largest cut in its history.

John Blacklick, a miner employed in the Oat Hill mine, in Napa county, was burned to death in his cabin last Friday. It is reported, but with how much truth is not known, that Blacklick had been drinking heavily.

One after another the large tracts of land in this state are being cut up and disposed of in smaller holdings. A sale looking in this direction is that of the Tequesquite ranch of 10,000 acres, situated between Gilroy and Hollister, by the Spreckels company to Los Angeles and Hollister parties. It is expected that the land will be irrigated and then sold in small lots.

The second Esquimaux born in the United States made his appearance last week in a tent show in Santa Rosa. He was honored by being given the name of the beautiful little city in which he was born. Whether Santa Rosa also was honored, of course, remains to be seen.

Up to a recent date Riverside had shipped 2,902 carloads of oranges and 234 carloads of lemons this season, while Redlands had shipped 3,071 carloads of oranges and twenty-two of lemons. This left Redlands ahead by 169 carloads of oranges, while Riverside was 212 carloads ahead on lemons and forty-three ahead on the total output of citrus fruits. A pretty race, with a showing that should be satisfactory on either side.

Charles M. Shortridge has retired from the management of the San Jose Times, and has been succeeded by Clifford J. Owen, an experienced newspaper man. Hereafter Shortridge will devote himself and his talents to the practice of the law.

An experiment in securing good roads which will interest all communities in the vicinity of oil wells, is being tried in Tulare county. There, instead of buying oil with which to dress roads, the supervisors are securing oil-saturated sand taken from oil wells. It is claimed it will serve the same purpose, and its only cost at present, is that of loading and transportation.

Automobile Notes.

The automobile road over the Cuesta grade of Santa Barbara county is now completed and ready for use by autoists, according to H. A. Schoenfeld of Los Angeles, who toured up to this city from his home in Los Angeles a few days ago in his Studebaker "30" touring car. Schoenfeld says the Cuesta grade will be used in the future exclusively by autoists and that all vehicles of every other description will take the lower road. This innovation will eliminate the great amount of danger which has always featured this grade as the Cuesta grade is a series of sharp turns.

An expert automobilist declares that over heating is the chief cause of pre-ignition. When it occurs, if a test shows the radiator to be cold and the water jackets to be hot the water is not circulating properly owing to pump stoppage.

From San Francisco to Portland, Me., and then back to the Pacific is an automobile trip to be made this summer by Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Littlefield of Oakland, Cal. Mr. Littlefield has given time and money to preparations, both as regards his car and routes and roads. Marsh quick acting rims with Diamond 36x5 tires all around will be used and the trip East, which will be made by way of Los Angeles, New Orleans and Washington, includes a visit to the Diamond rubber factories in Akron, Ohio. The return will be by way of Buffalo and Chicago, and thence for the most part along the route of the New York to Seattle endurance contest.

With the advent of the new Turkish ruler the motor bus made its appearance on the streets of Constantinople. On the day the Constitutional troops entered the city several motor buses owned by an English concern and driven by English chauffeurs began service on the streets of the Turkish capital. Curiosity has caused the vehicles to be generously patronized.

Fireproof Clothes for Everybody.

Says the Yonkers Statesman: "To protect children from fire, add one ounce of alum to the last water used to rinse children's dresses, and they will be rendered unflammable, or so slightly combustible that they would ignite very slowly, if at all, and would not flame."

"This is a simple precaution, which may be adopted in families of children. Bed curtains, and linen in general, it is said, should also be treated in the same way."

Andrew Carnegie's present trip to Europe is his ninety-sixth ocean voyage.

James F. Hyde, recently elected city treasurer of Lincoln, Ill., is ninety-five years old—probably the oldest officeholder in the country.

The large cameo ring worn by Dustin Farnum in "Cameo Kirby" first belonged to General Braddock, of French and Indian fame, who gave it to Farnum's grandfather.

The principal dissipation of James A. Patten, who cornered the wheat market, is chewing gum. He has always refrained from wearing dress suits and plug hats.

Guy du Maurier, the author of the play "An Englishman's Home," that frightened all Britain, is a major in the British army and a companion of the distinguished service order.

President Taft has not abandoned horseback riding. His three favorite mounts are "Tate," "Sterrett," and "Green Brier," from the stock farm of Tate Sterrett, near Hot Springs, Va.

Miss Billie Burke will make one of the longest theatrical "jumps" on record when she closes an engagement in London to come direct, with her company, to play "Love Watches" in San Francisco next August.

The humor of having De Wolf Hopper deliver the Marc Antony oration at the "Lamb's" gambols in New York, May 29th, does not seem to have been duly appreciated by the programme makers of that occasion.

David Belasco and Harrison Grey Fiske, for years the leading theatrical managers outside the "trust," have come to an agreement with Klaw & Erlanger by which their attractions will be booked at syndicate theaters.

Every one of the first-honor graduates of West Point of the last 45 years is still living; a large majority of them are still in the engineering corps; and of these nearly every one is rated among the most eminent in the engineering profession.

The first portrait of Mr. Taft as president will be painted by Joaquin Sorolla, whose wonderful paintings of sunlight are the artistic sensation of the hour in New York and Boston. Sorolla is declared to be Spain's greatest painter since Velasquez.

Charles Klein, author of "The Music Master," learned the principles of dramatic construction as a reader of plays in Charles Frohman's office. Channing Pollock, James Forbes, Kellett Chambers, and Thomas Mallard are all ex-journalists.

It is said that when David Belasco was stage manager of the old Baldwin Theater in San Francisco, he permitted the caddy to go up on the first performance of a new play until his mother was in her seat, even if the audience had to wait a while.

He: These glasses give me a very intellectual appearance, don't you think? She: Yes. Aren't they powerful!—Boston Transcript.

He hemmed and hawed because she knitted her brows when she darned his hose, and then he upbraided her. This ruffled her temper so that she ripped out more than the stitches she had put in his socks. It is needless to complain this sad story, as it is not pleasant to follow the thread of their discourse, which wound up with her throwing a spool at him, which put a crocheted under his eye.—Life.

One cold morning little Elsie was being bathed by her mother at her home in Park avenue, and usually her bath was a great delight to her. But this morning her mother talked incessantly while she worked, crying out a course of conduct for the day—and she had heard it over and over again! Finally she said sweetly, but wearily: "Please, mamma, don't talk any more. You make such a draught!"—Yonkers Statesman.

SHEAR WIT

The Manager: "I'll have to cut your salary." The Danseuse: "There'll be no kick coming."—Puck.

"Can I offer you a little friendly advice?" "If you'll take a little in return." Here negotiations ceased.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Is your husband all that you called him when you were courting?" "No, but he's all I call him now, and then some."—Houston Post.

After Their Quarrel—Mabel: "Of course you speak to Lena when you pass her?" Helen: "Indeed, I do not. Why, I don't even notice what she has on!"—Puck.

Teacher: "Name one striking characteristic of Richard the Third. Well, Isidore?" Isidore Klawlanger, whose father is a theater manager: "It's a box-office loser!"—Puck.

"Do you ever abuse that mule of yours?" asked the kind-hearted woman. "Lan sakes, miss," answered Mr. Erastus Pinkey, "I should say not. Dat mule has had me on de defensive foh de las' six years."—Washington Star.

Lady (to new milkman): Now, Mr. Jones, I hope I can rely on the purity of your milk. I had to give up Mr. Smith because his milk became two-thirds water. Mr. Jones: You can rely on this, mum. It's bin paralyzed by the public anarchist.

"Don't ever come at the horses from behind without speakin' to them!" exclaimed the sergeant. "They'll be kicking that thick head of yours! Then the first thing you know there'll be a lot o' lame horses in the squadron."—Illustrated Bits.

Dorothy, aged five, after watching her mother making a pencil sketch at their home in Warburton avenue, said: "Mamma, I much what drawing is." "Well, what is it, dear?" "It's just thinking, and then making a mark around the think."—Yonkers Statesman.

Little Mary hated to say "vinegar" because she had been laughed at so often for her queer pronunciation of the word. So when her mother sent her to the store to buy some, she presented the jug to the clerk and said: "Smell of that and give me a quart."—Bohemian.

The Kentucky colonel snorted, made two or three false starts, and finally dictated: "Sir—My stenographer, being a lady, cannot transcribe what I think of you. I, being a gentleman, cannot think it. But you, being neither, will readily understand what I mean."—The Circle.

"Where are you driving the pigs to?" asked an inquiring farmer of a Tennessee mountaineer. "Out to pasture 'em a bit." "What for?" "To fatten 'em." "Isn't it pretty slow work to fatten 'em on grass?" "Up with me I come from we pen them up and fatten them on corn. It saves a lot of time." "Ya-as, I s'pose so," drawled the mountaineer, "but, bless your heart, what's time to a hawg?"

"You know," said Mrs. Subbuss, "that Mrs. Newcome moved in across the way last Monday, so I called to-day." "Well, well!" remarked her husband; "how like poker this 'social game' is." "How do you mean?" "Why, in poker you also call when you want to see what the other person's got."—Catholic Standard and Times.

General Miles tells a story of a corporal in the old Indian fighting days who was much chaffed by his comrades for his oft-repeated expression of belief in "fatality" and "destiny." One day the corporal, preparing to take a little horseback exercise, attached a brace of pistols to his saddle. "Hello!" shouted a private to the corporal. "What are you taking the guns for? They won't help you if your time has come." "True for you," grimly responded the corporal; "but I may happen to meet an Apache whose last day has come."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Barry Sullivan, acting Richard III, was declaiming: "A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!" when a wag in the pit called out: "And wouldn't a jackass do as well for you?" "Sure," retorted Sullivan, like a flash. "Come right around to the stage door."—Rochester Herald.

Rights Not Disparaged.

The enumeration in the constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

So reads the ninth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, added by popular demand as a condition subsequent to the adoption of the constitution. The framers of the document had not deemed it necessary.

The demand for this amendment arose out of a rule of law which holds that where an attempt to enumerate is made, either in a contract, in a bill of sale or a declaration of human rights, whatever is not mentioned in the enumeration is excluded from it and has no part in it. It was through fear of what the application of this rule of law might result in, with reference to rights not otherwise guaranteed by the constitution, that this ninth amendment was insisted on and adopted. It was a proper safeguard and wisely made a part of the organic law. Our courts, by their adherence to logic and to inflexible rules, might otherwise have "whereas" the American people out of half their blood-bought rights and privileges.

Under the British constitution the situation is different. It is not a written constitution. No human being ever saw a copy of it. It enumerates no rights and therefore excludes none. The rights of Englishmen are those that are recognized by Englishmen as rights, rights that they fought for in the first instance and are ready to fight for again if need be. There is no specific list of them, but they exist in the minds and hearts of Englishmen and are safer there than though engraved on tables of stone, tablets of brass or written on parchments, because more flexible, because they can grow as these rights expand with the growth of liberty and the wider participation of the commonality in a government that had been founded upon privilege and was originally restricted to the few.

The reduction of human rights to specific statement in the American constitution has been a hindrance rather than a help, a cause of narrowing rather than of broadening those rights. This has proven equally true with the powers of government. It has given rise to a school of narrow minded legalists who have held to the letter of the law rather than to the spirit of it, to the meanings of words rather than to the needs of an ever growing and expanding national life. Like so many Shylocks they are ever looking to see if it be "so nominated in the bond." If there they want the pound of flesh it seems to allow. If not there they will acknowledge no obligation that an enlarging life would impose.

This bent of mind early gave rise to two schools of constitutional interpretation, the liberal and the strict, the broad and the narrow, and there has been a tug-of-war betwixt them ever since the constitution was adopted. The end of it is not in sight. Meantime, the nation has grown from three millions of people to eighty-five millions or more, from a few colonies along the eastern coast to cover half a continent, from little better than a dependency to a world power of the first rank, and it must go on growing until it becomes an ocean-bound republic.

It is small wonder if this tight-fitting garment sometimes pinched under the arms and needed to have tucks let down to prevent ripping or tearing of very texture itself. That it has not suffered this harm comes of the fact that the spirit of liberal interpretation has prevailed, even to the extent of writing into the document, by way of interpretation, of many truths that were never consciously put there by those who made it. It was assumed that they were there because they had to be there.

This brings us to a repetition of a statement heretofore made in these lessons: That our nation is a living, breathing thing. The constitution of the United States is not. That is a document. It hath neither ears, nor taste, smell nor sight, but the nation has, and these together with understanding, conscience, will, an instinct to grow, a courage to dare. The constitution is no more to the nation than a skeleton of a man is to a man. In no true sense can it be said that the constitution of the nation limits the powers of the nation. Those powers depend upon the virility of the people which make up the nation, their habits of mind, their customs, aspirations, hopes. The constitution merely directs how those powers shall be exercised, through what machinery they shall put forth their strength. The constitution is very valuable for that purpose but very hurtful as an enumeration of powers to the exclusion of powers not enumerated.

By getting the spirit of this lesson thoroughly into the mind the reader will be better prepared to take up the consideration of the tenth amendment, the battleground of the nation.

("The Graft Cases"—Concluded.)

hide, it was not the prosecution that desired to hide it.

After being out nineteen hours the jury in the case of Luther A. Brown, charged with kidnaping Fremont Older, returned a verdict of not guilty. It is understood that the jury first stood five for conviction and five for acquittal, two not voting, the final verdict being explained on the ground that Older did not sufficiently resist his captors.

A Revolutionary Marine Compass.

The German Admiralty, it is announced, has decided to abolish all magnetic compasses on board German warships and replace them with the gyroscope compass, an invention of Dr. Anschütz-Kampfe of Kiel.

The gyroscope compass is based upon the familiar principle that a rapidly rotating body tends to keep in the same plane, a principle which is already applied in the automatic steering apparatus of torpedoes. The compass consists of a wheel weighing about nine pounds, mounted with the usual compass card and working, in order to diminish friction, in a holder of quicksilver. A current of 150 watts from an electrometer is sufficient to give this wheel or top 21,000 turns a minute.

Two hours after being started the instrument is set in the direction of the mathematical meridian instead of toward the magnetic pole, and it keeps its position unchanged. It is not deflected as is the ordinary compass by neighboring iron and steel. It is unsusceptible to vibration and rolling and under all possible conditions of weather keeps obstinately true to the poles. The slight deviations resulting in different latitudes are all exactly calculable and therefore cause no trouble.

The new compass was tested during a nine months cruise of the warship Deutschland in different parts of the world. On one occasion the apparatus was left alone, unattended and unchecked for a month, but it kept the true direction. It is expected to be particularly useful in submarines, where the magnetic compass is untrustworthy.—New York Sun.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A Deserved Tribute.

In an after dinner address, at which Joseph W. Folk was the guest of honor, Mr. James D. Phelan paid a deserved tribute to Fremont Older as having been an unselfish and persistent inspiration in the prosecution of graft in this city. He has thrown himself into the conflict with entire self-abandon and with results tremendously important to the upholding of the right and condemnation of the wrong. Unhappily the imbecility of a jury prevented the punishment of a despicable offense committed against him personally, committed under the protection of legal processes that have many times been employed to inflict injustice upon the helpless. Mr. Older will be remembered when his enemies have been sunken in the depths of a merciful forgetfulness. The powers of graft can neither prevail against a worthy reputation nor rehabilitate a reputation prostituted to its service.

Henry H. Rogers.

Henry H. Rogers has gone where he will be judged with righteous judgment. Our human judgments must fall short of a true and proper estimation of his life. Nevertheless the memory of no man who has done the things that he has done has a right to escape such judgments as our understandings enable us to give. As the builder of the railroad from the bituminous coal fields of West Virginia to tidewater he was a benefactor. As a manipulator of the stock markets he was a robber, just as much a robber as the veriest highwayman that ever plied his trade. He was not a mere speculator, a big gambler taking his chances with the rest. He was a confidence operator, a financial thimble-rigger and as such deserved and received the detestation of honorable men. It is not in the public interest that these blundy bald, bad facts be forgotten at the grave and only the good remembered. His bad acts may be forgiven but there is no law, moral or divine, that requires that they be forgotten. He had great powers of mind and will and there was great obligation resting upon him that he use those powers for the uplifting, not the exploiting, of his kind. When public opinion steadfastly judges the robber to be a robber, living or dead, great or small, there will be fewer ambitious to become robbers. As to what made such men the ruthless ravagers they were, and the extenuating circumstances leading thereto, that may safely be left to the God who made them in the firm belief that justice will precede mercy and contrition forgiveness. So far as the public knows not one pang of remorse has ever harassed the soul of a Standard Oil exploiter of men. They are a filthy combination.

The College Debt.

The burden of President Wheeler's address on commencement day was the debt which the graduating class owe to the state, in the shape of loyal services, for the advantages enjoyed. It is encouraging to note that one of the principal addresses delivered at Stanford University breathed the same spirit for, in its last analysis, the millions that were devoted to the founding of Stanford University were as certainly raised by taxation as the millions that go into the construction and support of the State University. The method of levying and collecting the tax was different but the result was the same. The people paid the bills and a debt payable in service is as certainly due the public.

The Lawyer.

At a time when the legal profession is, by the reprehensible conduct of some of its members, held under scrutiny with more than usual severity it may be profitable to give that profession a few moments of rational consideration. If the writer of this were commissioned to select the ten men in all California whose services to the state have proven most valuable, who stand for the highest ideals in government and public duty, he would anticipate that at least six, and perhaps seven, of the ten would be lawyers. Per contra, if he were commissioned to select the ten men in the state whose influence in public affairs, whose efficiency in rascality, has proven most injurious, he should anticipate that nine out of the ten, if not the whole ten, would be lawyers. The preparation and practice of the law raises human efficiency in public affairs to the highest degree. When a good man enters the legal profession the public is immensely the gainer. When a scoundrel enters it the public is immensely the loser. Unfortunately a debased standard of professional ethics has made the profession attractive to many scoundrels that they may practice criminality with a minimum of risk and a maximum of profit, and this has largely come to pass through the legal requirements of "malefactors of great wealth."

The Type of Mind Issue.

The San Francisco Star makes the point that, in view of the fact that Chief Justice Beatty was elected to his present exalted position by a majority of nearly 60,000 votes, the people of California approve his type of judicial mind. The point is not well taken. Justice Beatty was thus elected in part because the people believed in his integrity, but mainly because they believed that unwholesome influences had conspired to prevent his renomination. His type of mind was not then in issue. He had not then written the Schmitz-Ruef decision of unfortunate memory to set that type before the public in bold relief. Were he to come up for re-election this fall it would be different. The public understanding now sees many things to which it was then blind.

What of the Other Fellows?

Mr. F. H. McCarthy conceives himself to have been criminally libeled by the San Francisco Call inasmuch as the Call alleged that he, McCarthy, had been holding converse with certain of the political hired men of Mr. W. F. Herrin, head of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, which bureau arrogates to itself the authority to govern California. Mr. McCarthy denies the charge of having conferred with Herrin's hired men. It is understood that the Call will strive to purge itself of the charge of libel by proving the fact of the conference. It appears to be tacitly admitted on both sides that the fact of conference is inherently scandalous if not obscene. All right for McCarthy. All right for the Call. Let them join the issue as they may, but what sort of compliment is all this to-do for Mr. Herrin and his hired men? Are they living as men forbid? Are they held in such public estimation as to make holding conferences with them a scandal and a shame? Is the fact of conference, once established, of such nature as to justify in the public mind all manner of evil presumption as to the intent and purpose of such conference? If so, then, verily, the compensation these men receive for their unwholesome services should far exceed that of Iscariot of old.

A Revival of Sectionalism.

In the discussion of the new tariff a tendency is manifest to revive an out of date sectionalism, to unite the West and South against the East with New England as the especial object of enmity. This would be as unfortunate as unjustified. New England newspapers are as staunchly for a tariff revision downward as those of any other portion of the country. The issue is not between sections of the United States, but between predatory interests, greedy for extortion, and the purchasing public clamorous for a lowering of the cost of living. The New York Sun, the recognized organ of predatory capital, disclaims any promise, purpose or intent to lower the tariff with a view to lowering the cost of living. On the contrary, the purpose is to increase the facility with which the strong arm of the law may be thrown around the neck of the consumer and his pockets rifled in the interests of a restored prosperity. That view will not be accepted by the American people. Never before were so many Republican papers in opposition to any tariff. If the Aldrich tariff is enacted it will be overthrown, not by Democrats, but by Republicans bent on redeeming their party from the brigands who now have it in custody.

THE RAKE-OFF.

A San Francisco business man was lately heard to lament the extent to which grafting, in the form of demanding a rake-off on the flimsiest pretenses, was being practiced in business circles. It was complained that whoever aided in securing a contract, either public or private, even if it were no more than introducing a friend to his own tailor to be measured for a suit of clothes, felt warranted in dropping in upon the vendor at some convenient moment to demand a percentage on the sale, a gratuity of some sort, for the service rendered.

This business man was right in calling this practice grafting, and unless business men desire to be hounded by men with itching palms from dawn until darkness throughout their business careers they must set their faces against graft wherever it sticks up its ugly head. Such a practice easily becomes the fixed custom of a country. In Japan everybody gets a percentage of what is paid to the person in the next stratum below, with the result that poverty crushes the weak as perhaps nowhere else. In government the system is worked out to the minutest detail in China, where the millions are mulcted in taxes and yet the government is left without adequate revenue—the greatest part is swallowed up somewhere between the tax farmer and the imperial treasury.

Nor can grafting be countenanced among gentlemen and discountenanced among those who serve. If protected anywhere it will reach everywhere and will tarnish whatever it touches. Destroy it in high places and it can be stamped out in low. Not otherwise.

Mr. Harriman has told what great things he could do for the patrons of his roads if he could keep his trainmen from stealing, but the "looting of the Alton" bars his way. So long as the bribing of the supervisors of San Francisco remains fresh in the mind Mr. Calhoun will be powerless to prevent "knocking-down" on the part of conductors on the United Railroads, no matter how many spotters he may employ. Under the Schmitz-Ruef regime scoundrelism ramified the entire city government almost to the last petrolman. The malefactors of great wealth laid the foundation for the bankruptcy of their heirs through the tutored rascality of those upon whom they must depend for protection. It was not the valor of the Japanese so much as the grafting of the Russians that defeated Russia and turned back for half a century, if not forever, the tide of Russian progress. The higher-ups in San Francisco, and their associates and apologists, are but trying to imitate the feat of Samson who tore out the props from under the temple and involved all in a common ruin. In warring against graft the forces of moral good health are fighting a worse malady than plague, being disseminated by worse vermin than rats.

THE CALL OF THE LAW.

On another page in this paper will be found, under the above heading, a brief address delivered at the commencement exercises of the University of California by Mr. John Henry Riordan, a graduate of Hastings Law College of the University. The spirit breathed by this brief oration is full of hope for a better administration of the law in this commonwealth. If our law colleges are turning out graduates sympathetic with the spirit of this address it cannot be that the living always will be misgoverned by the dead, that our temples of justice will be ruled from chamber houses. No more hopeful note has been struck in recent months than that sounded by this young man in his commencement oration.

For it must be that if our bar is to be recruited from colleges of law permeated by the atmosphere which this address exhales that bar will emancipate itself from the bonds of tradition which now hold it to the wisdom of other ages, a wisdom which served its purpose in other lands under other conditions and which as absurdly belongs to the past as do the theologies of Calvin and Luther, Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards.

And it must follow that if our bar is to be recruited from colleges which breathe a living and progressive atmosphere the bench cannot forever remain locked in the embraces of arms so long dead that there clings to them no shreds of the ceremonies with which the lawgivers of another age were enshrouded. Then shall we have judges sitting in an atmosphere as conducive to sanity of mind as open-air living is conducive to longevity of the body.

Always provided that the bench be not filled, as it heretofore in great measure has been, by a corporate manipulation at once reactionary in purpose and malevolent in spirit. From a bench so constituted nothing is to be hoped. It will continue to sit, as it now sits, in an atmosphere foul with sinister germs and the personnel of that bench will be selected, as it has largely been selected, with the view of the largest practicable susceptibility to inoculation from those germs.

Neither the law colleges, the bar nor the bench can be emancipated from the hand of death, and nourished into life, until the men of California emancipate themselves from a domination that is as sinister in purpose as greed can make it. We cannot have a free bar or a free bench, however well our law schools may strive to that end, except they be demanded by a free people, and the men of California have not been free and self-governed for more than a quarter of a century. So heedless of their blood-bought liberties have they been that they did not miss them when they lost them.

The first step toward emancipation is to know the truth, and the truth is that California has not in any adequate sense been a self-governing commonwealth, and the People have not in any adequate sense selected their appellate judges. Their judges, selected for them, have been of a type of mind that either bound them to a dead past and a dead formalism, or to the interests of those puissant political powers that made them judges. The result has been that justice has failed whenever it sought to deal with anyone under the protection of our modern feudal barons.

If the California Weekly dwells upon this theme of the establishment of justice with a tiresome iteration it is because it believes that there is no other issue before the public comparable with it, no other need so vital, no other danger so little realized, no other harm so threatening. The supreme thirst of Man, the animal, is for power over other men. The supreme yearning of Man, the spiritual being, has been for justice, even handed, without respect to position or personality, speedy, certain, commensurate with the offense. The struggle between that thirst and that yearning has constituted the history of the human race. It is upon us here in California, here in San Francisco, upon us now, as it was upon that Palestine of nineteen centuries ago when, as now, the traditions of men were substituted for the justice of God and the ceremonial of a letter-bound priest had for the substantial vindication of sound law. In the reformation of legal procedures and the rectification of the appellate benches lies the hope of American institutions, and whatever points in that direction, as does the commencement address of young John Henry Riordan, is to be received with acclaim.

THE MEN OF THE HOUR.

The paid apologists for the San Francisco grafters have insisted, in season and out, that the prosecutions were instituted and pressed either from motives of pure malice or with a deep design to so discredit and destroy the value of the United Railroads as to enable the conspirators to purchase the plant at their own price and rehabilitate it to their own profit. These were grave accusations.

Well, the attorneys for the defense have been turned loose upon Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. James D. Phelan, alleged to have been the leading conspirators, with full liberty to draw out from them the deep damnation of their own iniquity. And what has been the result? The exculpation of these men, beyond the aroma of taint, and the placing of them before the public as pre-eminent the Men of the Hour, the men to whose selfishness and civic patriotism San Francisco owes most! They come off not only unblemished but triumphant. The trumped up sophistries of paid graft apologists were blown to smithereens the moment they were aired.

Hypocrisy has been said to be the homage which vice pays to virtue and, ament the graft cases, attempts have been made to pay this homage by insisting that the writers were just as anxious to have the guilty punished as the most zealous graft fighter can be, only it must be done by the unaided efforts of elected officers and not by special attorneys and detectives employed through the aid of men of means who love their city and state and stand ready to sacrifice time and money, even life if need be, to protect its life and its fame.

Out upon such charlatanism! These same apologists supported the candidacies for office of men publicly known to be under the domination of the grafting fraternity. Their purpose was to permit the grafters to select the judge before whom they were to be tried, and they got a bill through the legislature to that effect, then to have them tried by prosecutors of their own selection before a jury summoned by their own minions. The purpose was too palpable. It was to prevent their being tried at all or, if tried, to have the trial result in nothing more important than a formal, judicial vindication of high-class scoundrelism.

But for the heroic, self-sacrificing and well-directed efforts of Mr. Spreckels, Mr. Phelan, and their associates, that conspiracy of white-washery would have been consummated. That graft has been "dragged into the light and held triumphant," as Joseph W. Folk affirms it should be, is due to these Men of the Hour, men of capacity, men of means, in short to these MEN who dare to be MEN when manhood comes high. Valiant and resourceful as he is, Mr. Francis J. Heney would hardly have been able to turn a wheel without the backing of these men and it behooves those who value patriotism, disinterestedness and courage to stand by these men whenever their motives are brought into question. Such qualities should have a premium placed upon them, not a penalization.

For, be it remembered, the commonality never yet won a victory over a united power-holding class. In our country, at our time, the power-holding class is the millionaire class. If they stand together they cannot be overthrown no matter what they may do. It is only when that class is divided on an issue of right, an issue of moral appeal, an issue involving the rights of man and the perpetuity of freedom and justice, that the predatory interests can be overthrown. There is no other way. The history of the world marks no step in human uplift that is not characterized by such a division of the power-holding element. If the predatory millionaire is the bane of our civilization the millionaire of rectitude, courage, self-sacrifice is its emancipator, for he it is who possesses the sinews of a warfare for righteousness without which no wheel can be turned.

What of It?

Complaint is made that, by the time a new battleship is completed, advancement in the art of constructing battleships supercedes the one just completed and makes the issue of supremacy as debatable as before. Quite so, but what of it? It is equally true regarding every new machine, process, art, known to the industrial world. If, as reported, an Englishman has discovered a way for making better steel than any now made at half the present cost every furnace in the world is junk. This is the price which humanity pays for progress, without which nothing.

The Jersey Idea.

One of the quaintest manifestations of the present-day reaching out after sobriety is that of New Jersey, which has enacted a law requiring every incorporated city to appoint a board of public protectors whose duty it shall be to take a census of the drunkards in each such city and post their names in all saloons that no liquor may be sold them. Furthermore, every person who shows signs of becoming a drunkard, and so losing control over himself, is likewise to be posted, and whoever sells to one of the forbidden persons is heavily fined on a graduated scale that runs from $50 for a first offense to confiscation for the last. It will be interesting to note, after ten years, how this law has worked if it is still working.

The Money Supply.

On the first of May the estimated volume of money of all kinds in circulation in the United States was $3,096,663,124, the estimated population of the country was 88,687,700, and the per capita circulation $34.92. With nearly double the circulating medium of the late '90s business is not better now than it was then. It requires something more than a dollar to make another dollar. Opportunity counts for as much as the cash capital.

Too Poor to Fight.

A north German merchant, writing of the talked-of war between Great Britain and Germany, explains that Germany is too poor to fight, that the growth of German cities within the last generation has made necessary such enormous expenditures in municipal improvement that, together with the cost of army and navy, he is now taxed 35 per cent of his annual earnings. Such taxation is confiscatory and, if that be the measure of taxation in the Fatherland in time of peace, it is easy to imagine what it might easily become in time of war. While Great Britain has a larger invested capital in foreign countries than Germany, from which to draw profits, the burden of taxation does not rest lightly there either and the citizens of both countries would do well to sit thoughtfully over their mugs of beer and pipes of peace before indulging in more war talk. It was war talk, and not a substantial grievance on either side, that precipitated the Franco-Prussian war in the early '70s.

The Tariff Tendency.

Putting that and that together the tendency of tariff legislation seems to be to get out the worst measure that will possibly receive the approval of the President and then go to the country and ask that the tariff be let alone, no matter how bad it may be, in order that the business interests of the country may get busy going through the pockets of consumers and so restore prosperity. Aldrich and Hale are sly old dogs and know, from long experience, about how far they can encroach upon American good nature and a general desire to get to making money. Their unknown quantity, and our own, is the President. He is naturally indolent, but we miss our guess if he be found an easy proposition by the interests. He will yet come to be known by them as The Unbudgeable Bill.

The Poor Man's Club.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found an explanation of the methods and purposes of the Model License League. The most significant fact gained from this interview with the accredited representative of that league is that the wholesale and manufacturing liquor interest itself recognizes that the present status of the saloon business in this country is intolerable and cannot be endured with anything approaching national self-respect.

The strongest argument made for the saloon as an institution is the one made by Captain Smith, that it is the poor man's club and the only club he has. That there is here a real, a fundamental, need no observant person will deny. But neither will any observant person deny that the typical saloon is about the worst form of club that human ingenuity ever devised. It is a club based upon the depravities of human nature. It brings men together upon the basis of the worst impulses that are common to them all. It is the home of the dirty story, the ribald talk, the hoarse, brutish laughter, the fun that debases.

Nevertheless, any system of moral reformation of the liquor business that does not take into account the need for "The Poor Man's Club," and somehow supply that need, will fail. The need is there and is imperative. If the saloon does not supply it some other form of doggerly will. Repression will not solve the problem. What shall the substitute be? That is the question of questions. Until this need is otherwise supplied the saloon will stay.

National Wealth in Water.

Pursuant to the steadfast purpose of The California Weekly to present to its readers at least one strong article each week, dealing with some subject of public importance and written by some person whose special knowledge of that subject gives him a right to be heard, attention is called to an article elsewhere dealing with Water As a National Asset. The writer of this article has an intimate knowledge of his subject and those who give attention to what he says will be persuaded that, next to the conservation of the productivity of the soil of the country, there is no other material concern that transcends in importance the development of our national waterways and the storage, either in the soil, in forest or grass coverings or in reservoirs, of the waters which fall upon America's broad acres. The subject demands earnest consideration and this article will furnish a basis for making consideration intelligent as well as earnest.

The Deeper Significance ::: of Living :::

It is not imperative that we continually judge one another. The habit of so doing is a bad one to form, but it is important that we judge righteously when we do judge. There is no more lamentable blunder than to judge a human kind than an incapacity rightly to gauge moral values.

There are moral idiots in the world who are not lacking in other capacities. Some of them have been men of genius, others of talent, others of merely normal ability, but whether possessing genius, talent or only mediocre parts, they all stood helpless before truth. Than these there are no more miserable beings under the sun or more pestiferous to human society.

Some of this moral idiocy appears to be congenital, yet the science of heredity can not account for it, nor bring-up, or lack of it, associations, habits or environment. To the query, How came they so? there is no answer save that it is so. In other instances the morphine habit or opium smoking, the craving for drink, unbridled license, one or more of them, have been suggested as adequate cause.

There are moral insanities as well as idiocies. The two are not the same. As there are persons who are perfectly sane until one particular topic is suggested to their minds, when their reasons go all to pieces, so there are others whose moral perceptions are as clear as sunlight until they are confronted by their one over-mastering, unerring delinquency. Then, presto! they become as immoral as so many Hottentots.

But there are causes of moral color blindness other than those above suggested, causes which afflict those neither morally idiotic, morally insane, nor morally impotent. One of these is an over-emphasized desire to be rich. This leads the victim of that desire to say of himself, in effect: "I don't like to do such things as I have to, but they are necessary if I am to become rich, and I must become rich." That process of reasoning has made a scoundrel out of many a good man, a grafter out of many a man who was made in the image of his Maker with a mind as clear as crystal until clouded by this over-mastering desire.

Personal ambition to shine financially, politically or socially is another prolific cause of moral disaster. Speaking of a well-known public man lately, one who knows him well said of him: "He is all right in every department of life except the political, but he will do anything that any man wants him to do if that man can make him governor of this state. Before that consuming ambition his moral standards will trail in any dust, be hedged through any mire." That is a hard thing to say of a man otherwise big enough to be made governor of California, yet we have seen it exemplified more than once in the history of this state, in fact, more times than we have seen to the contrary.

Many cities of the world are waging crusades against belching chimneys because they needlessly cloud the atmosphere and, in some cities, at least, the crusade is resulting in a clearing of the physical atmosphere. The California Weekly is waging, if not a crusade, then a warfare, against such a clouding of the moral atmosphere as shall prevent the general public from being able to distinguish between that which is civically good and civically evil, between financiers and scheming confidence operators, between grafters and honorable gentlemen.

The task is not easy. The moral atmosphere is muggy. The public perception is much dimmed; but whomever else we may deceive let us not deceive ourselves. Let men stand for the wrong if they feel that they must, but let them be brave enough to acknowledge to themselves that they know what they are doing and are neither morally idiotic, insane, nor impotent.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The World's Largest Volcano.

Among other notable things which presumably will be seen by Mr. Roosevelt in the course of his African wandering is the largest volcano in the world. This is Mt. Elgon, the crater of which is about 14,200 feet above sea level. If all of rocky Switzerland, including valleys and summits, were combined in one gigantic mountain, it would just about equal Elgon in size. The crater, that mighty cauldron in which Nature, the chemist of chemists, once boiled her lava, is about thirty miles in diameter. In the mountain-side, at a height of about 8,000 feet, caves abound, many of them being found beneath the numerous waterfalls which lace the sides of the great mountain with their silver. These caves are inhabited as they have been since a time that is lost in prehistoric blackness—a time not far past in this part of Africa. There is abundant evidence, too, that they once were used as places of barter, and blue beads of ancient Egyptian origin still are dug up there. Mr. Roosevelt will see many strange and wonderful things in his African outing, and not the least notable of these will be found on and about this gigantic volcano.

The Sleeping Sickness.

Writing of Theodore Roosevelt's expedition, it is of interest to note that he has been invited to visit the segregation hospitals, in charge of Sir David and Lady Bruce, in which the so-called "sleeping sickness" is treated, the governments of Great Britain, Germany, France and Belgium having united in an as yet unsuccessful endeavor to find a preventive cure for the disease. The name itself is a misnomer, the peculiar lethargy which afflicts the victims at a certain stage of the disease not being sleep, and being but one of numerous features of the illness. Already seven European doctors have lost their lives in the attempt to cope with the disease, and still no method of preventing its ravages has been discovered. The symptoms are known, the sickness beginning with a swelling of the glands at the base of the neck, and it also is known that the disease is due to the bite of the tsetse fly, which abounds about some of the African lakes and rivers, but both of these facts were known before science endeavored to throw its light upon the mysterious and always fatal illness from which the men of no race are immune. There is great pain and long-continued suffering, with death as the inevitable end. From which it may be gathered that something beside enjoyment may be a feature of traveling in Africa.

Tempest in a Principality Teapot.

Trouble impends in Monaco, and uneasy lies the crowned head of Albert I of that sovereign principality. Monaco consists of about eight square miles of soil and rock, principally the latter. It has a total population very little in excess of that of Santa Rosa, in this state, 800 male residents who are recognized as citizens, an army of 75 men, a police force of 50 men, a ruler who lives elsewhere half of the time, and—let this, its chief claim to notoriety, never be forgotten—an immense gambling casino. It is because of this gambling casino that the present trouble impends. Seven hundred and twenty-five of the 800 male citizens have signed a petition asking—what, do you fancy?—that the casino be abolished as injurious and iniquitous? Well, hardly! The petitioners respectfully represent that they are not permitted to gamble, with the rest of the world, on their monarch's tables, and they demand the privilege of doing so. This is the head and front of the offending of Albert I. He denudes anybody else of cash at his resort, but he refuses to rob his own people, and so they are on the verge of rebellion for the high privilege of being robbed. Was ever more preposterous cause of threatened revolution seriously discussed in more preposterous state? Verily the proverbial tempest in a teapot is no less than a tornado when compared with this latest sample of European popular discontent.

The Aerial Torpedo Next.

Not content with man's present means of killing other men, Messrs. Krupp, the wealthy German manufacturers of battleships and implements of war, are furnishing the money for a series of experiments now being made by Professor Weichert of the meteorological institute of Göttingen. The object of these experiments is to devise an aerial torpedo which can be steered from the ground by means of electricity. The tremendous effectiveness of such a machine in war will be readily realized, and it is said that Professor Weichert is far on his way toward success in inventing it. He has made an electric aerial torpedo which flies, and he is now attempting to adapt to it the system of steering used in connection with submarine torpedoes. It is probable that this terrible implement of destruction eventually will be "on the market"—unless it is out of date before it arrives, which is possible if there is truth in the report that an American boy has discovered a method of firing explosives—in an arsenal or a battleship, for instance—at a distance of several miles, by means of electricity. Apparently the time approaches when man must cease warring in very fear of universal death.

Women Voters in New Zealand.

The often-voiced argument that most women do not wish to vote and women not vote if opportunity were given them receives scant encouragement in the statistics of New Zealand, the land of experiments. In that country there were five general elections between 1893 and 1905, inclusive, and at these elections 75.8 per cent of registered men voted, while 77.4 per cent of registered women voted. Not only did the women not refuse to go to the polls, but they beat the men in doing so. At the time they were enfranchised it was thought the women soon would put an end to the existence of saloons. They have not done so, although it generally is admitted that the trend is in that direction, and more so than it would have been without the feminine vote. The prevailing opinion of their enfranchisement may perhaps best be summed up in the words of William Hall Jones, high commissioner of New Zealand, who says: "I am satisfied that it has been beneficial to the political life of the country. The women take a keen interest in all matters affecting the welfare of the dominion."

A Tunnel of Disaster.

The excavators of the Lotschberg tunnel, in Switzerland, have been pursued by disaster as has not heretofore been known in the excavation of any tunnel, and only indomitable purpose still holds them to their enterprise. The length of the tunnel does not account for this condition, for, although it is seven miles long, several of the Swiss tunnels are longer, the Simplon being twelve and one-half miles long, the St. Gotthard nine and three-quarters, and the Mount Denis seven and one-half miles. The first work on the Lotschberg tunnel began on October 15, 1906, and for more than a year and a half, or until the latter part of May, 1908, not a thing occurred to prevent continuous work. Then the trouble began, and there has been not much of anything save trouble since that time. The first disaster came in the form of an avalanche which killed thirty workmen. Only two months later there was an explosion in the tunnel which tore a great hole through the roof at precisely the point through which a river poured its waters, and sixty workmen were drowned. The damage wrought was so immense that it necessitated the stoppage of all operations at this place, and at least a year's work was entirely lost. Moreover, frequent encounters with hot springs, sometimes of great volume, compel the workmen to labor in constant fear of their lives. If it were not for the vast sum of money already invested it is not impossible that the enterprise would be abandoned. As it is, it probably will be continued, but under such difficult and harassing circumstances as never before confronted the promoters of such an enterprise.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "leak" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

GEORGE MEREDITH.

The death of George Meredith last Tuesday morning, at the age of 81, removes from the world of English letters the man whom many high critics rank as the greatest of all English novelists, placing him above Thackeray, George Eliot, and Thomas Hardy. Slow to achieve any fame, Americans may pride themselves that his genius was first recognized in this country, and that England followed years later the surely broadening and deepening appreciation of his powers.

Meredith's claim to greatness is based, primarily, upon his intellectual force. He is above all a philosopher, and his novels are his profound philosophy of human life translated into human terms—his characters working out that philosophy in terms of human experience. In this power of expressing intellectual ideals in artistic form his critics rank him but little below Shakespeare, both in the profundity of his philosophy and in the consummate skill of his art.

Meredith is the high priest of the intellect. His favorite theme is the predominance of the intellect over the emotions. A whole cycle of his novels was written to prove that he who trusts his heart to direct his affairs—even his marriage—will suffer the tragic consequence of misplaced trust; that the intellect, the reason, is the one true guide in all human relations. Judged by his philosophy, every intuition is a mirage, every hope is a will-o-the-wisp, every emotion is a pitfall digged by the unwary that he himself shall fall therein, every prejudice, intuitive liking or dislike, romantic love, all are evil. Friendship, hatred, must be reasoned out. Love must be a conviction of compatibility, not an amorous emotion. Marriage must be a "marriage of like minds," not a union based on sentiment.

This hatred of emotion, this deification of intellect, made the path of George Meredith as a novelist a thorny one. Nearly all literature hangs on the love of a man for a woman, and all the models of modern fiction have this relationship upon the idea of romantic love that grew up in Europe during the feudal ages and the crusades. Meredith, in pursuing his philosophy, set himself squarely at odds with this tradition, a tradition that the public had grown to hold as indispensable, and his lack of popularity is largely due to just this fact. Fortunately for himself, he did not greatly care for popularity, and he had within himself resources of consolation for its absence. He preferred to follow the path he had set for himself, and continued to write novels, absorbing, powerful, wonderful pictures of life as he saw it, life a comedy in the sense Balzac used the term in the "Comédie Humaine," a tragedy in the ordinary sense, and tragedy because of the folly of men in running after their emotions instead of ordering their lives by reason.

By necessity, his novels seem cold and harsh to average readers. The writer of these lines confesses to an attempt to read "Diana of the Crossways," an attempt abandoned in bitter anger as he hurled the book at an unoffending wall and damned the writer as a man who lacked breadth enough to see the lights as well as the shadows of existence. A more merciless dissection of life he never read. But no one with even dawning intellectual powers can read George Meredith and fail to recognize his strength. His style is involved, but, slowly read, is as stimulating to the imagination as salt spray to the skin, opening vistas of ideas and emotions at every turning phrase. Another trait redeems it: an abandonment to the sense of beauty, a Greek worship of the splendid world and the sonorous phrase, an effort to picture to the graceful, to the sensuous image. Wherever he escapes the intricacies of ideas, Meredith's prose blossoms into wondrous passages of beauty that are hardly rivalled in our tongue.

For this love of beauty and this art to represent it in his prose, Meredith will first be loved. More slowly his audience will appreciate the power he has to delineate human character, to visualize human beings and to make them live and walk and speak vividly before the quickened eye. More slowly still his readers will appreciate the stirring quality of his difficult style. And last of all the public will accept the philosophy of life he sought to teach—if, indeed, the public ever does accept it. However that may be, a very great writer has closed his last book, and a very brave spirit, that fought in silence against long odds and through bitter deprivations, has gone to his final rest.

INDIRECTION.

By Richard Realf.

Fair are the flowers and the children, but their subtle suggestion is fairer;
Rare is the rosebush at dawn, but the secret that clasps it is rarer;
Sweet the exultance of song, but the strain that precedes it is sweeter;
And no rose, no poem, yet writ, but the meaning outmastered the meter.

Never a daisy that grows, but a mystery guideth the growing;
Never a river that flows, but a majesty scepters the flowing;
Never a Shakespeare that soared, but a stronger than he did enfold him;
Nor never a prophet foretells, but a mightier seer hath foretold him.

Back of the canvas that throbs, the painter is hinted and hidden;
Into the statue that breathes, the soul of the sculptor is hidden;
Under the joy that is felt lie the infinite issues of feeling;
Crowning the joy revealed is the glory that crowns the revealing.

Great are the symbols of being, but that which is symbolized is greater;
Vast the create and beheld, but vaster the inward creator;
Back of the sound broods the silence, back of the gift stands the giving;
Back of the hand that receives thrill the sensitive nerves of receiving.

Space is as nothing to spirit, the deed is out done by the doing;
The heart of the wooer is warm, but warmer the heart of the wooing;
And up from the pits where these shiver, and up from the heights where those shine,
Twin voices and shadows swim starward and the essence of life is divine.

MAETERLINCK'S FAIRY PLAY.

From a recent copy of the Outlook we clip the following notice of "The Blue Bird," by Maurice Maeterlinck, the Belgian dramatist, which has been translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos and published by Dodd, Mead & Co., of New York.

"Most of Maeterlinck's plays have been laid in the country of the imagination. In his latest play, 'The Blue Bird,' he boldly takes his readers into fairyland, and with commendable and charming audacity creates an imaginary world which, in a way, suggests Mr. Barrie's world, and yet is as different from it as Maeterlinck is different from Barrie. Two children in a peasant's cottage are awakened at night by an old fairy who gives to the boy a green hat with a diamond ornament; wherever the diamond is turned the soul of things is visible. This is the initial step towards fairyland. All the inanimate things as well as the animals become articulate. The dog, faithful, humorous, and intimate; the cat, malicious, satirical, and traitorous; water, a weeping young girl; fire, springing from the hearth in red and yellow tights; milk, characteristically timid; sugar, a little too sweet; and light, an exquisite image. They all set out together to cage the blue bird the possession of which is to bring perfect happiness. In the pursuit of the bird they visit the Palace of Night, where they see the ghosts, and meet the sicknesses, among which the meanest is Cold-in-the-head, described with graphic felicity. The Shades, Terrors, and Mysteries are also in their view. Then they go to the Kingdom of the Future, where are the children who are waiting to be born; a chapter, it may be suspected, like the rest of the book, full of symbolism, and obviously beautiful. They also visit the Country of the Dead, very pathetically and tenderly described; and eventually they find the Blue Bird and take it home. But no sooner have they housed it than it flies away. Unimaginative and literal-minded people are warned off these premises; they will find nothing but nonsense here; but those who like 'The Little White Bird' and 'Peter Pan' will delight in the poetic beauty and freshness of feeling of this modern fairy play."

ARTISTS' FEAR OF AGE.

What subtle relationship does young bear to art, that so many authors, artists, musicians and actors fears to seem old? Some years ago the writer interviewed the brother of Macdonald, the sculptor, who noted as the most striking characteristic of the man, his hatred of the thought of being mature, even of admitting his fortieth year. To this day the photographs of E. H. Sothern show the smooth face of a youthful man, no doubt out of respect for Sothern's wishes, yet the writer's one view of him off stage a good ten years ago was of a man whose face was deeply lined and whose hair was streaked heavily with gray. The same old photograph of James G. Huneker, critic of drama and music, and author of "Egoists, a Book of Supermen," still shows the face one imagines to be typical of the college athlete, whereas the man himself looks every day of his nearly 60 years.

Richard Harding Davis still appears in print as the Gibsonsque man-type; he first appeared, how many years ago? One wonders if, at forty-five—Heavens! Davis forty-five!—the author of "Van Bibber" looks as the typical Van Bibber looks at forty-five, a trifle fat, a little puffy 'neath the eyes, a little doubled at the chin. What have become of the portraits of Gibson, himself, now that he has returned to illustration in America?

IF I SHOULD DIE TONIGHT.

By Ben King.

If I should die tonight
And you should come to my cold corpse and say,
Weeping and heartick o'er my lifeless clay—
If I should die tonight
And you should come in deepest grief and woe
And say, "Here's that ten dollars that I owe"—
I might arise in my large white cravat
And say, "What's that?"

If I should die tonight
And you should come to my cold corpse and kneel,
Clasping my bier to show the grief you feel—
I say if I should die tonight
And you should come to me, and there and then
Just even hint 'bout paying me that ten,
I might arise the while;
But I'd drop dead again.

JOSEPH W. FOLK

ADDRESS OF THE PIONEER PROSECUTOR OF GRAFT.

Thanks to the vigilance of the Good Government League, the machinations of the powers of evil in San Francisco were not wholly able to keep former Governor Joseph W. Folk out of San Francisco, though there are reasons to believe that they tried to. On Tuesday he was listened to with great interest at the St. Francis Hotel by several hundred persons, all of whom went away with a renewed enthusiasm for upholding the good work of the graft prosecution.

The general tenor of his discourse may be gathered from the following rather free paraphrasings of some of his sententious declarations:

"Reforms die, but revolutions never go backward, and the moral wave that has swept the nation within the last seven or eight years has been a revolution."

"A few years ago a few of us witnessed the dawning of a new day. Now it is daybreak everywhere."

"There are many men who have words of patriotism ever on their lips, but who cherish in their hearts treason against the moral well-being of their country."

"Do not fear to fight, lest you lose. Moral cowardice is more contemptible than physical."

"Before all the people a moral issue is inevitable."

"Ninety-nine men out of the hundred are honest—until tempted away from integrity by some selfish interest, but even then a majority of them are honest."

"When patriotism is as aggressive as rottenness it can always defeat it."

"A dozen righteous men working together can bring a reform anywhere if as aggressive as the other fellows."

"Graft must be fought as the farmer fights weeds, incessantly, lest they grow again if opportunity be given to start."

"Success in prosecuting graft is not to be measured by the number of rich men sent to state prison, but by the extent of the impetus given to the public conscience that it may go marching on."

"No one questions the sincerity of the soldier on the battlefield. His sincerity is proven by the fact that he is there. So is it with the sincerity of the prosecutor of graft in high places. The fact that he is doing it is proof enough of his sincerity."

"The apologists for the grafters will say of the prosecutor, 'He is no lawyer,' but if he were not a lawyer the grafters and their sympathizers would be the last to complain."

"The only remedy for graft is to drag it into the light and hit it hard."

"No grafter worth a million has ever been confined within prison walls and it is not likely that, with appellate courts constituted as they are, we shall ever see one of them so confined. A staff of cunning attorneys can always find flaws enough in any proceeding to afford a sympathetic appellate court some ground for nullifying a verdict."

"Under our present system of jurisprudence, and the constitution of our courts, the richest and the worst rascals are pretty certain to get away."

"When the bribed are prosecuted the apologists for graft demand to know why this poor man, tempted by the glitter of gold, is haled before the bar of justice to be punished and not the far more guilty tempter? When the briber is brought before the bar these same apologists ask why it is that the prosecution seeks to punish the man who was held up like the victim of a highwayman on the road and compelled to hand over?"

"What we need in our business, public life, and our administration of justice, is more of the golden rule and less of the rule of gold."

"Our main dependence can never be in prison walls, but in an aroused and active public conscience."

"Public life is but a reflection of private life."

"It is not enough to make the people free. We must then fight on to keep them free."

"The forces of graft never sleep."

"No government can be better than the people make it or worse than they allow it to become."

There are texts enough in the foregoing incomplete review of Governor Folk's telling address to rout, foot and horse, all the paid apologists for the San Francisco grafters that have ever done service for their Satanic Majesties. The predatory millionaire brigands have done a thousand times more to wreck the fortunes and the fame of California than all the prosecutors of graft this country has produced.

At the conclusion of the address of Governor Folk Mr. Francis J. Heney made a short and telling talk in his usual strain, which was received with cheers, during which he paid a deserved compliment to Mr. W. J. Langdon, who had made a reputation for civic decency, in fighting the gambling dens, long before the graft prosecutions were instituted.

After this meeting adjourned a luncheon was served to a portion of the audience in honor of the guest, with Mr. Isidore Jacobs as toastmaster. A number of telling speeches were made here by Mr. Langdon, Mr. Phelan, Bishop Hughes and Mr. Hornick of the Call.

It was announced by the chairman that arrangements would probably be made whereby Governor Folk could be brought to San Francisco next October to speak to the citizens of San Francisco at many points convenient for them to hear him. The Good Government League will take the matter up with the forces of good government in Los Angeles with this object in view. It will have telling effect if it can be done.

"MODEL LICENSE" SALOONS.

Mr. D. M. Smith, general counsel for the National Model License League, is in San Francisco, offering the solution of the saloon question that has been prepared by his principals, who are the leading men in the distilling, brewing, and beer stove business in the United States. These men have a novel plan to save the saloon business by removing its objectionable features, and in order to add their point of view to the discussion opened some time ago in these columns, the California Weekly obtained an interview with Mr. Smith, the substance of which appears below. In fairness to Mr. Smith we will say that he answered all questions before asking the stand toward prohibition taken by the publication in which the answers were to appear.

Mr. Smith's argument for the saloon as an institution is that it is the "poor man's club," the one place where man can find fellowship with man in warm, well-lighted quarters, with an atmosphere of sociability and masculine freedom; where he can discuss subjects of distinctly masculine interest with other men—sport, business conditions, and the like. No place selling anything other than alcoholic drinks has ever provided a substitute place to supply the general and natural want. Alcohol is a chemical element of all organic matter; its use has been sanctioned by immemorial custom and the Christian religion; and it will be drunk by men to all time, no matter what restrictive laws are passed. The best thing to do, then, is to provide for its being drunk under legal restrictions.

The League proposes to abolish the evils of the saloon by legislation that will make it profitable to be decent and ruinous to be indecent. The dive-keeper, says Mr. Smith, is the product of the corrupt politician and the corrupt politician's greatest weapon against the saloonkeeper is the threat to withdraw his license when it comes up for renewal. The remedy, therefore, is to limit the number of licenses to a certain pro rata of the population (he considers the ideal, as one saloon to every 750 population, but would not object to one to only every 2,000), and then make these licenses perpetual except for suspension for thirty days upon first conviction by a jury of a saloonkeeper for disobeying regulations, and forfeiture of license upon second conviction. Regulate the saloons any way you please, and enforce the regulations equitably against all, but remove the politician's power to threaten loss of license. This will encourage good men to invest in the business, because the property rights of a license will make it a stable business, and because the divekeepers will be driven out by the restrictive legislation and the absence of political pull.

The ideal saloon, according to Mr. Smith, is the German beer garden, and he believes that it will develop in this country under the laws he proposes. It will be decent, out of politics, out of shady relations with the half

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Justice Can Never Die.

Lost in the bog of statutes, or choked by precedents' dust;
Bound by the chains of "the letter" and stained by their blood-red rust;
Dwarfed from the royal stature that once was her queenly right,
With eyes for the day's own glory blinking in law-made night,
It is, oh, for the Goddess Justice, least of the clan divine,
Pricked by the barbs of "practice," sullen and cowed, supine;
Snubbed by the courtly judges, jeered by the legal crowd,
What is there left for Justice saving a bier and shroud?

Ay, but this Goddess Justice,
Though she be bound, and lie
Meshed in the web of "practice,"
Never and ne'er can die.

Soldiers who name her leader, worshipers at her shrine;
Ye who have seen her flouted with. "This is the statute's line;"
Ye who have seen Wealth buying its freedom from broken law,
While Poverty found a prison or haply a crust to gnaw;
Ye who have seen the briber loosed with the rest of us,
For judges had read the law, and had said,
"The letter, it readeth thus,"
What will ye do with Justice, thus torn from her birthright high?
Will ye cry with those who are e'er her foes,
"Better to let her die?"

Ay, but her state is godly,
Ichor her veins supply;
Letter and form may bind her,
But Justice can never die.

Battler for Right and Justice, struggler for Duty's sake,
Oh, but my heart would utter a message to reach your soul.
What though it seem disaster weareth your host away?
Right is the right, and the God of might heedeth the bitter fray.
What though the judges ever the technical web secure?
Justice is only sleeping; her waking is no less sure.
What though their gold have power to purchase the briber's ease?
The God of an equal justice is also the God of these.

Then be of good cheer, my brother,
Your banner be lifted high,
To Justice a friend till the unseen end,
For, lo, she will never die!

Truth in Couplets.

"A good deal of truth can be expressed in two lines," said the poet-philosopher. "Notice these, for instance:
"If you wish your soul unto heaven to pack,
You must use your own, not another man's" back.
"That's one that I worked out, and here's another:
"The man who fooled his dear wife, it is said,
Into thinking him perfect, was shrewd—but he'd."

"How could a truth be more concisely, yet accurately and delicately, stated? Then, again, what do you think of this:
"You may break, you may shatter the vase that you fill—
If you call it a vase I hope that you will."

"Of course, that's a truth."
But I told him he could have the ten cents he had requested, if only he would go, and he took it and departed to a place with a large gilt sign just around the corner.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Nothin' pleases lots o' people so much es doin' right—ef it don't cost too much.

I reely try to love my neighbor es myself, but I can't help nothin' 'tun a leaze again, satisfied when he has the roomatics than I am when I have 'em myself.

Names change, but customs don't. A place where a guilty man could escape punishment would be to be called a city of refuge; it's called appellate court now.

The anxious citizens that object to proddin' iniquity on the ground that it interferes with business ain't without a precedent: Satan's been doin' the same thing fer a long time.

A woman can git into a tube dress, but I can't help feelin' grateful that the Almighty evidently made other arrangements for her.

Lookin' 'round me at some folks I see, I can't help feelin' that race-suicide wouldn't have been such a bad thing es some authorities has painted it.

The fact that Justice is blindfolded, an' conscientiously can't see, is the only excuse that can be made fer some of her conduct.

I reckon it's a good thing that the people who presented Salome to the public haven't happened to think of Eve.

The bravest man has an almost hopeless struggle 'fore him in tryin' to be es brave es the women think he is.

The Truthful Mr. Mullally.

"I deprecate," said the thoughtful man, "the attempts of certain malicious papers and people to make it appear that my esteemed friend, Mr. Thornwell Mullally, was too—let us say coy—in dealing with the truth in swearing to his conviction that the United Railroads paid no money for the overhead trolley franchise. Mr. Mullally is an honest man, having ceased to practice law some years ago."

"To be sure, bribe-money was paid for the franchise, but, knowing that Mr. Mullally cannot have told a—I shudder to use the word, in so pure a connection, but knowing that he cannot have told it, whatever it was, I call attention to three theories, any one of them tenable, which would account for the peculiar circumstances surrounding the case.

"First, Sammamblists do queer things, and it is at least possible that the prominent and beneficent Mr. Patrick Calhoun gave the order for the payment of the bribe money while he was asleep. This would account for the fact that neither he nor Mr. Mullally know anything about the transaction in their waking hours.

"Second, That pre-eminent patriot, Mr. Abraham Ruef, may have paid the money out of his own pocket as an evidence of that kindly feeling in which he abounds. The fact that he has since paid out more than the $200,000 involved in the case in a generous effort to spare the state the expense of boarding him, lends color to this theory.

"Third, The money may have paid itself. I am aware, sir, that this theory may at first thought seem unreasonable, but when you reflect that we either must believe something of the sort or believe that Mr. Mullally—you know the word which I refuse to speak in such a connection—when you reflect, I say, that we either must believe in some such theory or believe that Mr. Mullally did it, I am sure it will seem less unreasonable.

"I wish," said the thoughtful man, after some moments of reflection, "that, in justice to my friend, Mr. Mullally, you would publish these explanations of his testimony."

"I will," I said.

"That's right," the thoughtful man concluded, "for, being the only explanations that are available, it is but right that the public should have the benefit of them, thus preserving a name sacred in sacredness only to that of Mr. Calhoun—for why need we mention Mr. Ruef?—from slander, vilification and gross innuendo."

"A Little Child Shall Lead Them."

"A little child shall lead them." Oh, worn and weary men,
Turn back unto the dawn of life and breathe its peace again;
In every happy childish face that, smiling, turns to you
Read once again the lesson of the glory that you knew
Ere you joined right hands with worry and were bondsman to its care
Lest your sun should lose its splendor and should nevermore be fair;
Hear the baby laughter cheering souls by storm and tempest tossed,
And a little child shall lead you to the glory you have lost.

"A little child shall lead them." Lo, we falter on our way;
We are tossed by angry billows and are drenched by flying spray,
But somewhere there is a haven, and we know it as we roam,
Where the children run to greet us from the Shelterland of Home,
And the little baby fingers are as petals soft and white,
And the little baby kisses set the brood of care to flight,
And we know, the while we hold them close and closer to the breast,
That a little child has led us to our country of the blest.

"A little child shall lead them." He is nearer to the star
By Jacob seen, the ladder bright of angels white and fair.
So late, so late the rosebud feet have trod that shining hill,
The unguessed by older ones the babe remembers still,
And, looking in his dewy eyes, the blinded soul recalls.
As in a dream, the glory of the Father's starly halls;
And then, the world forgotten, with all its doubt and woe,
A little child has led us to the peace that we shall know.

A Pertinent—or Possibly Impertinent—Fable.

A traveler in an Arabian desert came upon a lovely and unprotected female who was weeping bitterly.

"Wherefore weepest thou, fair maid?" the traveler interrogated her, at the same time vainly endeavoring to chuck her under the chin by way of comforting her.

"I—I guess you would weep if you were in my shoes," the maiden brokenly responded, trying the effect of a languishing glance on him.

"Too tight?" the traveler sympathetically inquired.

"N-no. Alas, I am an exile!"

"Who fired you?"

"The fi-fi-financial potentates."

"What made them send you here?"

"Because they—they couldn't send me off the earth. Once I was respected, but now—boohoo!—since I married Mr. Law I—I—"

"Was you maiden name Niobe?" the traveler inquired.

"No, it was—was—Justice. They exiled me for interfering with business."

The traveler offered to let her weep on his shoulder, but she said that if Law and the financial potentates ever should find out about it, they would see that she was hanged; so, as he could do nothing further, the traveler departed, and if Justice is not still in the Arabian desert there are times when it seems impossible to guess where she may be.

Moral: If some of them had their way the dear old girl would be in a place compared with which the Arabian desert would seem cool.

John W. Metcalf.

A CALIFORNIA COMPOSER.

Probably very few Californians know that one of the most popular American composers has lived in this state—mostly in Oakland—for the last nineteen years, known personally only to the musical colonies in the cities around San Francisco bay while his songs have brought him fame all over the world. Gadske, Bispham, Ricardo Martin, and many other famous singers use his music in their concerts and add their praise to his reputation. He is John W. Metcalf, a brother of Victor H. Metcalf's law partner in Oakland. Perhaps his most famous song is "Absent," which Madame Gadske sang on this coast during her concert tour last January.

But he is, besides, the author of more than forty other songs, all popular both in Europe and America; as well as of piano, violin and organ music. His compositions are all published by Arthur P. Schmidt, in Boston, Leipzig, and New York, and, by arrangement, by London publishers as well.

Mr. Metcalf's musical experience has been of wide range. Born at Waverly, Illinois, and educated at Knox College and the University of Illinois, his musical education was mainly acquired abroad, at the Leipzig Conservatory. Here he studied pianoforte with Carl Reinecke, Louis Maas, Wenzel, Jadassohn, and Zwintscher; composition with Reinecke, Jadassohn and Rust; harmony with the Richters, father and son; voice with Klesse, and musical history and esthetics with Dr. Oscar Paul.

While a student at Leipzig, Mr. Metcalf appeared twice as piano soloist with the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra; and composed several piano pieces, a mixed chorus written in commemoration of the king of Saxony's birthday, and a sonata for the pianoforte. The success of his efforts is indicated by the award to him, upon graduation, of the famous Helbig prize for composition and pianoforte, as well as by an honorary diploma.

Since his graduation Mr. Metcalf has always lived in America, dividing his time between teaching and composition. He taught in the Boston Conservatory, and later in Stanford University. He came to California in 1890 for his health, and has for many years conducted successful classes in pianoforte in Oakland.

In 1897 his attention was attracted to the composition of music for songs, and he found in this field a wide and immediate popularity. His music is notable for its melodic beauty and variety of style, and especially for its "singing" quality that makes it peculiarly desirable in concert. This last quality also makes it most valuable for teachers of voice culture, with whom his compositions are especially popular because they are adapted to so many kinds of voices.

Although his songs have been chiefly instrumental in giving his work a world-wide audience, Mr. Metcalf has not confined himself entirely to song writing. The list of his published compositions also includes a Legende, Impromptu and Mazurka for violin and piano; a Pastorale for pipe organ; composition for pianoforte; choruses for men's voices, women's voices and mixed voices; an anthem for bass solo, quartette and mixed chorus, with organ; and five sacred responses. All of these works have been performed successfully.

PERSONALIA

Queen Helene of Italy has as her hobby the binding of books, at which trade she is adept.

Ambassador Kogoro Takahira, of Japan lately received the degree of doctor of laws from Amherst College.

Chicago has an official city forester, Jacob H. Prost, who has set himself the task of planting 1,000,000 trees in the next five years.

Ambassador James Bryce has a sister-in-law, Miss Margaret Ashton, who was recently elected a town councillor in her native town in England.

Louis Calvert, of London, has been chosen stage manager of the New Theater, in New York, to produce Shakespearean and other classical plays.

Miss Henrietta Crosman announces that she is in the market for a play on woman's suffrage. She promises to give the right play a magnificent production.

Louis Wain, president of the National Cat Club of London, is in America painting cats. His cartoons of cats have amused the English public for many years.

According to "Savoyard," Nelson W. Aldrich has made every tariff bill since 1883: "perfected" the McKinley tariff, wrote the metal and cotton schedules of the Wilson tariff, and made the Dingley bill.

The official press agent of the state of Michigan is Miss Nellie Revell, of Chicago, who has been chosen by the governor to write up the state and county fairs as a means of advertising the resources of Michigan.

"Smiling Joe" is cured. He is the seven-year-old boy whose photograph, showing him strapped to a wooden frame as treatment for spinal tuberculosis, was advertised to the country's ends in an appeal for funds to aid the Sea Breeze Hospital.

Lord Rothschild's mansion in Piccadilly has an unfinished cornice. The reason is that Lord Rothschild is an orthodox Jew, by whom the tradition is preserved that every pious man's house must have some part unfinished to bear witness that its owner is, like Abraham, only a pilgrim and stranger upon earth.

President Hadley of Yale is never without a ready and witty remark. When visiting preachers occasionally ask President Hadley how long they shall speak he invariably replies, "There is no limit, sir, upon the time you may preach; but there is a Yale tradition that no souls are saved after the first twenty minutes."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

McCarthy vs. P. H. McCarthy's campaign The Call

For the Union Labor nomination for Mayor, is the most spectacular part of the San Francisco political circus now performing in the half dozen rings in the commercial capital of the state. The Call's exposure of the alleged conference of Labor leaders with representatives of Mr. Herrin's political bureau in the Southern Pacific's offices has stirred up a lot of the performers. McCarthy, having forced Mike Casey's hand and proved it to be a bluff, has undoubtedly the strategic call on the Union Labor nomination. But he is a long way from the unanimous approval of laboring men, and he is trying desperately to patch up a record discredited by defeat and tainted at least by the shadow of suspicion of corruption affiliations implied in the Call's charges.

The Hot End Of the Poker McCarthy has made, however, a tactical blunder in his reply to the Call. He has sued its editor for criminal libel, which puts the burden of proof upon himself to show that consorting with officials of the Southern Pacific is an act the publication of which is a libel upon his character. If he had sued in the civil courts for damages the burden of proof would have been on the Call, but McCarthy, in his haste, has laid hold of the hot end of the poker, and the public sentiment is that he will burn his fingers rather than break heads. It looks to the casual eye, too, as if the forcing of his own nomination upon his brother labor leaders had been done with such lack of diplomacy as to leave some of them in a state of mind where they have felt inclined to "leak" information to unfriendly papers.

Alliances However that may be, the Mc-Of McCarthy's campaign is in full swing, and the McCarthy lieutenants are out actively trying to make political alliances to back it up. Jerome Bassett is figuring on delivering such vote in the tenderloin as he controls to McCarthy's candidacy. Apparently, too, McCarthy is trying to make an alliance with Gavin McNab. The idea appears to be this: Harry Flannery, who runs the Ricker saloon, is an intimate acquaintance, if not friend, of McCarthy. McCarthy lunches almost daily at Flannery's place. Flannery is a near-boss of the Democracy, and has been trying for a long time to get McNab to recognize him as a leader in the party. McNab, however, regards Flannery's pretensions as a joke, especially since James D. Phelan beat Flannery to a standstill last fall in the selection of Democratic presidential elector. McCarthy persists, though, in hoping that Flannery can make an arrangement with McNab to support his mayoralty hopes. So far, McNab has not been encouraging; in fact, he has been careful not to discredit himself at all in this campaign, as he has had enough disappointments to make him very discreet about any entangling alliances.

The Joke of the Campaign The grand joke of the McCarthy campaign is, however, the attempt to revivify the dead anti-Japanese warcry. O. A. Tveit-moe, McCarthy's lieutenant, raised the cry recently by denouncing Mayor Taylor for presiding at the dinner in honor of the admiral of the Japanese fleet in San Francisco harbor. An hour later McCarthy was eating a luncheon in Flannery's saloon, prepared by Flannery's three Jap boys. The Jap agitation will not figure heavily in the campaign.

Sullivan to Run Anyway McCarthy's strength will not lie with the union working men. Except as an odd jobs carpenter in hotels in San Francisco, union men have not discovered any trace of McCarthy as a union carpenter here. Politics—union and municipal—have been his long suit, and his municipal experiences have been unfortunate for labor. Labor men know this, and he will probably draw what support he gets from the places he drew it before, from the tenderloin and the odds and ends political rag tags. He will have the further thorn in his side in the independent candidacy of Frank J. Sullivan, whose acquaintance in McCarthy's nomination was one of the things Casey could not deliver.

Poor Casey's Poor Casey! He has played the Losing Game game this year with blundering uncertainty. He has had a new candidate every other day: Casey himself, "Floater" Haggerty, John L. Nolan, Andy Gallagher, Frank Sullivan, Pat Broderick (former superintendent of schools) and now McCarthy. When the Call's story was discussed at a labor meeting, Casey said, "Me character is at stake. Me life is an open book, and I defy investigation." "Yes," some one replied, "an open book, all blank pages." Political wiseacres predict Casey's return to the pilot house of a teaming truck next fall.

Probabilities in City Politics Two probabilities appear on the books in San Francisco. One is that Supervisor Loring P. Rixford will resign to become city architect to succeed the late Newton J. Tharp. The other is that John Grief, former county clerk of San Francisco, will run strong for the Republican nomination for sheriff.

Berkeley's Second Election Tomorrow A peculiar situation has arisen in Berkeley where the new charter provides that a candidate for office who receives a majority vote at the primary is thereby elected, and that a second election must be held to decide between candidates, no one of whom received a majority at the primary. Beverly Hodghead was recently elected mayor at the primary election by the good government forces in a three-cornered fight. But no one of the twenty-nine candidates for the four places on the council got a majority, so a second election tomorrow is necessary to decide amongst them. The eight receiving the highest vote at the primary have their names on the ticket. The three highest are backed by the Good Government Club, which elected Hodghead. They are: W. F. McClure, present city engineer, from North Berkeley; Christian Hoff, for twelve years a trustee, from West Berkeley, and E. B. Norton, a banker of South Berkeley. The fourth man, R. A. Berry, of East Berkeley, was not backed by the club because he could not decide between him and his former opponent, C. A. Black, but since Berry has won out over Black he has received the endorsement of the Club, to which he has always been acceptable. The peculiarity of the situation is the apathy of the voters regarding this second election, an apathy as dangerous to good government as the enthusiasm displayed at the first election was hopeful of good government. However, the chances of the Good Government Club's nominees seem good.

Party Expense Public Charge A Colorado has enacted a law providing for paying out of the public treasury the cost of necessary campaign expenses of political parties. The text of the law is not at hand, so how the problem has been worked out The Watchman does not know, but that Colorado has the right idea there can be no question. It is impossible that political parties shall not be beholden to powerful corporations as long as they are dependent upon such corporations for the sines of political warfare, but, once make the necessary charges of this form of public education an item of public expense, and a way is opened for poor men to enter public life upon their merits rather than as the subsidized retainers of our modern feudal lords. This is the next reform coming. If Colorado has led the way intelligently much will be forgiven that commonwealth for its having worshipped the golden calf with more abnegation than was creditable to its manhood.

The Virtues Of Roosevelt A number of eastern newspapers, notable among them the Springfield Republican, that had relatively little to say in his favor to the volume of criticism bestowed while he was president, are now admitting that, after all, Theodore Roosevelt wasn't so bad. At least he tried to do right. If his methods were objectionable his purpose was not. With some reservations for the preservation of impartiality of statement we may look for a steady augmentation of praise for the purposes of the gentleman now gunning in Africa—while he is gunning in Africa. Were he to resume gunning on his return it might be different.

A Democratic Paper Wanted A little group of forlorn hoppers are combing the state in search of capital for the establishment in San Francisco of a Democratic Daily. Who will edit the paper when it is established? Who could do it and keep the paper Democratic when the wisest man in the world does not know what it is to be Democratic? Blind and unreasoning opposition to whatever the Republicans propose will hardly suffice for an editorial policy and any steering committee would so fall to fighting within its own personnel over what is Democratic that a second issue of the paper would never emerge from the press. The need is for papers that will tell the truth. The party organ without a monkey attachment is coming to be about as useless as a hand organ similarly bereft.

The Voice of The President There is a yearning manifest to hear the voice of the President in relation to tariff revision. The silence of our broad-beamed executive is not so ominous as it is disappointing. The American people have little doubt as to what he will say when he does speak, but they have not been used to being held in suspense. With Theodore Roosevelt in the chair that piece of furniture would long since have been heard from and the answering echo would have reverberated. However, let the people possess their souls with patience. When the President is heard from we shall all know where he "sot" all the time.

THE CALL OF THE LAW

By JOHN H. RIORDAN.

Our present system of jurisprudence, springing originally from the tribal regulations of different peoples, hampered in some degree by remnants of ancient customs and feudal notions, complicated by hasty or ill-advised legislation, does not adequately meet the present requisites for the administration of justice. Modern industrial conditions and social combinations have introduced unprecedented problems; nevertheless the eyes of many of the judges are turned backward through a course of four hundred years or more to the days of Littleton and Coke. We are still invoking the interpretations of a long past yesterday. There is too much of government by the dead! Mr. Bonaparte, ex-Attorney-General, in a recent speech at Pittsburg, pointed out the need of purging the law of "various obsolete and obstructive rules of procedure or proof, which, in practice, serve only to provide loopholes of escape for conscious and often brazen guilt."

Procedure is regarded too much as of the substance. Rules of evidence, instead of facilitating the discovery of the truth, are often permitted to hinder and impede. Criminals are convicted and months and years pass away, while lawyers and courts wrangle, ere the gates of the penitentiary finally close upon the condemned.

"The result of our lax administration of the criminal laws," declared President Taft in an address delivered some time ago to the students of Yale, "is that since 1885 there have been 131,951 murders and homicides and 2,286 executions. In 1885 the number of murders was 1,808, and in 1904 it had increased to 8,482."

But if the law itself is deficient, much more so is the modern lawyer. The ideals of his youth have been largely submerged by the commercialism of the day. He has lost much of the devotion to justice that formerly characterized the profession. There has been a noticeable decline in dignity and honor. The profession seems to be sinking into a trade. In the industrial conflict the practitioner forgets that while the tactics of the battle may vary, the principles of honesty never change. His success is gauged, not by the intensity with which he seeks after justice, but solely by the number of cases he wins, no matter how. This lowering of ethical standards must be stayed or the law will become an abomination—justice a mockery! It is for the college-bred lawyer to bear the brunt of the battle for better things.

If our jurisprudence needs readjustment and the natural guardian of the law makes no endeavor to uplift it, what is the result? Fear spreads among the weak that the law is no protection against the aggressions of the powerful. The lowly are tempted to revert to the arbitrament of the firebrand, the rock or the bullet rather than to the established courts of justice. An undercurrent of distrust is engendered, where universal confidence and peacefulness should abide.

This condition of affairs confronts us all, lawyer and layman alike. But to him who has been nurtured in its science and genius, who he has brought face to face with its spirit and purpose, by the systematized investigation provided in his university, the law itself appeals.

Heretofore it has cried to its thousands of followers and that cry has for the most part been ignored. Now it calls to the new generation of its devotees, strong in their college ideals and noble ambitions—a call that must be answered. It calls for intelligent, conservative legislation embodying progressive ideas; it calls for the destruction of much that is merely traditional and superannuated; it calls for vigorous application of all salutary existing enactments. It calls for a simplification of procedure so that the enforcement of rights and the redress of wrongs will be speedier, surer, more effective. It calls upon us to elevate the standards of the bar so that the lawyers may become votaries of justice, and to insist upon laws so that the law may become synonymous with justice.

And to him who is about to launch upon the profession of the law, it calls for stern heroism that he may not, in tempestuous hours, turn back from his course.

From all sections of the nation; from these Pacific shores, from our native state, from our mother university, resounds this call, the call of the Law, and it shall be answered.

("Model License Saloons"—Concluded.)

world, and its proprietor will not sell liquor to minors nor intoxicated persons. Furthermore, he believes that it will satisfy the people who now vote for prohibition. He declares that the general public does not want prohibition, but votes prohibition rather than tolerate the evils of the worse class of saloons. By enforcing his proposed laws, the genuine prohibitionist will be robbed of his greatest asset, "the horrible example," and the public demand for temperance will be satisfied.

Also, he believes, the increased stability of the business will bring about a sense of class honor among the saloonkeepers that will cleanse the business of crooked men, as the bar associations eject shysters without waiting for the public to do it, and the medical societies brand quacks without waiting for legal processes to do it.

His objections to prohibition are two: one, it doesn't prohibit; and, two, it would be of no great service if it did. He cited the case of Turkey, the one country which, because of its religion, has not had a drink in 1,300 years. "One would think," he said, "to hear a prohibitionist speech, that Turkey should, therefore, be a heaven upon earth. Its men should be the most intelligent and industrious in the world; it should be the home of liberty; women should be idolized; education should be universal; prosperity should be at high stage. Look at Turkey for the answer. The very name of its people in popular language the world over epitomizes the answer—"the unspeakable Turk."

ECONOMIC VALUE OF IMPROVED WATERWAYS

By JOHN A. FOX

[This article is a copy of the address delivered before the California Counties Committee meeting at Del Monte, May 19, by Mr. John A. Fox, of Washington, D. C. Mr. Fox is a special director of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. The meeting at Del Monte was attended by representatives of practically every county chamber of commerce and of most of the leading commercial organizations of California. The general subject of discussion was "Conservation in California."]

The complete development and utilization of our inland waterways for navigation and the speedy and efficient improvement of our sea coast harbors are perhaps the most important of all matters that present themselves to-day for consideration at the hands of the American people. Before an assemblage of this character, therefore, where conservation is the theme, it is perhaps very proper that some thought be given to this subject, especially to that phase of the subject which pertains to the improvement of inland waterways.

Waste of Water an Economic Loss.

The conservation of our water is without doubt the most imperative duty that confronts us for in the present condition of waste, or non-utilization of natural resources, the waste of water is much more far reaching than the waste of any other natural gift. Each inch of rainfall wasted means so many millions of dollars lost in agricultural wealth; the flow of every cubic foot of water to the sea unused means the loss of millions of dollars worth of heat, of light, of mechanical force, the unused channel of every mile of water course means an extravagance that in the aggregate costs the people of this nation many millions of dollars each year. In permitting our water to go to waste, therefore, we are losing the primal source of nearly our entire wealth.

By concerted effort as a people, as a nation, we may cause great arid and unproductive areas to yield agricultural products; we may tame the rivers and rapid flowing streams through our workshops and haul our trains, and at the same time produce a great network of intercommunicating water routes upon which our products may be most economically transported.

Transportation Possibilities of Waterways.

It is with the transportation feature that I will deal particularly on this occasion, because that is the mission of the National River and Harbor Congress. There are at present some 45,000 miles of inland waterways traversing the United States upon which commerce could be carried to-day at a great saving to the people if adequate improvements were made upon them, such as have been made upon the waterways of other countries. These embrace the possible navigable rivers of the Pacific Coast, the 16,000 miles in the valley of the Mississippi, and about 17,000 miles of rivers from 100 to 300 miles in length penetrating the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts. They are to-day of little or no service in transporting our freights because of the unstable and unreliable depths of the water to be found in them, and, owing to conditions resulting from internal development and the advance of civilization, they are perhaps of less use to-day in transporting freights than they were in their natural state some fifty or one hundred years ago. Prior to the settling of the plains, the clearing of the forests and the draining of the pools, silt and loosened earth that now fills the natural river beds was held by native turf; forests that no longer stand held back and retained the waters, and vast areas now provided with modern drainage no longer feed out the even flow for a period of twelve months, but disgorge in great floods for two or three months and leave the channel dry or too shallow for navigation during the remainder of the year. All of this can and should be rectified by the national government, so that this vast natural system of water courses could again be utilized.

We are neglecting this important duty every day, and the condition of these rivers is becoming worse and worse, although many believe that the rivers and harbors of the nation have received ample funds of the hands of Congress. When you pause to consider that we are devoting only about $22,000,000 each year to the most important character of national development, while we spend $140,000,000 every year on pensions, and $110,000,000 every year on a navy, and $82,000,000 every year on an army, you, too, will conclude that this phase of our development is neglected.

Immense Savings in Freight Charges.

Consider, moreover, what a magnificent investment this nation could make by improving these rivers for navigation. It would require an outlay of about $500,000,000 during the next ten years to construct the needed improvements on this vast system embracing the San Joaquin and the Sacramento, the Snake and the Columbia; the Missouri, the Ohio and the Mississippi; the Red and the Arkansas; the Intercoastal Canal and the Atlantic Deepwater Way, and all of the other important rivers reaching nearly all parts of the country. Once improved, these waterways would become capable of navigation and a vast tonnage that must now move by rail at a cost of $7.59 per ton per 1,000 miles, which was the average rate by rail last year, could be carried at a rate of $2.00 per ton per 1,000 miles, which was the highest rate on inland waterways. Now, the amount of freight carried by the railway systems last year was 236,038,000,000 tons carried one mile, so that if the waterways had been improved and had been able to carry but one-tenth of this bulk at a saving of $2.00 per ton per 1,000 miles it would have amounted to over $118,000,000, or more than 25 per cent. on the entire cost. As water rates determine the rail rates, however, it would have even been more than this, and if the regulating influence that is now felt by the roads that compete with water traffic on the Great Lakes, the Ohio or the Mississippi river, can be taken as a basis, the reduction would have been $1.00 per 1,000 miles on all of the remaining freight that was carried by rail or practically $200,000,000. It would appear then that $318,000,000 saved annually to the American people by the investment of $500,000,000 would be a very good investment. There is no doubt but what such a saving would follow these improvements for it has been demonstrated wherever we have made thorough and complete improvements to benefit navigation, for example on the Great Lakes; on the Monongahela river and along the Atlantic Coast. Moreover we have the example of the waterways of Germany, France, Belgium and the other European countries to give us some idea of what could be saved by encouraging transportation by water.

Then, too, deepening our harbors has paid for the investment many times over, and that is a work which must be extended until all of our seaports are capable of harboring vessels of a uniform draft of at least thirty feet.

Economy of Deepened Harbors.

It is estimated that all together we have as a nation expended but little over $587,000,000 in river and harbor improvements. On twelve important harbors on the Gulf and Atlantic Coast we have expended but about $53,000,000, and yet the saving every year on freights that come in and go out of these harbors because of the present greater depth exceeds that entire amount many times over. In New York harbor alone there is an annual saving of nearly $82,000,000 because a thirty-five-foot channel exists instead of the former twenty-three-foot channel. The reduced price on the export of cotton and grain alone on account of deeper water in the southern harbors nets the American people over $18,000,000 annually, because a 15,000-ton vessel can now replace the old 3,000-ton vessel, and charges twenty-seven cents per 100 pounds less on cotton and five cents per 100 pounds less on grain than was the case before improvements were made.

The Impetus to Commerce.

Moreover, it is at least interesting to note the enormous impetus given to our commerce by these improvements, as is exemplified by a few of the eastern and gulf harbors. Boston harbor, deepened from eighteen feet to thirty feet at a cost of $7,273,000 has increased her commerce from $66,600,000 in 1870, to $209,700,000 in 1907; New York harbor with improvements that cost only $2,146,000 has increased her commerce from $840,276,000 in 1886 to $1,163,110,000 in 1907; Norfolk's commerce has been increased by the improvement of Hampton Roads at a cost of $1,665,000 from $21,349,000 in 1890 to $597,950,000 in 1907; Mobile, with $4,949,000 spent upon her harbor deepening it from thirteen feet to twenty-three feet has seen her commerce grow from $3,479,000 in 1880 to $28,419,000 in 1907, and Galveston harbor improved at a cost of $7,591,000 has shown an increase from $24,862,000 in 1890 to $24,337,000 in 1907. Nor have harbor improvements been less remunerative here on your Pacific Coast, for although in all of the harbor improvements made out here from San Diego, improvements to Bellingham on the north, only about $20,000,000 have been expended, yet so great has been the impetus given to commerce that it has been increased in the aggregate from 4,662,000 tons in 1885 to 15,654,000 tons in 1907. At Oakland, California, and Portland, Oregon, the results have been most remarkable. At an expense to the national government of a little over $2,878,000, Oakland harbor entrance has been increased from five feet in 1874 to twenty-five feet in 1907, and as a result her commerce has expanded from 156,300 tons to 4,210,125 tons annually. In improving the entrance to the Columbia river and perfecting a channel to Portland, Oregon, about $7,286,000 has been spent, and the commerce has expanded with a growth of 4,351,000 tons in 1907 as compared with 1,637,000 tons in 1898. It has been the best investment of any $20,000,000 ever made by this nation, and more investments of this character must be made in the future if we as a nation are to reap the benefits to be derived from the digging of the Panama Canal.

The time has come when these river and harbor improvements must be carried on in a more extensive and comprehensive manner. There must be more businesslike methods pursued, larger sums appropriated and more work must be done in a more continuous and less wasteful manner. Under the present system we undertake to build a breakwater estimated to cost $3,000,000, and $1,000,000 is appropriated to start the work. Half of this is used in getting ready the false work and may be the most expensive part of the bill to pass Congress and by the time another bill can be passed carrying some more of the needed $3,000,000, the false work has been destroyed by tories and must be built over again. We undertake to improve one of our rivers and contract for certain locks and dams and a large amount of money is appropriated to begin the work. Congress fails to provide for this undertaking when the next river and harbor bill is framed, and hundreds of thousands of dollars are lost in the ravages of flood and time. This must cease, and a continuous river and harbor policy must take its place, with money provided every year just as is provided for the army, the navy, or the judiciary. We can only bring about such a change when the entire American people shall have been informed and made to express their views regarding such matters. You here in California can help bring about such a change as well as the people in Illinois, or New York, or Louisiana, and with your great interest in con-

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

On his place at Indiana Ranch, near Marysville, W. J. Labadie recently picked up a nugget of almost solid gold which weighed 36 ounces and contained a little more than $700 worth of the yellow metal. It was but one of several nuggets of considerable size which have been found on the Labadie place, and on this account the Marysville Appeal reports that the finding of the big nugget "did not cause any particular excitement."

Speaking of gold finds, Ole Johnson, of Mountain House, in Sierra County, recently took $800 in the metal from a pocket unearthing on his land. In this case, too, there does not appear to have been "any particular excitement."

From a clay deposit just above bedrock in a mine at Oro Fino, a week or two ago, miners dug out a number of bones of immense size, presumably those of a mastodon. Here, too, such bones have been found in the same vicinity.

The line which the Southern Pacific is building along the Los Angeles aqueduct from Mojave to the Owens river valley is completed to a point 95 miles north of Mojave. Surveyors are endeavoring to locate a place for a tunnel through the White mountains, whence the line will be extended to the Southern Pacific's Goldfield branch.

Secretary Crane of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce has devised a decidedly unique plan for attracting tourists to the Capital City. If it is carried into effect, a piece of land near Folsom, anywhere on which gold in some quantity may be found, will be purchased and visitors to Sacramento will be taken there and permitted to mine gold for themselves. In a log cabin of the style of '49 beans, cooked in coeval style, will be served by a miner of "the days of old, the days of gold," and everything possible will be done to make the visitor realize that he really is gold-mining. It is an idea worthy of Los Angeles inception, and if it does not attract visitors where orange groves would fail it surely will be because something is wrong with the method of its execution.

The Sotomeyo Scimitar, of Haldsburg, has been changed from a semi-weekly to a weekly and increased to twice its former size. And Nowlin, the editor, promises several things in the line of improvement, and his promise will be made good.

A. C. Irwin, Jr., a railroad fireman, son of Railroad Commissioner Irwin, recently, at Sacramento, met with a peculiar accident. He was at work on his engine when a traveling crane on a flat-car the engine was passing swung about just in time to strike and badly fracture his elbow. Which again illustrates the fact that it is difficult to know when and where one is safe.

Following is the number of school children in various cities and towns of California, according to reports recently given out: Los Angeles, 42,151; San Francisco, 40,746; Oakland, 15,815; Berkeley, 5,833; Sacramento, 5,098; Pasadena, 5,050; San Diego, 4,772; Fresno, 4,183; San Jose, 4,090; Alameda, 3,991; Stockton, 3,309; Pomona, 2,738; Riverside, 2,420; Eureka, 2,135; Santa Rosa, 2,062; San Bernardino, 2,062; Santa Barbara, 1,716; Vallejo, 1,330; Lodi, 832; Oroville, 775; Ventura, 760; Selma, 742; Santa Maria, 580.

MY Aunt Susanne was an original creation," began the district attorney upon the appointed evening when he was his tale to unfold, and the charter members of the Galoot Club had settled themselves for the ordeal, "and, so far as I know, our Heavenly Father has not seen it to repeat the pattern, although it has always seemed to me that he might have done worse. By the way, accent upon the 'saune' always. Whoever failed of that and called her aunt Susan was persona non grata for many days with my aunt, a no trivial infraction."

Our branch of the family tree had about petered-out, and so had Uncle Joshua's. Woe also to anyone who "Joshed" him! On both sides of the house, all-told, there were only three nephews and four nieces who survived to adulthood. Every new birth into the two families, save these, was soon marked by another little grave stone in the hillside cemetery in the fenced-off corner of Aunt Susanne's pasture. Our family reunions were mainly held there.

More than all this the only lick of financial sense possessed by the two families was in the careful keeping of Aunt Susanne. She was the unspent partner in the financial affairs of each one of the families and even then they would scarcely have kept their noses above the poverty line but for her not infrequent aid, especially around taxpaying time and when there were doctor's bills to pay and undertaker's, too, and they usually followed each other in natural sequence. Our people were all industrious enough, if getting up before day constitutes industry, but their earning capacities were not great, and all their figures got so tangled that they never could be so unraveled as to leave anything at the end of the year. Aunt Susanne was our rock of refuge whenever in trouble, and this was why we all loved her, despite her innate antipathy to her, and despite the further fact that she could be desperately mean or stingy upon occasion, but never both at the same time.

Uncle Joshua was a sea captain. In those days American "Hearts of Oak" had not been driven wholly by money. Aunt Susanne had made a few voyages with him, but she was no Baptist and rough weather always made her sick and so, finally, she remained at home and he came and went as his business required him to do. To be busy while he was away Aunt took to raising poultry of high quality. I think Uncle brought her some particularly fine specimens from over seas and she undertook breeding new strains with enthusiasm. From poultry she passed to hogs, obtained in the same way; from hogs to sheep and finally to cattle and horses, with the final result that she had bought out three or four adjacent Massachusetts farms and converted them into a blooded stock farm that took the sweepstakes premiums at all the fairs in that part of the country. Uncle was tolerably thrifty himself, but whenever he came home from a voyage, and counted up his gains, Aunt Susanne was able to get out her bank book and show him that her balance to the good was better than his, despite so many nephews and nieces to be sent to college or to the normal.

They had had two children of their own, but one of them took confounding smallpox and died while they were in China and the other fell overboard and was drowned during a squall among the Windward islands, so that, in advancing years, they sort of took us all into the family to do as they would have done by their own children as if they had lived, which included pairing us off in matrimony according to the best available rules followed in conducting Aunt's high-class breeding farm. I use the term "best available rules" advisedly for Aunt made us to understand that if she had the world to select from with an eye to good principles of breeding she would probably have excluded the last one of us from consideration. We should have gone early to the shambles.

Aunt laid the program down to us, one at a time, in about this fashion: "Matrimony has for its object progeny. No other purpose justifies that relation. The purpose of progeny is the replenishing of the earth in obedience to Scriptural injunction, not with anything that happens to come along in the shape of a child, but with the best product of the best mating of available specimens that thought, observation, sound judgment and experience can produce. Any short of this is an offense against God and man and to allow mere inclination, sentimentality, even infatuation, to dethrone reason, observation and sound judgment was evidence of imbecility and a tempting of the wrath of God. As for her nephews and nieces, and of her husband, she would attend to their pairing off for them with an unselfish devotion to their interests and, if they proved tractable and co-operative, their financial futures, as well as as their conjugal joys, would be well provided for otherwise the old academy where she and Uncle had received their education, and our preparatory work had been done, would get the bulk of their fortune instead of merely a Joshua and a Susanne Whipple scholarship, male and female.

We were all prone to accept this useful function for that part of my respected, but rather dreaded aunt, the more especially since my eldest sister, the only member of the family who "took after" her in the least, not only refused to abide by Aunt Susanne's choice of a husband for her, but eloped with a graceless scoundrel and went out West to live a hard life of independence and toil, unremembered in either letter or will. That lesson was not lost on any remaining member of either family. We all knew that Aunt Susanne was inexorable.

The better to discharge her sacred obligation to her Maker, to her well-loved nephews and nieces, and to a posterity whose good points she fairly longed to see, Aunt Susanne took up the study of phrenology. She felt the protuberances of every head that came into the community and as for our own, well, we had small need for the manipulations of any tonsorial artist. More than once she has mesmerized me off to dreamland while her fingers were feeling out the hills and valleys, the broad plateaus and desert wastes, that characterized my cranium. When at last she had charted us to her own satisfaction she packed us all off to O. S. Fowler, down at Boston, and had our cranial coasts recharted for purposes of comparison, verification or further exploration.

This done she began to pair us off, bump against hollow excess against hollow, until she had us dove-tailed into each other with all the nicety of workmanship of three inland oriental jewel cases among our parlor bric-a-brac. This involved one or two disparities of age and incompatibilities of desire, but we submitted with what grace we could and, as we dually scored at the matrimonial starting point, we trotted off in double harness with the blessings of the united families ringing in our ears and deluges of rice pouring off our devoted persons. I have wondered a thousand times since what we were all thinking of that we submitted so tamely, but then we had been brought up to the idea from childhood and the Whipple fortune did not seem too large when divided into more than three parts.

Well, the result wasn't real fortunate. During the ten years intervening between the first marriage and the last divorce in that family Aunt Susanne had, in those three families, more trouble and fewer satisfactory results from breeding than in her ever increasing stock farm a thousand times over. We simply could not get on together. Being lanky and angular, with a tendency toward intellectuality, she mated me with a stupid little roly-poly who hadn't a thought once a fortnight, except for my cousin Joe, who was as good a farmer as ever brushed dew from the sod, but who farmed his father's farm just as his father had farmed it and, when our first born got old enough to develop his physical faculties, my wife's mental, even Aunt Susanne threw up her hands and confessed that, so far as we were concerned, the experiment was positively unsatisfactory. Marriage in our case was a failure and for us to have any more children would be a sin.

Meantime Uncle had died and left all to Aunt, and the decade of brooding over her distracted words and their woes had about used her up, too. Nellie always had liked my cousin Joe and Joe had liked her and I could not help seeing what cozy times they had together when I was not much in evidence. As for Milton, he liked Joe's wife first rate and found business over there as often as Joe had occasion to come over to see us. Aunt tried her best to herd them apart, but there weren't three sexes high enough in the neighborhood, but we were all God-fearing people and so had the best we could. As for Mitt's wife and myself, well, we saw the light first of any. We cared nothing for each other nor for our respective helpmates, so we could take things over in reason and without prejudice.

By and by we went to Aunt and demanded an accounting. We made it plain to her that we had not been disobedient and neither had any of the rest, but the scheme had not worked out and we could promise nothing but scandal and disaster for its further continuance. I was practicing law in Boston and getting on some, going in and out daily, but my wife, in the down-stairs bedroom, was nightly crying her eyes out for the stinks of Joe Lamprey's barnyard and milk house, while I lunked in the back bedroom at the top of the house, still in mourning. Mitt's wife had no children to keep her at home and so she went to Europe and gadded about our own country to the extent of the allowance Aunt Susanne provided her, as uneasy as the wandering Jew.

Well, it had to end sometime, naturally, and it did. Aunt fell ill, reflecting upon the little fenced-off corner in the pasture where slept Uncle Joshua, she fancied that her sleep would be troubled unless our several houses were put in order before she dozed off into eternity. So she called all her herbed-side and had it out with us then and there.

She began by upbraiding us for cherishing notions and preferences that no people in the world except our own American people allowed to have full sway in choosing life partners. She had only been trying to do what all the rest of the world did—use a little common sense in mating instead of leaving it all to emotion and inclination, albeit with a loyal regard to the welfare of posterity rather than to mere financial or social advantage, as with mankind generally. Her perverse indulgence of inclination and sentimentality we had done much to bring her experiment to naught.

But that wasn't the worst of it. We were a sorry lot to breed from anyhow unless she could have selected mates for us from outside the two families, but family pressure, and the wishes of Uncle Joshua, had limited our choices disastrously. Anyhow there was only one thing to do and that was to discontinue the experiment then and there and wash her hands of what might follow after. She abominated divorce, she declared, and believed that to put asunder what God had joined together was a sin, but where joining together had been done by herself, on her own volition, she did not entertain any scruples.

"Joe Lamprey," said she, "there are just as good dairy farms out West as you could get here. Go out where divorces can be had at the cheapest on shortest delivery, find the farm you want and send me your bill. Nell will join you as soon as she can get a divorce from Ward. Meantime she can stay with me. Milton, you stay in the kind of help I need, look out for Josephine until Joe gets his decree and then you two can get married and carry on the breeding farm after I am gone, and I'll fix it that way in my will tomorrow. Now, Elizabeth, you haven't been at home enough to know that you've had any home and you take Ward to Southern Europe and nurse him back to health. With things going on as they have been he won't last a year and he's got to have a change of climate anyhow. You look near enough alike to be brother and sister, even if you ain't any blood relation, and you can travel as such. It's more'n likely Ward'll fetch up in California and Nell can get a divorce on the ground of desertion and failure to support. Now send the last one of you, Elizabeth, you'll find a good man somewhere after Milton has set you free and I'll do the right thing by all of you in my will."

Well, in two days Elizabeth and I were on the Atlantic making for Southern Europe, for the weather was getting raw and my cough was growing worse. She was a good sister to me and the year we spent abroad was a joy to both of us. The courts acted with expedition and within a year and a half we were all free from our matrimonial bonds and within another half year we were all paired off again, after our hearts' desires. In knocking about California Elizabeth and I came here. We both liked the place. We hadn't cared for each other any more than any two friends until that year in Europe. Nothing was said about any different state of mind until one evening we were standing on the beach at Santa Barbara watching the moon rise out of the water, as it does there sometimes, you know, for the coast line runs east and west for the better part of a hundred miles and sun and moon both can sometimes be seen rising out of the Pacific.

It looked pretty. There was a golden path about a yard wide across the water reaching from our feet straight to the moon and it looked inviting. "Elizabeth," said I, "ain't you about tired of this brother and sister business? I am."

"Well, rather," she admitted.

"Elizabeth," I went on pretty soon, "I did not love you back there when the others all got tangled up and were taking on so about their matrimonial infelicities. I didn't love anybody or anything. I was just too miserably unhappy with the whole domestic snarl and about what people were either suspecting or saying, so when my health broke down, I did not care two cents whether I lived or died. It is different now. I am myself again and I am free, as you are, and now that you ain't Milton's wife any more I am going to ask you to be mine. Will you?"

"You bet I will," she said. "I believe I have loved you ever since your sick face looked out at me from among the shawls on the steamer's deck the day after we left Boston and I'll follow that path with you to the moon or any where it leads."

We lived happily ever after. The funny part of it was that, a year later, when Aunt Susanne's will was probated, bearing the date of the day we sailed, Elizabeth's share and mine were bequeathed to us as an undivided interest. Aunt had foreseen our marriage before either of us had thought of it.

Poor old Aunt Susanne! She loved her husband and her children, her sisters and brothers, nephews and nieces. She loved her chickens, her pigs, sheep, cattle and horses and she loved her God, but best of all she loved to have her own way. I wanted to inscribe that sentiment upon her tombstone in some appropriate way, but the rest would not let me.

Automobile Notes.

"While I expect to see a healthy and steady growth in demand for the high-priced cars, the automobile industry finds its greatest promise of permanency in the moderate priced car," says Chester N. Weaver, manager of the local branch of the Studebaker Brothers' Company of California. "For not even when optimism was an established condition before the automobile was generally accepted seriously could have dreamed four years ago that there could develop the tremendous demand that now exists for cars selling from $1,000 to $1,500. This demand, increasing as it has from year to year, always keeping ahead of the supply, now amounts to 50,000 cars per year—the United States will actually absorb that number of cars of the family touring and roadster types in the next six months. I base these figures upon the tremendous orders we have received for our Studebaker E-M-F "30" car. The large number of sales we have made recently of models "A" and "B" Studebaker-Garford cars is also a good indication of a growing popularity for the high-priced machines."

WE'LL BE HAPPY.

We'll be happy on the hilltop, we'll be happy on the plain.

In spite of all the weather—let it shine, or let it rain!

There'll be roses sweet a-plenty—just a drip-pin' with the dew.

An' the angels from the hilltops will just wave their hands to you!

We'll be happy in the beauty an' the blessin' of the spring.

Where all the sweetest blossoms tempt the mockin' birds to sing;

An' there'll be the best o' blossoms for each lover on the bough,

An' we've come to the conclusion we'll be happy anyhow!

THE GRAFT CASES.

It was when the prosecution of the bribing "higher-ups" first was understood to be imminent, and after it was realized that it would be proved that $200,000 was paid to the former supervisors to secure their votes for the overhead-trolley franchise—it was just at this time, when the books of the United Railroads showing cash payments made would have been most useful to the prosecution, that George Starr, treasurer of the United Railroads, concluded to go East, and went, bearing with him the accounts of the company's receipts and disbursements.

To be sure, Mr. Starr's action may have been deeply regretted by the other officers of the United Railroads, and it is because of this possibility that certain testimony given by Thornwell Mullally, assistant to Patrick Calhoun, becomes important. Mullally swore that Starr is in New York, as he has been for two years, for the United Railroads, and that he (Mullally) had seen him in the office of Patrick Calhoun in that city. Whence it would appear that if the defense in the trial of Calhoun deprecates the departure of Starr with the accounts showing how that $200,000 was paid, its depreciation is not of the radically active variety.

Mr. Rudolph Spreckels has been on the stand as a witness during much of the present week, and, as Assistant District Attorney Heney announced, "the bars have been let down" for the defense to show the alleged conspiracy to overthrow the United Railroads. But, although the bars have been down and the prosecution has given the defense widest latitude in cross-examination, nothing remotely resembling the alleged conspiracy has been demonstrated to have existed. What has been shown is that Mr. Spreckels has paid Mr. Heney's office expenses, amounting to $500 or $600 a month, and nothing more, and further, that after Mr. Calhoun had expressed his determination to have an overhead trolley, the matter of forming a rival company to secure a conduit system for the city was under discussion. The most striking feature of Mr. Spreckels' appearance on the stand was his evident desire that everything be made clear and that nothing remain hidden.

A sensation which may grow into still greater dimensions after The California Weekly goes to press was precipitated by the appearance of John Helms on the stand. Helms was chief of the United Railroads' detective bureau from May 3, 1907, till August 31, 1908, a period of nearly sixteen months. He testified that during this time he purchased documents belonging to Detective Burns of the prosecution from E. A. Platt, Burns' secretary; that these documents were purchased at the instance of William M. Abbott, attorney for the United Railroads, who furnished the money—$200 a month—paid Platt for his services, and that while his negotiations generally were with Abbott, occasionally they were with Calhoun personally. As this writing Helms still is on the stand, and it is not improbable that further revelations will be made by him.

The injunction proceeding to prevent the payment of public money to Detective Burns and his aids was argued before Judge Sullivan this week, and it is probable that his decision will be rendered either to-day or to-morrow.

Judge Dunne announced last Saturday that as soon as his calendar would permit the trial of Theodore V. Halsey, of the Pacific States Telephone company, who is charged with bribery, would begin. It is understood that Halsey still is very ill, and whether the condition of his health will permit his trial to proceed perhaps is doubtful.

Although the case of George D. Collins is not of the graft variety, it has so long been in the public mind as a fair instance of "the law's delay" that it is of interest to note that the Supreme Court of the United States has just decided that he must serve a fourteen-year term in San Quentin under a sentence imposed in March, 1906. Although more than three years have elapsed since that date, Collins has postponed his punishment by means known to the legal fraternity, and it is not certain that he is at the end of his resources yet, at any rate, he contends that he is not. If he is, he probably will go to prison within the next two or three months; if he is not, no man may rightly foresee when he will go.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Battle-Ground of the Republic.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states, respectively, or to the people.

So reads the tenth amendment to the national constitution. Its incorporation in the document served little more than to state the substance of a never-ending national controversy. There would have been the same controversy if this amendment had been neither submitted nor adopted, but the people might not have seen quite so clearly what it was that they were fighting about.

For it was inevitable, in a government where powers were divided between nation, state and people, that there should be uncertainty and disagreement as to where the powers and duties of one of the parties ended and one or both of the others began. It has been an irrepressible conflict.

It will not be the purpose of this article to settle this conflict. If it were settled it would not stay settled twenty-four hours. Scarcely a bill can be introduced in Congress without raising the issue anew and nearly every legislative act must be scrutinized to see if it encroach upon national authority. So long as the great republic exists this will be so and when men say "states' rights is a dead issue," they may be told that that issue will be much alive when their grandchildren shall have been tucked away in their narrow cots under the daisies by their side.

It may shed some light upon the subject of the tenth amendment to note that three parties to our government are recognized, the nation, the state and the people, and the greatest of these is the people. In them rests the reservoir of all political power and neither nation nor state has any power not delegated to it by the people.

This does not say that either nation or state must patiently wait until Farmer Smith tells them to shed, that it has his permission, or that nation and states must wait until all the farmers, laborers, merchants and bankers have formally spoken. The will of the people is the voice of the effective, not the numerical, majority and more than once Mr. W. F. Herrin and his political bureau have constituted the effective majority in California, as other great political managers have in other states, as the Standard Oil company has to a great extent in affairs national. Nevertheless it is still true that the reservoir of all power does rest in the commonality of nation and state. If Mr. Herrin governs California it must be in the name of the people of California by virtue of a power usurped from them and which they may take to themselves again whenever they see fit to do so.

It will be seen from this amendment that the nation gets its certificate of power in two ways, first, by an affirmative delegation of power from the people to the nation and, second, by a prohibition of power to the states. Examples of the first are found in the provisions governing revenue taxation, army and navy, counterfeiting, patents and copyrights. Examples of the second are found in denying to states the right to make treaties with foreign countries, to coin money, or make anything but gold and silver a legal tender, which denial affirms the power of the national government to attend to these things.

Likewise the states derive their powers affirmatively and by denying to the national government the exercise of certain powers reserved by that denial to the states. Back of all these powers so delegated rests with the people the power to enlarge or take from the powers of either nation or state as they see fit, or to obliterate both national and state governments, and set up something else in their stead, if they see fit to do that.

It is unfortunate that the citizen does not feel to the full the sense of being such a reservoir of political power. If he were to have a realization of the truth it is more than likely that the body politic would be less affected by unauthorized usurpations of popular power by political bureaus and the paid servants of great corporations. Love of power is the supreme love of the human heart and the prevailing apathy of citizenship in this country, the source of nearly all our civic ills, comes from a want of realization on the part of the citizen of the power that really rests in his keeping. As the horse, if he knew his power, would permit no man to ride him, so the American citizen, if he knew his power, would permit no greedy corporation to ride him.

Without attempting to fix the bounds of either national or state rights it will be true to say that the tendency of the hundred and twenty years of government under the constitution has been to enlarge the powers of the national government if not possibly to limit the powers of the states. This has come about, not through any doctrine or dogmatic expounding of the constitution, but rather through the increase of necessity for a more centralized and puissant national authority. This growing necessity has come of a growing national spirit. We are now Americans before we are Californians, Carolinians or Ohioans, and we have been enabled to become such through the building of railroads, telegraphs and the distribution of newspapers and periodicals. The developers of transportation have been the true nation-builders. We may at once recognize and honor the obligation without blinding ourselves to the fact that this consummation was farthest from the minds of these builders. Their purpose was to make money and, that they might make it, they seldom hesitated to try to rob both nation and state. They builded better than they knew or cared. If they had not America would be a miscellany of jealous if not warring colonies to this day.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

May Now Be Tested in Your Own Home.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Fighting Mad.

In offering to break the head and smash the nose of a citizen who presumes to investigate its actions the San Francisco Board of Public Works raises the injurious suspicion that its position may be more delicate than has been supposed. Injured innocence suffereth long and is kind, but a detected rascality may be relied on to display great indignation and belligerency of temper. Let it be understood once for all that there is no office, and no official, whose public acts are not legitimate objects of public scrutiny and that any citizen has a right, upon his own initiative or with the co-operation of an association of individuals, to have access to the bottom facts. When these facts are fully disclosed the public itself must sit as judge. In giving way to passion the members of the Board of Works have blundered.

The Burns Salary.

The sympathizers with the grafters are hard to please. They are indignant that any man of wealth should finance the prosecution of their kind of people, and they are outraged that the public treasury should bear any share of the burden of an effective prosecution. To their mind the proper thing would be for all existing assistants to the prosecutor to be summarily dismissed and have them replaced by professional job chasers in the employ of the paid agents of the Southern Pacific's political bureau. Nothing suits us so well as the thing we have become accustomed to through immemorial usage. Anything else seems like revolution. Judge Sturtevant's decision is to be viewed with public satisfaction.

Another Instance of "Atmosphere."

There is small reason for astonishment that Secretary Turner of the Grand Lodge N. S. G. W. should have stolen moneys intrusted to his care. In a community where very many representatives of large interests openly sympathize with grafters and look forward with hopefulness to the time when the machinery of the law will demonstrate its incapacity for dealing with successful rascality, there is certain to be much rascality not so successful. The wonder is that one caught in the act should be so timorous of consequences as Turner seems to be and that one so charged should feel any delicacy as to his social position in a city where to be under indictment for the commission of crime has been held, in certain circles, to constitute a claim upon social recognition. It is written into the constitution of man that the faults and foibles of the social elite will be imitated all the way down through society to the very dregs, and there those faults and foibles will be remodeled in mud, that all men may see the true character of the ideals they have held. There never yet was a clean reservoir that maintained a putrid source of supply.

the thing that was needful in order to retain his services. He is worth it, just how or why no one exactly knows, but he is. He comes little into contact with students, but they all feel that "Prexie knows how to run a university." He is a sort of mysterious absence whose presence is felt rather than seen. The student body believes in him as it believes in a Providence that doeth all things well, but is seldom caught at doing any particular thing at all. He is capable of holding in his hands great power without using it, the holding being sufficient without the use. He is a diplomat and handles his board of regents with the same facility that he does the student body and without their knowing it either. He is worth the price. Keep him.

Portola.

It is all right for a city that has been striving for three and-a-half years, as few other cities have striven, to take a few days off for a good time and to invite everybody in from the country to help rejoice because that which was dead is alive again and that which was buried to a crop has been restored. The Portola incident will make as good a peg to hang the jubilee on as anything, but the important thing is the jubilation itself. It will cost much in effort and money, but it will be worth its cost if it lightens the heart's burden and demonstrates that the resurrection of San Francisco is a fact.

Better Times Coming.

If the starting up of manufactories and the restoration of wages, together with the resumption of importations from foreign countries, are to be accepted as indications of returning prosperity the "wave" ought soon to engulf us. There are few idle mills in the country that were busy two years ago and the volume of imports from over seas, cut to the merest necessities after the panic of October, 1907, is now so great as to cut our monthly balance of trade almost to a pittance. Yet a few weeks and Senator Aldrich country have opened wide the pockets of the people to the plunderings of associated extortioners, and if that does not make us all prosperous what can? And there is no doubting the fact that any tariff will be better than uncertainty about what the tariff is to be

The Playground Movement.

All over the country the public conscience is awakening to the truth that every child has a natural right to develop its latent faculties through play. It has this right in common with every one of God's creatures above the status of the jellyfish and that it may enjoy that right playgrounds must be supplied where they do not exist. Recently sixteen Massachusetts towns of 10,000 inhabitants or over took referendum votes on whether or not they would acquire, equip and maintain public playgrounds for the children. Every one of them voted for playgrounds. Of twenty-six incorporated cities in the same state voting on the subject twenty-four voted favorably with a total vote of 135,852 for and 28,600 against. In Cambridge the favorable vote was almost twelve to one. In San Francisco June 22d is to be children's day. On that day the men of San Francisco are to determine whether or not they will invest $160,000 in a detention home, $1,265,000 in convenient lesser parks for big and little, but preeminently for the children, and $500,000 for playgrounds. For no better purposes in all the world may any city use its credit. But there must be something besides grounds in which children may play. Playgrounds must be supervised in the interest of clean sport and wholesome recreation. No department of education is more important than this. May the vote be twelve to one for. No California city can safely permit a Massachusetts town to be more liberal than itself in that which has so many justifications in mind and heart as the playground idea.

The Supply of Gold.

In vain may we look for a substantial reduction in the cost of living, whatever the tariff tinkers do with the schedule of duties, so long as the world's supply of our yellow measure of values goes on increasing at such a rate. There is 75 per cent. more gold in use to-day than there was ten years ago and the world's supply has increased one-third during that time. The more of the measure there is the cheaper that measure must become and the dearer are commodities as expressed by that measure. This is beyond the power of organized society either to help or to hinder, and yet gold, unstable though it is, is the best and stables measure of value the world knows anything about. But when increase of gold supply and increase of tariffs join in boosting the cost of living there is small likelihood of its coming down.

The San Francisco Bar Association might properly consider whether or not facility in procuring false affidavits to be used in criminal proceedings should rate as a special qualification for being permitted to practice in the courts of this state.

TYRANNY ITS OWN REMEDY.

The issues raised between the transcontinental railroads and the Pacific Coast cities should be met with calmness, sound judgment and power. How much of this new rate-making is bona fide, and how much of it is a mere swinging of a club over the heads of commercial interests that had so far forgotten to be continuously cowardly as to dare to say that their souls are their own, must be left to conjecture. So far as dealers themselves are concerned they deserve little sympathy. Immemorably they have submitted to tyranny lest a worse thing come upon them and have neither dared to be free themselves nor to strive to make their cities and their state free. They have truckled.

But the welfare of the cities of the Pacific Coast is important, important to every community, industry and individual on the Pacific Coast, and if tyranny has at last undertaken to so press home its advantages as to arouse in the breasts of trucklers a determination to be free freedom will be achieved, not in one department of human affairs alone but in all departments. That is, commerce cannot be emancipated and politics be left chained to the chariots of Harriman, Hill and the Morgan interests. Men of business cannot accept a political dictatorship at the hands of Herrin in this state and in the principal cities of the state, and preserve their commercial and industrial freedom, and no man who is struggling for anything less than complete liberty and a plenary public control of public utilities is worthy of the aid of any ally. Tyranny affords its own most certain remedy and whenever the limit of endurance has been definitely passed the remedy will be applied, and not until then. The California Weekly ventures the hope that the present controversy will make the issue so clear that no being above the status of the jellyfish will be too cowardly to enlist on the side of commercial, industrial, political and judicial emancipation from the tyrannous control of a group of corporate usurpers who have aimed at nothing short of autocratic government of the people themselves and of all of their political and commercial activities.

Out of this controversy, too, there may be evolved a rational principle of rate-making. No such principle has yet been evolved. Rates have been made solely in the interests of the carrier. There is a public interest that transcends the interest of the carrier, in principle if not in practice. Somewhere betwixt the one interest and the other should be found some ground of common interest. In other words, there must be some point where Justice can plant her feet and stand unmoved by either contestant. Let us seek that vantage ground.

But let us of the Pacific Coast, in seeking to defend our rights, undertake to inflict no wrongs upon the great inter-mountain interior. Any such attempt will react upon ourselves for, in the final analysis, this issue will be decided by the nation. Don't let a narrow provincialism, a belief that we cannot thrive except as some others suffer, prompt us to undertake to fortify ourselves in an untenable position. The policy of the railroads toward the interior has been one of extortion. We cannot of right demand that such a policy be continued in order that we may enjoy a "couch" on the jolting trade. It must suffice that Pacific Coast cities be given a fair field with no favors.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE JURY.

Of the addresses delivered at the recent meeting of the San Francisco Bar Association that of Chief Justice W. M. Beatty, on the "Constitution of the Jury," was perhaps the most significant. Inasmuch as the learned justice has not in many years been brought into actual contact with the empanelling of a jury he was able to approach the subject with entire impartiality and to shed upon it the effulgent rays of contemporary judicial learning.

It was characteristic of our present-day judicial atmosphere that he should advocate the obligation resting upon all citizens to do jury duty, irrespective of race, color, occupation, profession or previous condition of servitude—unless able to pay for immunity. To the man of money all duties are held to be voidable, all obligations susceptible of being compounded. If the rich man can better afford to pay fifty dollars than serve as a juror, or perjure himself on his voirdire examination, he can pass the duty along to his poorer brother who must serve days, weeks or months, as the case may be, for want of the fifty dollars with which to buy exemption. The rich man may, according to this philosophy, hire his substitute in peace or in war as, in olden time, he hired a pugilist to represent him in wager of physical battle while a learned representative of the bench held the scales of justice and determined the issue. The Honorable Justice clinched his argument with the assertion that the system he proposes "works well in Nevada." There is no place outside of Hades where exemptions and inequalities on account of financial condition work better than in Nevada.

Great abuses have been committed in summoning jurors, the more especially where political bureaus have so manipulated the selection of sheriffs and their deputies as to bring them to the aid of retainers caught in the toils. It might be better to have all jurors summoned by elisors selected by trial courts, especially after the nomination and election of trial and other judges shall have been eliminated from partisan politics, but, at the worst, this cause of the miscarriage of justice is to the main maladies as whooping cough to cancer, as ringworm to the great white plague.

Where the constitution of juries falls in the examinations of veniremen. Here the trial court has been so stripped of needful judicial authority by adverse legislation, and it works in such terror of committing error that will be held reversible by an over-learned appellate court, out of touch with conditions as they are and unconfounded by prospective jurors and the attorneys of record, that society is well-nigh hopeless of obtaining, in an important case, a jury that is either intelligent or impartial.

But we probably betray no secret when we inform the Chief Justice that, in public estimation, it is neither in the summoning of jurors nor in the process of empanelling the same that the greatest fear of a miscarriage of justice lies. Nor is it in want of accuracy and omission of our trial courts, regarding which deficiencies the Chief Justice is known to evince strong convictions. The surest defense and safest refuge of a prosecuted scoundrelism is believed to be in the appellate courts of our country where profundity takes precedence over perspicacity and a slavish following of an unprofitable ceremonialism brings the spirit of the law to naught and makes of the law's administration, in crucial cases, a miserable travesty.

It is right that no citizen should be privileged to escape his turn at jury duty, but it is not right that any citizen, merely because of his financial ability, should be permitted to purchase immunity from that service. If Chief Justice Beatty doubts the correctness of our estimate of public opinion as to the real source of miscarriage of justice in celebrated cases let him obtain the services of some reliable person to go up one side of any street and down the other and propound to each passer this question: "In the event of the conviction of Patrick Calhoun by the jury before whom he is now being tried what, in your opinion, will the appellate courts do in his case?" If nine out of every ten does not reply, "Why, turn him loose, of course," or words to that effect, then we miss our guess and are not competent to testify as to the status of public sentiment.

THE BAR ASSOCIATION.

It is encouraging to know that the Bar Association of San Francisco is awakening to the gravity of conditions confronting the administration of the law in this city and state. It is gratifying to be informed that this association is proposing to invite the co-operation of similar associations throughout the state to sit with it for the consideration of such practices and procedures as the prompt and equal administration of the law require.

But it is improbable that the laws and procedures will ever be adequately reformed through the good offices of any bar association. It was never given to any specialized institution to adapt itself to progressive requirements unaided by the pressure of a dissatisfied and insistent commonality. Left to itself the ministry evolves a narrow and bigoted theology which drives men from the church and leaves preachers to pour forth their eloquence upon pansy beds of millinery. Left to themselves our pedagogues pursue a narrow scholasticism or chase rainbow fads that cause private schools, supplying real needs, to spring up and thrive in every considerable community. The press, in any land under the sun, will be only as decent as it must be in order to hold a sustaining constituency. It may well be that whatever reforms in our system of administering justice are inaugurated will have to be whipped into shape by lawyers, but what shall constitute such reforms must be determined by public opinion and that opinion must be insistent and uncompromising.

A main fault with our laws and their administration has been that lawyer-legislators have said to their associates in legislative halls, "Leave these matters to us. We know about them, you do not," whereas they have not known about them and leaving such subjects to their disposal has been fraught with disaster. Learning is well. The world would not be able to get on without it, but learning unmodified by the saving grace of common sense (developed only in the hurly-burly of every-day living) makes men as mad as March hares.

If this paper may venture to suggest the character of reforms imperatively needed in our system of administering justice they should be about as follows:

Such a reformation of the rules governing the examination of prospective jurors on their voirdire as will keep out the panel, and not exclude from it, veniremen best fitted to sit thereon.

The restoration of trial courts to the position of power and authority they enjoyed before vanquished attorneys forced the establishment of courts of appeal that they might be given a chance to win lost cases and dig deeper into the pockets of their clients.

The limitation of the power of a court of appeal to reverse a decision of a lower court to instances wherein, had a contrary ruling been made, a contrary verdict must have been rendered.

In accomplishing such reforms the good offices of the bar association of California may prove of great advantage, but it will occasion no surprise if such reforms have to be enforced in spite of, rather than with, such associations. Gentlemen of the bar are much wedded to their idols.

Finally, no possible reformations of practices and procedures will be of permanent avail until the people are able to select their judicial timber out of the whole assortment with a free choice. Until the power to select judges has been taken out of the hands of political bureaus and restored to the people we shall continue to have, what we long have had, a failure of justice whenever the offending citizen is able to bear the cost of it or one of our modern feudal lords sees fit to take him under his protection.

Right Worthy of Contempt.

One Fred Warner was once a member of the St. Louis House of Delegates. He was convicted of bribery and sentenced to two years in prison. His conviction has been set aside by the Missouri Supreme Bench of Assinuity for the reason that the indictment alleged that his offense was committed "against the dignity of state," instead of "against the dignity of the state." Our information does not go to the extent of determining whether or not the said Fred Warner is a millionaire or only under the protection of a plunderbund of millionaires who conduct a political bureau for the making of judges that remember at the crucial moment who it was that made them judges. If such a court be not right worthy of contempt, then for what manner of court may a hearty contempt be justified? The sooner the public mind is disabused of the fallacy that there is some divinity that hedges a judge about with a halo of sanctity the sooner will our courts be made worthy of confidence. Being elected judge is not like being born again. It does no work of regeneration. A political thimble-rigger before going upon the bench will be a political thimble-rigger after going upon the bench and will inevitably find enough difference between twaddled and twaddled men to serve the purpose of the judge who devoted him to the bench. These are hard things to say, but they are as true as hard, and appellate courts of the country are demonstrating that truth almost daily before the faces of all the people.

The Republican Set Right.

It is regrettable that a paper of such far-reaching influence as the Springfield (Mass.) Republican should have been betrayed into substantial error regarding the relation of Mr. Heney to the Calhoun case. Mr. Heney has not received one dollar, personally, from Mr. Rudolph Spreckels or any other source, in compensation for his three years' services in conducting the graft prosecutions, though Mr. Spreckels very generously has contributed between $500 and $600 per month for defraying the expenses of Mr. Heney in maintaining an office and associates and assistants therein, without whose aid he could not have conducted these prosecutions. "Big Jim" Gallagher is not dead, despite efforts made to kill him, and he did testify that Abe Ruef gave him the money which he distributed to the members of the Board of Supervisors for the passing of the trolley franchise. The tracing of the bribe money from Ruef to the supervisors is direct and conclusive. The tracing of it from Calhoun to Ruef is indirect—positively circuitous—but it got there just the same, although the evidence that it got there is circumstantial. The refusal of witnesses to testify lest they incriminate themselves, the spiriting away of witnesses who do know the truth with the books that have the truth written in them, the refusal of the defendant to go upon the stand and clear the whole matter up, as he could do in five minutes, and would do if innocent, together with the rules of a legal game that work always in the interests of successful criminality, conspire to make Mr. Heney's task difficult, but whatever the jury may do in the premises public opinion, if correctly informed, will never entertain a doubt as to the defendant's guilt.

The British Budget.

While Emperor Aldrich is heaping the burden of maintaining the most costly government on earth upon the backs and stomachs of ultimate consumers, because they are many and unorganized and are not regarded by him and his associates as important national assets, Mr. Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, is bringing forward a form of taxation that puts the burden where it of right ought to go—upon those best able to bear it. The British workman, who abstains from tobacco and liquors, will pay nothing for the support of government except on the home he owns or rents, whereas fully one-third of the burden of government will fall upon incomes, inheritances and progressively, as such incomes and inheritances grow larger. This budget goes one step farther still and takes for the public benefit one-fifth of the advance in value of unoccupied lands. In short, the rich, who wanted more Dreadnoughts, are to pay for them. We have learned many things from Mother England and, while her free trade policy fits her needs better than it would fit ours, we may study some aspects of the British method of distributing taxation with infinite advantage to our burden-bearers and a substantial gain in justice.

The Geary Street Proposition.

The discussion of the theory of municipal ownership, with reference to the proposal to vote bonds in the sum of $1,950,000 for the municipal reconstruction and ownership of the Geary street railroad, will prove of little value either way. There are issues that have to be decided on their merits, with small reference to academic theories, and these are of them. San Francisco is in the clutches of a great, greedy, malevolent, criminally disposed street railroad combination. It has franchises with a generation to run. Any opposition corporation would be likely to fall into its grasp. The city is the only possible competitor that can be counted on to be a competitor. A competitor is needed that will set a standard of efficiency. It is the deliberate policy of the company to make excess of profits by inflicting hardship upon the public that must use its cars or go on foot. The strap-hangers furnish the profits that float the watered stocks. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts San Francisco. It owes nothing to the United Railroads. It owes everything to its own citizens. As a whip to lay over the shoulders of the United Railroads a municipalized Geary street system will be worth its cost and it may grow to be a long lash rather than a short one. It may demonstrate the ability of the city to own and operate public utilities. It may demonstrate the contrary. Either demonstration will be worth its cost. There is no good way out of the woods except to vote those bonds.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Is "Honesty the Best Policy?" Let us not sidestep the issue, but face it squarely. Let us not draw upon our imaginations for our evidence, but upon our experience.

The old maxim does not, as many suppose, come to us from holy writ, from Shakespeare, from Benjamin Franklin, but from Miguel Cervantes-Saavedra who lived and died, fought, toiled, spent years in prison, in slavery to the Moors, in office, in litigation and in poverty. He had seen life and he knew what honesty cost, how rascality prospered. He saw honesty as little practiced as anywhere on earth at a time when villainy was so universal as to be regarded as a joke, and yet he left a maxim that has seen three hundred years of service and still is as fresh as ever.

But let us not seek to "fool" the rising generation with it. If it be not true let us say so. Let us vindicate it only if we honestly may, for honesty is the best policy in teaching morality if nowhere else.

If we apply the maxim to passing bogus checks we are warranted in affirming it true. So also if we apply it to till-tapping, to "knocking down" behind the counter, in order to get money with which to play the races. It may be applied to every form of "peanut" larceny that ever was invented with absolute certainty that time will prove its truth.

But what of the honest daily paper that enters into competition with the paper that makes merchandise of its news columns, that sells its editorial opinions at so much per line? What of the honest lawyer who goes into a case against its circulator and forbes to the jury against him if he can, who will suborn perjury through some stool-pigeon intermediary and spirit honest witnesses and documents out of the jurisdiction of the court? What of the weekly paper that tells its patrons the truth about its circulation and forbears to extort patronage as the price of immunity from blackmail? What of the writer who tells the world the things that he believes it ought to know instead of pampering a depraved taste and reducing intellectual delight to mental dissipation? What of the merchant who charges only such a profit as his service to his patrons is reasonably worth and has one price for all customers, whether influential or the humblest of clod-hoppers? Is there a sane person who does not know that strict integrity, in all avenues of life, is a handicap?

What of the grand prizes in the commercial, industrial and financial world? Are the drawers of these models of probity? Have the Rockefellers, Morgans, Harrimans, Goulds, made their millions upon millions by practicing the policy of the square deal, the giving of a full square foot of measure for every foot down, for every dollar received? What of the Pattens in the wheat pit, the Lawsons on change, the Heinzes in mining deals, the Fricks and Carnegies in steel? That there are honest men who have succeeded with no fair minded person will deny, but what of those who have taken the grand financial prizes?

Why, it was the knowledge that honesty is a handicap, that greed, cunning and merciless extortion are profitable, that justice and mercy are factors in expense, that forced upon mankind the conviction that, if God be just, there must be a tutelage in order that the righteous may be compensated and that scoundrelism may receive that retribution so clearly its due. It is only when we think of the standing among reputable men which a reputable character affords, when we think that somewhere, sometime, we must stand naked, alone in a presence from whose all-seeing eye nothing can be hidden—stand where Henry H. Rogers was last week called to stand—that we know in our hearts that "Honesty is the best policy," best policy not in regard to cost, to the sacrifice it may compel, the poverty it may require us to endure. Cervantes was right, Honesty is the best policy and somewhere, sometime, not one human soul will doubt it.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How France Determines Incomes.

France is about to tax the incomes of foreign residents, and it has a method of determining the amount of those incomes which probably is more simple than accurate. It is wholly determined by the amount of rent a resident pays. This having been ascertained, it is multiplied by seven, and the product is the resident's income, in the eyes of the law, for purposes of taxation. For example, if the rent would be equal to twenty American dollars monthly, he must pay taxes on an income of $140; $280 on $40 rent, $350 on $50, and so on. The tax is graduated, an income of $1,000 per annum being exempt, and, after that, the tax running as follows: 1 per cent. on the second thousand dollars, 2 per cent. on the third, 3 per cent. on the fourth, 4 per cent. on the fifth, and 5 per cent. on all incomes beyond the $5,000 mark—always estimating the income by the rent paid. This bill now has passed the Chamber of Deputies, and it is not doubted that the Senate also will pass it, although it is believed that such passage will be delayed so long that the law will not take effect until the beginning of 1911.

Nebuchadnezzar May Be Outclassed.

In these days of progress and improvement the ghost of grass-eating Nebuchadnezzar will might be made uneasy by a report which comes from Omaha, in a commonwealth of which the rattled Assyrian monarch knew not. Among the features of student life in Creighton university, in that city, is an "Alfalfa Hay Club," the members of which entitle themselves to membership by browsing on alfalfa, after it is prepared to suit their taste. The plant is prepared by converting it into a meal, the stalks first being carefully selected, then ground fine, bolted and bleached. It then is ready to be eaten, and the members of the club say that in gums, muffins and that sort of thing, it is hard to beat, either for taste or nutrition. It makes up well, too—still according to same authorities—in everyday bread, being darker than wheat but lighter than rye, and as such it has the breakfast foods distanced at the post. So it begins to appear possible that Nebuchadnezzar was not insane, but was one of those geniuses who are too far ahead of their time to be appreciated; and, according to the best account, his was the advantage in that he did not require so many preliminaries to his grass-eating operation.

Bill to Qualify Catholics.

It is not considered probable that the bill removing political disqualifications from Roman Catholics will become a law at this session of parliament, but a note of cheer is found in the fact that the present House of Commons twice has voted in favor of Mr. Redmond's bill to remove this ancient disgrace from British statutes, the bill passing on its second reading by a vote of 133 to 123. The bill provides for abolishing the disqualification which prevents Catholics from filling the offices of lord chancellor of Great Britain and lord lieutenant of Ireland and repeals the anti-Catholic portion of the oath of accession. Of course the people who would have all mankind worship the Almighty as they have outlined him have been heard from, 400,000 of them having signed a protest against removing Catholic disabilities, but the House of Commons disregarded it, and it is believed that this act of justice will be done in the not distant future.

To Aid British Laborers.

Great Britain's problem of the unemployed, who are increasing both in numbers and destitution, is receiving so much attention that the government has deemed it necessary to take action in the matter. Its scheme was outlined in the House of Commons, the other day, by Winston Churchill. It consists of two measures: First, labor exchanges for the unemployed, and, second, state insurance against unemployment. The labor-exchange bill was introduced in the House of Commons last week. Under the terms of the bill, to be established throughout the country, each with an advisory committee representing employers and employed. It is estimated that its annual cost during the first ten years will be $1,000,000, and $850,000 annually thereafter. The insurance feature, to be introduced next year, provides for compulsory contributions from employers and employees and a state grant as well. Its benefits will be somewhat less than those paid by the stronger unions. The labor members of parliament generally favor the double scheme, merely criticizing some of its details.

Titles of Oriental Potentates.

What oriental potentates lack in worldwide power they perhaps make up to their own satisfaction in the rare glory of their titles. For instance, if the reader should wish to address a letter to the Sultan of Turkey the right thing to do would be to secure an extra large envelope and dash off the following: "Mohammed V. Sultan of Sultans, King of Kings, the Shadow of God Upon Earth, Bestower of Crowns Upon the Princes of the World, Emperor and Sovereign Lord of the White Sea and the Black Sea, of Rumelia and Anatolia, of Karamania, Roum, Kurdistan, Azerbidjan, Cham, Aleppo, Egypt, Mecca, Medina, Jerusalem the Holy of the countries of Arabia and the Yemen and, moreover, of an Infinity of Provinces Gloriously Acquired." Now you understand why it is considered bad form to address the sultan on a postal card. The Shah of Persia is the Shadow of God, the Footpath of Heaven, the Center of the Universe, Exalted Like the Planet Saturn, Well of Science, Sublime Sovereign Whose Standard is the Sun, and Monarch of Armies Numerous as the Stars. The King of Siam is "Brother of the Moon, Half Brother of the Sun, and Sovereign Arbitrator of the Flux and Reflux"—whatever the latter is. The striking feature of the matter is the smallness of potential size which suffices to carry a very dazzle of title.

Kaiser to Visit England.

Official announcement that Kaiser Wilhelm will visit King Edward in London this coming autumn is reported to have been issued. It is said that issues vital to Great Britain and Germany will be discussed by the two monarchs while they are together, and it is hoped that their display of social amenities will put an end to the war talk which has been so prevalent of late. At one time it was thought that Queen Wilhelmina of Holland would be a visitor in London next fall, but her trip has been given up, whether because of the appearance of an heirless to her throne or for some other reason, has not been announced.

Wooden Caterpillars as Souvenirs.

Among the remarkable souvenirs of our fleet's voyage around the world the wooden caterpillars of New Zealand are entitled to honorable mention. They are precisely what this name imports, wooden caterpillars, and they are not alive now they once were, although not so wooden at that time. The caterpillar, in its original state, feeds on a certain plant which is the habitat of a kind of fungus that feeds on the caterpillar, and so rapid is the consequent fungoid development in the caterpillar's interior department that the worm becomes but a fungus growth before it can lose its shape. The result is a wooden or fungous caterpillar which has gone out of active business at the old stand. Many of the sailors of our fleet have such souvenirs.

Gatherin' in the Sunshine.

Just a-gatherin' in the sunshine
In these smilin' days of spring,
When the robin has its babies
An' is teachin' them to sing;
When the blossoms seem like praises
That the world is hummin' o'er;
Just a-gatherin' in the sunshine—
An' I don't want nothin' more.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

MAKING FAME TO ORDER.

When a new writer swims into the ken of a modern publisher with a manuscript which the publisher deems worthy of print, one of the first people the writer meets is the publicity agent of the firm. The enterprising young man's business is to get authors' names into print, and the devious ways that he uses to do it have been the despair of many a modest writer. However, the modesty soon wears off, and the author ransacks his memory for "experiences," anecdotes, adventures, or jokes that will make good "copy" for the newspapers. These the publicity agent devours, turns them into "stories" and prints them on long sheets that go to the newspapermen all over the country to be used, without credit and without price, as newspaper fillers. Thus is the author's name made familiar and thus is the hope increased that readers may be attracted to buy his book.

Naturally, some authors make better subjects than others. Mark Twain, with his native wit, has become classic, so that his odd stories that float through the newspapers are credited to him, and the rest to Abe Lincoln. Joaquin Miller began writing before publicity agents were invented, and he successfully became his own publicity man by appearing in London drawing rooms in top boots, leather breeches and broad-brimmed sombrero.

But with authors of less native genius or distinction of personality, the publicity man has a problem that he solves for himself. He talks with his author, pumps him for quaint stories, sounds him for eccentric opinions on marriage, or love, or the theory of evolution or any other strange or unusual bent of mind. These oddities, once noted, are made into copy and duly appear in the papers, which are glad to print such material.

Some authors soon learn their cue and do strange "stunts" for the purpose of giving the publicity agent a chance. They adopt fantastic diets, live in trees, climb dangerous peaks, ride ostriches, or do other absurd or unusual things that can be written up. The latest favorite item that the publicity agent works up is the author's account of how he or she came to write this great novel, how a chance phrase in a newspaper story stuck in the mind and ripened into a plot, how the cook's peculiarities suggested the character of the heroine, and how an experience of childhood was wrought into the climax of the tale. Apparently there is no end to the public appetite for intimate details of an author's life and the workings of his mind, for the papers continue to print them by the yard, and presumably the papers print what will be read.

Some idea of the commercial value of such publicity may be gathered from the fact that Edison, the inventor, never refuses a newspaperman an interview, even if he has to do an important work to grant it. "You boys have always been good to me, and half my success has been due to the advertising you have given me, so the least I can do is to return the favor as best I can."

On a smaller scale, with authors of small ability and slight personality, the work of the man who makes fame to order has floated many a mediocre book at least past the point where it was a complete commercial failure.

THE AUTHOR OF SHAKESPEARE FOUND.

The ingenious and witty New York Sun has hoist the Baconians with their own acoustic petard. It announces the discovery of a new clew to the authorship of Shakespeare's plays, based upon the acoustic letter-counting of the 1623 dedication.

According to the Baconian theory the letters that give the clew to the authorship are not initial letters, but lie in the body of the text and are to be traced reading to the right on the first line then to the left on the second, and so on alternately. In this way the name Francis Bacon is spelled out. The Sun traced the letters exactly as they are traced for the Bacon acoustic, the capital letters disclosing the clew to the Sun's secret of who was Bacon's collaborator. The first letter of the first line must be used but none of the other capitals that begin lines.

"This figure, that thou Here seest put,
It was IOur gentle ShakespearE cut;
Wherein the grauer had a strife
With nature, to Out-doo the life;
O, could he but haue gRavvE his wit
As well in bRasse, as he hath hit
His face, the print wOuld then surpaSse
All that was euer Vvrit in brasse,
But, sinceE he cannot, reader, Looke
Not on his picture, bUTh his booke."

THE STORY OF THE "BATTLE HYMN."

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe celebrated her nineteenth birthday yesterday at Boston. Her name has been associated with nearly every great movement for humanitarian advance of the last sixty years. She was the intimate friend of Longfellow, Emerson, Holmes, Lowell, Garrison—all the New England great men. She is today loved and honored wherever women have any freedom and wherever men have chivalry.

Her highest bid for fame, however, is the authorship of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

"The story of its writing, she has often recounted. With friends she had gone to see a review of Union troops near Washington. A sudden movement of the enemy stopped the review and made the return to Washington a slow and difficult one. To beguile the time songs, among them, "John Brown's Body," were sung. Some one suggested that she should write other words for the stirring tune. Early next morning as she lay in her bed lines of the poem began to shape themselves, and, fearing that she would forget them, she sprang up and wrote them in the half light. The poem, written in Willard's Hotel, was first published in the Atlantic Monthly."

Battle Hymn of the Republic.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming
Of the Lord;
He is tramping out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored!
He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword;
His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;
They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damp;
I have seen His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps;
His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel writ in burnished rows of steel;
"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you
my grace shall deal;
Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel,
Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat;
Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilate, my feet!
Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures
the sky,
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
While God is marching on.

THE GYPSY TRAIL.

By Rudyard Kipling.

The White moth to the closing vine,
The bees to the open clover,
And the gypsy blood to the gypsy blood
Ever the wide world over.

Ever the wide world over, lass,
Ever the trail held true,
Over the world and under the world,
And back at the last to you.

Out of the dark of the Gorgio camp,
Out of the grime and the gray,
(Morning was at the end of the world,) Gypsy, come away!

The wild bear to the sun-dried swamp,
The red crane to her reed,
And the Romanly lass to the Romanly lad
By the tie of a roving breed.

Morning waits at the end of the world
Where winds unaltered play,
Nipping the flanks of their plunging ranks
Till the white sea horses neigh.

The pied snake to the rifted rock,
The buck to the stony plain,
And the Romanly lass to the Romanly lad
And both to the road again.

Both to the road again, again!
Out of a clean sea-track—
Follow the croak of the gypsy trail
Over the world and back!

Follow the Romanly patteran
North where the blue bergs sail,
And the bows are gray with the frozen spray
And the masts are shod with mail.

Follow the Romanly patteran
Sheer to the Austral light,
Where the besom of God is the wild west wind,
Sweeping the sea-floors white.

Follow the Romanly patteran
West to the sinking sun,
Till the junk sails lift through the houseless drift,
And the east and the west are one.

Follow the Romanly patteran
East where the silence broods
By a purple wave on an opal beach
In the hush of the Mahim woods.

The wild hawk to the windswept sky,
The deer to the wholesome wood,
And the heart of a man to the heart of a maid
As it was in the days of old.

The heart of a man to the heart of a maid—
Light of my tents, be fleet!
Morning waits at the end of the world,
And the world is all at our feet.

CLYDE FITCH'S METHOD.

I never expected to be a playwright, at least not until I had written a play. My ambition was to be a story writer, and for several years I wrote short stories, principally for children. But the stage seemed to offer a good field and I drifted into it.

I write fast, but I think slowly. When I get an idea that appears to have dramatic value I begin to put my story together, not in dramatic form, but in rough story form. I work out my story slowly, sometimes taking a year to get my material in shape. When I have arranged the story to suit me, I begin the writing of the play. It is not until I get down to actual work of putting the play into manuscript that I show any speed whatever. Other men think fast and write slowly—it is all a matter of mental construction.
